barred windows which laid across, surrounding the terrace like some cubically split sphere bounced against a winged jester. He was described and sickening to look at. His wings had outgrown the likes of any animal and looked like they had grown out of his back, interconnecting with the arms and pushing forward from below his legs.

Somehow the same nature had been kept, at it seemingly wanted to kiss and licked along the edges of the cage.

More of them flew and soon enough they surrounded the cage, making their daily motions as they tried getting through. 'What are they even trying to do?' 'Isn't it obvious? They're attempting to lure me out for some reason and the other. It's a blasted shame, for these creatures are relentless and refuse to give up under any circumstance. Worst of all is that I'm afraid that there may be a greater of coming.' Which sounded wrong in all the possible ways. She had to come with us under any circumstance possible. It had to happen one way or the other, whether or not she liked it. 'You should start climbing down and follow us. Please, we only have the greatest intentions.' 'Were you not threatening me or implying you'd burn my library down a few moments ago? Are you short of mind, or do you think me so easily pursued that I'd abandon my work here for the likes of you?' The soldier seemed to have stood there and listened, being as far from wanting to contribute as possible. It wasn't that he was afraid of her but his mind seemed to have been emptied at her sight. Both of them were the intruders there, the strangers, just as Flinch had been.

Sargent seemed to be the only one around here who even knew or was aware that they were doing something wrong. Yet no word was spoken and he had remained the same. To say the least, he had been just as confused as she were.

Caught, rather, in this trap, he spoke. 'We apologise.' But his voice cracked, for such a big man, it seemed that his voice wasn't what had been expected of him. He wasn't one to question or to talk when there was no need for it. And those things behind the barred windows forced the castle to lower itself another level below. It was the only way it could protect itself. 'But we do have the best intention in mind. Don't take what he says for granted, he's still young and bold, and he has just arrived in this place, he mustn't know our ways.' 'And what ways would those be? It only seems to me that everyone else had taken to their own and hid in their towers or their holes. What makes him so different?' 'He got me, and soon enough he's going to have you as well.' The indignation which was even implied was fruitless. Those things dug through the dirt and hard ground in order to get closer and keep at their assault. It must've been their only way out, for, apparently, they weren't going to give in as easily as it seemed. Something about a bunch of bats trying to dig in like moles left a bitter image to the mind. They weren't even normal by all means either, as their teeth revealed to serve another function. Worm-like appendages, smaller than their teeth came from their inner tubings, or rather, soft-embraced cavities. It wasn't anything but despicable to watch, at least their struggles were distracting from the problem at hand. 'Why won't you leave and have me return to my research? Is there nothing which would make you be no longer such a pest?' 'Just follow us and you'll have a chance to reach for the real world, the world at hand. Back between the living and the books written by your own kin.' 'What would that be? I laugh at that concept, as I was provided with an immortal body and seemingly endless amount to extract from.

If you dare look below, you'll see that there's no end to, just an endless amount of stairs which lead below forever. That's why I knew it'd be a waste for you to go and burn the library, as there'd be too pitiful for it reaches eternity.' He was devastated, as he laid on a pile of books. Looking at the ceiling with his legs crossed, he had little to no idea what was going on. How was he supposed to get through and find a way out? So far, Flinch had only got Sargent who was less than more the man he had expected him to be. It wasn't even near the way he had wanted him to be. That dreadful thing, damn it.'Be the way you want, we'll leave as soon as the tower rises again."Oh, but have you not realised it yet? The tower won't raise itself in a long time, at least not until the threat is over."And I suppose this happens often? If so, how come I've never seen your, wait, did you say tower?"She had slipped there for a moment, the slip of a tongue which might've cost her a bit or so.'I mean, the castle, I guess my tongue took the better of me this time. There's nothing wrong with a mistake, is there?"But you meant the tower, haven't you? That one."Wait.' Sargent interrupted as well. It wasn't likely that he knew what to expect or to say, but likely he had been aware of something during his own journey. The dreadful, dreadful one that he remembered of. He had seen something similar to that of which they had been describing, and it seemed that for once, she had stopped acting as antagonistic as she could possibly act.'Well, I guess, this might be a common ground between the two of us, but don't let that fool you that we may have an understanding.'I've seen it, I know I have, in my hole, on my machine. That must've been what you saw as well, I know it has to."Were you going to contribute with something of value then? No? Then I'd kindly advice you to let adults speak for once. For once, I think this invasion of privacy might not be as unneeded as I originally thought, so please, don't force me to change my mind.'Marlene, was her name, as for the quick introduction and slightly tensed conversation, she had decided it was fair to speak with them.As rough as they both appeared, and blunt as they came, this was rather interesting to hear about.'You wouldn't be surprised by this but I have thought it to be a part of fiction for the longest time possible."And why is that?' Asked Sargent, while he was looking around, with both of his boots by the ear, trying to get through a few books from a pile in search of something interesting. He wasn't much of a reader that one, but as long as he looked like he cared, they wouldn't be as likely to question.'For once, at least, it appears as being quoted in about every piece of literature over here. Even if there's not much about it, at least not in a concrete kind of information, everyone appears to have come into contact with it at least once through their lifetime.'A peculiar thing to have connected every one of them, but that begged the question. 'What is it? From what I could remember, it's not beyond reach, that tower lays somewhere in the city."Eddias, you don't think the tower is outside as well, do you? In the world from which we came from? Where day comes with a flash of light and there's nothing to beware?"I don't know about that, but if it is out there, that means there could be trouble there as well, and we cannot risk that."What are the two of you supposed to do, then? You can barely handle being in a library."Then join us, Marlene, we could use another pair of hands and a working brain to guide us around. The castle won't disappear by the time of your return, please.' He appeared sincere, but there wasn't any way she could leave this prison of hers, not yet. She said. "I decline your offer and I feel as if I have to remind you this. Both of you are guests in my home and perhaps I may assist you in your needs, but I won't abandon this place for anyone's plea.' What were they to do now? It looked like it was rather hopeless. They weren't heading in any right direction whatsoever. At least they had the means to kill the time.'But won't you at least try escaping from this place? It doesn't seem like it may fancy you living here for the rest of your life."What do you need of me? Are you in need of an army of men and women to do what exactly? As opposed to him, I'm not wearing army boots or trying to hind who I am.That isn't my purpose nor do I seek anything less."Then so be it, we'll head below if you refuse to help us and seem to be too preoccupied with your books and other distractions.'With that, he stormed below. If there was something wrong with the way he went, it was that dreadful manner with which the torment came. He couldn't have looked at it any other way, seemingly so. It was to be his way or none at all. Sargent followed, unlike him, he wouldn't have enjoyed being left alone with her on her own terms and ground. They had to go down there, lacking in wits, who asked for that? But he followed nonetheless. 'Why did you have to annoy her like that?' 'I? Of all the people? I couldn't have done anything for her, it was pointless to continue that intriguing conversation, she wasn't going to spill anything to us either way.' 'She could've helped us look for that tower at least.' 'Leave that alone, it's the least of our problems, we need to look for a way out through this way, some tunnel or anything else would do.' 'But hadn't she said it was some kind of endless trip, from which there'd be no way out?' 'You don't really believe her, do you?' He smiled a little, unsure of himself either. Everything he knew at least was that he needed to prove her wrong in any circumstance possible. Whatever happened in-between after would be less than what could be expected. Dreadful, nonetheless. The books were covered with brown and dark leathery cases. You could feel the scent of wax as you made your way through. It wasn't necessary for the least to pay attention to anything around, even if they were to fall, they couldn't be hurt. But as they descended and ignored the reek of knowledge, it appeared that they couldn't have amassed something less than what they had. It was a harrowing amount of slimy bookish insects. They had sharp corkscrews coming out of their small round bodies and seemed to have acquired a new taste. Something in their reflection seemed to bother both of them the most. For their pinkish bloated amber-like stone covers seemed to bear the words they had eaten during their previous stay. Eddias listened closely only to hear the words whisper to him the most dreadful things alive. 'Taste us, taste us, taste us, milord.' 'Devour my sons by granting me eternal life. Please do not let me die this way, in agony, rotting there. He understood. They spent enough time down there. From the dating from between the pages it looked like strange times had come. It seemed like they became mad carriers of phrases. 'Get off of me you tiny pests.' 'Let us come, we need an entryway in your body.'

An eerie sound came from near his ear and for a second both him and Sargent looked at one another, trying to figure out whether or not they heard the same thing. Not that it mattered, as it appeared to be less than important. A dreadful thing indeed. 'There, I knew we would find some way out, look, Sargent, it's a door.' 'Indeed it was, it looked like out of all the places they could've made it through, it was finally over. A heavy sound of clockworks could be heard, coming from behind the door. The icky substance which made the transition between the books and the wood which laid between them appeared to be just another ink-replaced, an organ of sorts. It seemed like the pests had taken leaps and fled from it, in fear from that pulsating organ, from which tubes went inside the books and pushed through some kind of depravity. 'We should've known it couldn't have expanded that far, as for eternity?' 'There might be something dangerous there Flinch, in case you were wondering. Why else would she try hiding it so desperately if not for this reason alone?' They tried looking at it from a rather bleak view. The point was that up there, there was a mess, it was unclean, the books had been thrown or fallen on themselves. Even the view wasn't one of grandeur but rather, a tragedy, for the maiden who locked herself in and refused to go. Both felt as if she was trapped there for as long as those creatures stood. 'Not until we can stop it.' 'What was that?' 'Nothing Sargent, it's only that I thought of something great, we may finally make it through at last. This journey may be over sooner than you think.' With that, he opened the door, to the dark against which the floors below lit and suddenly started raising themselves to their level. It was an elevator, meaning they were going deeper. A strange thing, a realisation came, looking down there, between the elevator frame and the small plot of wood on which they stood. Right near the organ, which was dirty itself, there was a lack of perfection there. There wasn't anything clean in the least. 'See what I'm seeing there?' 'I was about to ask the same thing, you don't suppose that once we go down there, we may not find a way back, do you?' By that, he didn't mean that they could get lost in the least, rather that they could be at risk of something else. 'There's only one way to find out whether or not we're in danger, but even if we were Sargent, this might be our very chance to make things right, if you understand me.' 'I don't think I do, you took me out of my hole and I think it's great that I managed to see something else, but, what about this? Surely, we cannot leave her there, trapped like that.' 'Good point and believe me when I tell you that this is exactly what I was expecting you to say.' His grin said it all, it looked as if he had become just as ready to blow from excitement, as he thought, it was for her own good. But how exactly where they to do it? It looked dangerous for starters, the way it pumped, it could be venom for his fingers, mightily vile for his skin as well. Before he could guess it, there could be irreparable damage which would spread, alas, through both of them, not to mention that it could be something which might not be easily repaired. But there was a way, he looked at it. 'See those tubes that come out of it? Are you thinking what I'm thinking, or am I the only one of the two of us who thought it to be some kind of heart-looking organ?' 'I don't know, I suppose there's only one way to find out, isn't it?' He took one of the books and ripped out its pages, folding them up and curling them in small clusters of paper-balls. It was a masterpiece on both sides, as soon as spat on them and made them ready. 'Now it's your turn, my aim isn't what it used to be, for that I'm rather afraid.' 'Very well, I'll make do with what I have then.' He did, within four throws, the holes were blocked, the airway shafts pulled the folded paper sheets deeper inside, but still not through enough. It was then that Flinch closed it and kicked the hart, triggering a desperate bump, before he quickly retreated in his corner. It was a terrible experience, dreadful to watch in any meaningful way. For, as much as it had shown itself to be that way, the dread had only manifested itself as a way of pumping itself into a stroke. The blood started pushing out and breaking through the various openings it started making. 'I don't think it's supposed to act that way.' Which was enough said, as a matter of fact, there wasn't any clue to what extent it would act towards. As soon as Sargent closed his mouth, he noticed a darkening, a degeneration which spread across the field above. Both of them followed, looking through the books from which they have taken the sheets of paper and noticed the words distort. They were unreadable now and looked rather decrepid as if they had been written by an insane man. 'Don't try touching any of them, we might get something out of it if we don't care around.' 'I'll do my best, don't worry, we should be able to continue this way if we pay enough attention.' He bit his own tongue after he pushed towards one of the walls to his right. Whatever the books were made out of, now turned to mush as soon as he pushed his hand through. It was terrible, worse than that. As they reach the top, both of them turned to the woman, only to notice her descend into some kind of mental breakdown, basking into the darkening, as it bloomed in a field of dark grass. That's what the library had become, a mass of black and tainted, curling things, which were barely even filled with anything no longer. 'What have the two of you done? Because I know that the two of you are at fault! Oh, I promise you, that against all, you'll both suffer for it. I'll make sure you're going to suffer just as much as I have.' 'There's no time for that, there never was. You either come with us and roam through or you waste away in here.' 'He's right you know? I had lived in my hole for far too long and your prison only now came to be. Don't do the same as I have, not when you got a chance. Be reasonable.' Said Sargent, be reasonable. It was his advice to her, and it seemed for a moment there that she listened to you. 'If I were to leap, would you catch me?' 'Of course, we will just hurry until this entire place turns into a pool, I don't know how much longer it might last and this might be your only chance. His voice might've been distant, for as much as he had been aware. There had been danger there for a moment, but she took that leap of faith and they came down the stairs. 'Careful, it might be slippery.' 'Damn cretins, why have you done it?' 'Calm down woman, can't you see that it was all an illusion, can you even remember anything you've spoken or read about?' It was that click that shook her off, for as much as she had relentlessly caressed them as her children, she couldn't remember a single spoken word. Not in her language either way. What she remembered instead were the various scribbles made by the mad. Mad. Was she the one who wrote everything there? As they made their way through she hadn't said a word, but Marlene was certain of it, she had written every single book there. Much to her credit, she must've been in a trance of some sort, which trapped her into the nothingness, the trap through which she only regurgitated her own broken words in her poor, poor mind. 'It was all because of me, it must've been.' 'No, this wasn't your fault, that thing was it.' They both point at what appeared to have been a dead organ. It had curled up into something much smaller, leaving behind a crater-like formation, dire-black, with all the tubes hanging in the air around it like a circle, dripping what was left of the liquid. Alas, it had been done, and the platform was still waiting. Out of the three of them, Marlene couldn't help it but watch in fear at the tiny thing. It had had so much power of her. Had this been it all along? Could it truly be the thing which held her there without being in the least aware? There wasn't any way of telling whether or not it would return, but at least she had tried mourning what was left of her time. 'Are we going to step on the platform or not? I cannot be the only one who's waiting for something to happen, can I?' She glanced around, looking rather pale. It wasn't as if there could be something up with her. The dizziness had taken full effect at least, once they came onto the platform and had been taken down the hole. While they were silently taken down, the eeriness followed them down there, taking them by surprise. It wasn't safe where they were heading, at least not in the way they thought it would be. As long as they were there, far away from where the organ had been there wasn't in the least a way to know whether or not they had been safe. The platform stopped soon enough and what they have been greeted by was some sort of shaft which ran forth. 'Shouldn't we have taken a light with us or something? I feel like it may have been a lot safer with one.' Marlene thought as she glanced about. But neither of them responded, rather, they seemed to pace themselves faster than it was needed for one such as her to follow. It was dreadful down there. At least from her point of view, there wasn't in the least some order, the mad things seemed to have scraped at invisible walls during some vile encounters. That alone had her wonder whether or not anyone had been there at all. 'Marlene, do you mind answering me a question?' 'Not at all, go ahead.' She responded with a shortness of breath which had been uncommon for her. This problem with her breath had been something new, that shouldn't have bothered her somehow. But it had, and there wasn't any sort of way with which she might get through it. Well, it was either that or to return, she could follow or get back to mourning her place. Which option could she take? Could it be that it was far too late for her to make a move now? 'Marlene, are you feel all right?' She snapped out of it as soon Sargent inquired of her. It wasn't too far off now, the first object they could see in the distance. Rather, it seemed that they were caught in the moment to care much for what was going around. 'Indeed, I'm rather well, you don't need to worry about me, I think I can take care of myself and I.' She stopped, out of breathe again, there wasn't a way to stop it, but she knew that it would only get worse. 'Look, I found something.' It was Flinch's voice, even though it was somewhat queer now. The seemingly weak man did something in the dim light, managing to get around and grip some sort of crane device. That shouldn't have been there, at least not under his library, but she had suspected it was part of the device that kept lowering and raising the castle-like formation which kept hold of her library. 'Don't touch that yet, if you don't mind. I think that's supposed to be important, at least from what I suppose it to be.' She was unaware herself that she had blushed. It was a nervous thing that she did when she felt either afraid or anxious.

That way, down there, she could feel her own heart beating faster and faster, slowly heading into some kind of stroke. 'Are you feeling all right? That's all we're trying to find out, are you going to be fine?' There wasn't an answer which could satisfy either of them, nor could she pinpoint the exact cause of her problem. But at least that was enough to make them stop. Something about the devices affected her, in a way of which she hadn't dared to even stare too much at the crane. And there were others as well, plenty of devices lying around, being set on various positions, doing strokes against the ceiling. 'I want to get out of this place, at least for as long as I'm here, I need to get out.' She was dead serious and in some sort of bizarre way, they were mesmerised by her pain. There was a desperate need to help her, which prompted both to ignore the danger which the machines imposed down there, while left unattended and take the weak creature which lay in front of them as far away as possible. That's when it finally lit. A strange light lit, from every side, some kind of industrial type of system, from what either of them could tell. It started like a beacon, when one of the engineers, by the likes, came to have himself noticed by them. At first the light was too strong, but they had lowered it. How many of them were out there? There wasn't any notice whatsoever of that, they were kind of lost, at least, from the likes of which it hadn't made a difference. As strange as it had looked, those were humanoids and were to be approached. 'Careful now, I don't like the way their suits look like.' It was Sargent who pointed that out, but he was sort of right about it. Their hoods covered some kind of transparent bowl, sealed but caught on tubing from every side. From behind there appeared to be two more arms that didn't belong, their forms having been tailored there against the strange materials from the kind of which their suits were made. A neutral colour though, far too reflective, and less blunt than it would've been expected. There wasn't any way to determine if they were friendly, or if they were intruders and would be held accountable for that. They haven't given any signs that they were that disturbed by the fact that they were there. As a matter of fact, they moved slowly and waved their hands at them, strangely per say. Something wasn't entirely right, which was even more obvious as they made their way through. First of all, they weren't greeted as well as they thought they would, not well received either, rather, they were treated like they were contaminated. It was sort of strange, but more of them came from their strange wide holes in the walls and pushed through, far enough to reach. Wherever they were coming from, it didn't appear to be inviting at all, neither were the men and what they were preparing to do. As soon as they came into contact, everything became tenser, far more than it had been previously thought it'd be. Apparently, they didn't seem too keen on the idea that they were there, not even in the least. Soon enough, the three of them found themselves surrounded, staring at their own reflections, rather dumbfounded than in any kind of immediate danger. 'Who are you? What are you intending to do with us?' There was a short break in the air strokes Marlene felt, with which she had approached it at a faster pace now. For starters, she looked rather pleased of herself and what she had done. While being close enough to one of them men, she snatched one of the tubes out of reach only to reveal a hard gases pushing forth. The one hiding there desperately fought to catch the wriggling tube, to no avail. Everyone stepped back and looked at him. As soon as his mad dance ended, he appeared to be still as every other tube popped out. Even their tiny group of three retreated once they noticed what the on-going thing. That wouldn't end well, though Flinch, as he prepared to sprint in a different direction. But his fear was kind of short-lived, as a matter of fact, it hadn't looked that out of place. 'I don't think I was supposed to do that, what are we going to do now?' 'Keep moving slowly, no sudden movements, you don't want to let them see you act in a strange manner if you understand.' She sniffed around, the gases which had been left out of its body were dreadful. It was outwardly impossible for a human being to breathe through such lung corruption, but when the pressure managed to build itself past that point, it had revealed itself. In its true form, a human-lookalike, rather starved and squinted. It looked like some sort of dehydrated sort of dreadful being, with two pairs of mouths and floating long tongues that had pulled in the gas. Now they remained flaccid against his face, since there was nothing more to keep it alive. The pinkish tones had turned to grey and as it fell on itself they could all feel the bones crackle inside. 'They're all like that aren't they? We only need to pull on their tubes and they'll fall, one after another, right?' 'But they haven't attacked us, Marlene. We mustn't go for them.' 'It doesn't matter, does it? He'll just come back as soon as he can, just like the rest of us, remember?' No one told her yet, and how could either of them do it? The engineers were slowly moving away, while there seemed to be some strangeness passed between the two of them. Sargent felt that what they were doing was wrong, more so than the fact that he wasn't aware if they were as safe down there.

Enough time passed that they were half-way there, the creatures had almost escaped. 'He's not getting up, see? There, he's finally dead, without any sort of way of being brought to life. Is this what you aimed for?' That was a dreadful thing, worse than that after she realised that they'd come for her. 'We need to prevent them from entering those holes, do you understand? They may have been peaceful, but I don't think it might matter once they get through the other side.' Such a dreadful pair of thoughts, they wouldn't be surprised if it came to the conclusion that they would be hunted or taken care off. It was either they or them. No more options left but to go. The pulse came as they were half-way into the chase. Only Sargent and Flinch turned to look as something which had been flourishing from inside the fallen engineer. 'Look, he might be alive.' Both of them looked through the strange veil but turned their gazes to the sides. It seemed like a pile of blotching black wag had accumulated under. From that body-made sack, there immediately hatched an entire hive of strange big and squashed long insects. Multiple pairs of wings extended and made the utmost dreadful sound known to man. 'This is why they avoided being murdered down there; we need to flee before they catch us!' There wasn't any argument whatsoever there, just the fear they all felt, the anxiety of the deal. They outpaced and outran those engineers and have entered one of the holes. Some kind of strange motion system detected their movement and let them through. It felt strangely pleasing in a peculiar sort of way, but that was it. 'We could try doing this, I don't know if it might work but it's worth the try.' She licked her lips as she began pounding against one of the panels there. It had been strongly unadvised but she had done it either way. They could all feel the holes tighten there, straight under their eyes, which was the key to it. 'Break all of them, don't let any of them come inside.' And while they were busy going around, they have failed to be caught on by the strange texture and the plainness of the room they were in. But no one was there, other than them. So there was no other reason whatsoever to be looking into it, other than the fact that they could be taken by surprise. It was getting awfully close to move around there, especially since there was nothing to be expected from either of them. Soon enough, there appeared some carrier of light, a tiny head-shaped body with two small arms and legs coming out of its own sides. Once the first frightful look came they had been encased. Whatever was is that look of fright, the lack of might it displayed didn't seem to matter. Each of them had been encased in some invisible barrier which held no air. All because of some tiny evil creature there, which couldn't help but notice some intruders who made their way inside their operating base. It was an awful sight, how they would writhe in agony, grasping for a single more breathe of air that wasn't even going to come. There wasn't in the least a way, neither of which appeared to be able to come any closer under those circumstances. They all tried screaming to no avail, as, not only were they not listened, but they couldn't hear one another there. Even though that scrawny thing was doing its best, they were still far away from collapsing. 'Sargent, go for its throat, don't let it get a grip on us again.' Out of the three of them, he was the only one who managed to keep some of his composure, at least to the point where he could just run through, with his lungs still at half capacity. The two of them were lying on the floor, trying desperately to breathe and not to wreathe in the collapse. A sight more awful couldn't have been thrown to sight. They were distracted by the fact that neither of them had seen Sargent act that way before. He stopped his charge and pushed the tiny creature down, wrapping both of its hands around its clearly visible breathing parts, after which, he pushed. There was little he could do then, as a matter of fact, it was all and all pitiful. From most of its pores there came this substance which acted like a preservation tool. As it started foaming bubbles around what was left of the breathing mechanism, the creature had hardened and become part of the floor, taking in the texture and becoming only a small bump on it. 'I don't want to feel that again, not from another one of those small creatures, if there are more of them out there. Flinch, I need you to get us out of here.' 'Why am I supposed to do anything? I'm not the one who got us in this mess.' 'But you are and it's your fault as well that we almost died.' 'Please, both of you stop. I need to listen, do you hear that?' She'd been the only one who had been keeping a tight ear on the ground. It hadn't been that peculiar for her to hear sounds any longer. And now, it had come in handy to listen to the track of the damned. Neither of them knew, or barely suspected, but she had died there and inside of her there came another. One creature had drilled through the soles of her feet and walked through her body. In mere seconds it had managed to burst inside her skull and grow its mass of oily dark, becoming what seemed to be partially human and more so in terms of being a brainless anomaly which spoke out of the pieces of the brain it had collected and kept inside. 'They have stopped trying to get inside. I think there's no other chance for us to return that way, not with what we have.' Both were reluctant to admit it but she had been right, there wasn't any chance or reason that they knew of, to help them make their way, henceforth, they made the only decent thing which was to keep moving forward. It was this unknown room which pulled them in. With each step taken, they felt disoriented, at least, in the first seconds of their walk, by the time they reached a wall to hang on, this felt like a walk through some unlit room that kept their motions locked, their eyes thoroughly tired so they could be slowed at another. 'Where's the woman? Where did she go? She was there a second ago, Sargent, have you seen her leave?' There it was, one second she was there whilst in the other, she had disappeared. There wasn't any kind of explanation whether or not she had been taken, as there was no scream, or if she tried running away from them and making on her own behind. In the distance, one of the holes opened only to suddenly close. No one or nothing came back in. There wasn't any warning or some way of knowing, but the walls had taken an extra step into coming down on them. It had become too close for comfort, and they weren't moving at all. 'Let's head there before we're caught on those smaller ones again.' 'Flinch, I don't know how to tell you this, but I don't think we may be able to see her again.' 'What makes you say that?' 'Call it a hunch.' Said Sargent. They both appeared to be hunching, as they made their way through one of the holes, seeing some kind of reluctance from it. Not that it was alive, by any means, their motion was the only thing which had been detected, but it did appear to have some kind of consciousness that made it show that reluctance. It bore some heat, the place was rather big. It almost felt like the entire place was a hall and not only a tunnel. There were far more openings near their sides, from which they could throw some looks outside. From there they found the port. Perhaps it wasn't exactly a port per se, rather some kind of combination of the parasitic improper soles that covered their ships which gave that impression. 'Am I the only one who sees this? Could I be dreaming or is this some kind of ship area? Just how far are their tunnels going?' Sargent quickly noticed before the two of them that there was more than met the eye to it. They didn't look like flying ships but more likely designed only to walk through the tunnel and return. He explained to them what he noticed first, the kind of railing system underneath which pushed forth into the dark. 'Get down, quickly.' There were four of them below, making sure everything was going right. They couldn't have been more discreet while they were walking, but going around wasn't right. Mostly, all three of them have become sort of disoriented by the looks of which they couldn't even properly interact with the panels. Even though bashing them in worked before, it was a high risk since it could alert them of their presence. It was, more or less a risk on its own. 'Crested thing, you, won't be getting through.' Flinch, to his own surprise had caught one rat-sized dark armoured creature by its tail. Immediately, as that happened, he managed to wrap himself around the shell and hold it as tightly as possible, without even daring to look back. It felt soft, enough that he started punishing the creature for being caught, tearing at it until it broke to pieces. 'What was that for?' Sargent almost fell for the creature, but turned around, it revealed a set of incisors which pointed directly at the tail. It moved backwardly in order to prepare for some leap of a kind, but it had been more important to figure out whether or not he knew of that. The man had known of the creature even before it had revealed itself from the camouflage it wore around its body, but Sargent didn't push forward. Not now, when it would be grave to ask a question. 'I think we have spent too much down here.' At the threshold which had been past the hallway from which they noticed their ships, they stood watching and creeping at the one whom entered. It was tall, even for them and moved slowly. Something about it looked wrong, as if it had been somewhat jeopardised by the way it was moving alone. 'Flinch, look down there, right below the stomach.' He pointed at it and everything appeared to have clicked with him as well. There were the marks of some sort of cut made there, a wicked type which didn't have anything to do with anything whatsoever. Could there have been some fight or something of the sort? Neither of them could tell, what was important was the fact that it didn't fear and the movements inside of its body, which competed with the on of the arms and legs were too angular and peculiar to be the ones of either a man or one of them. Both decided it would better to have it locked there, while bashing the panel on the other side, they couldn't change the fact that they had been noticed. 'You do realise that if it wants to, or even stumbles around, it could jump through one of the holes, right? And that's our only plan for escape now.' 'I'll hear none of it Sarge, there's already much at stake that I'm not trying to worry about.' As well as plenty of secrets which were kept away? Nonetheless, they went through angular tubes which led farther into their strange base, and the farther they went, the more they started encountering those small armoured creatures. 'Just who lets them breed this way? And where are the other engineers? This place should've been swarming with them.' 'I don't know, maybe they just left because the minor inconvenience they were met by when those came.' It wasn't much to go on, but they were mostly passive, if not squished now and again. There wasn't any kind of resistance or woe met when they killed some of their brothers, as it turned out for them to be as brainless as they appeared to be aggravated by their presence. It was then that they have come into contact with their group. Three of them were carrying materials in some sort of lucid-shaped bags which dripped of something unnamable. It was fascinating at most. They had not been aware that the two of them had been the cause of death of at least a few of their kin. Nothing would've been worse than what was believed to be their. 'Let me make the first move, nothing serious here, I just need to establish contact through some way.' He looked sure on himself, pale and single of this concept of kin. Perhaps he had been taken from a different era because he and Sargent looked rather different in the way they acted and had thought. This was the moment when he realised that there was nothing wrong, yet the noises gave him a different impression. They were coming straight out of the room he had suspected to be the hangar, the one he had peered in. And he wasn't the only one who had become suspicious of it, as it just happened for them to look in the same direction as he had, at the same time. Slowly but surely, they had lowered their cargo and stared at them. 'We have to establish some sort of understanding if we are to escape.' By that he could see that neither of them gave signs of having known what he said. It had become apparent to him that he would have to act primal, like the ape he thought he was. With a crooked finger, he pointed at the door, signaling that they wanted to go. One or two steps would be more than enough to signal them what he wanted. At least as long as they weren't perceived as some kind of threat, they could go ahead and make it through without getting hurt. There wasn't any other intention which could come to mind, they have caught off with the expectation of some kind of dreadful way in which they could be taken back. Soon enough they might be attacked, through some kind of wrong way that might make them regret the fact that they've come into contact with them. Compact as they were, the engineers were undeniably dangerous, at least from the way they wanted to get rid of them. It would be enough to despair there and never return to anything which might even be remotely sane, but that wasn't an option. Not any longer, at least. When the door opened and it came stumbling like a drunken fool, there was a feeling of terror which was at least unexpected. The engineers were the least dangerous things there now. Both Flinch and Sargent backed down, trying to somehow go around and enter the hole. A few of the engineers noticed the state in which the other one was and decided it was time for them to retreat as well, only that it was too late for that and there'd be no return. As soon as one would come to the realisation that there was no way to fight it, only to run, they could do something. But that had come far too late, as it just happened for it to lay one of his hands on top of the bowl and break it. The shockingly horrid humanoid backed away, only to reveal that it wasn't dead yet. 'Sargent, I think something's in the air, he hasn't started foaming like the others despite his broken mask.' 'I was thinking the same thing, but look, an opening.' He was even quicker to point out that they had a slim chance to get through. It wasn't much but they would do whatever they could, even though it meant that there wasn't any other way back. At least from this side, more of the big ones came through, straight from the main door, breaking whatever lay in their path. It had become something akin to some blood-like invasion. Some sort of parasitical force or virus had infiltrated, the likes of which would damn them both. 'I think I could make one of the ships go through.' He said with a bit of effort. There would be no regards for the strange encounter. As soon as they both saw her, there were questions there which shouldn't have been thought, not only that, but it had become apparent that there was something wrong with her body. 'Leave her, look at her lower side, she's not a human any longer.' As they both peered below, they saw that she had merged with a part of the ship, at least the one which had a side of all the controls which were needed in order to function. The other ship was empty but they couldn't risk being followed. 'What do you suppose we do about the other one? About the one she's in? As soon as they'll see her, there'll be no way. Think, damn you, they've spotted us. The engineers are already dead, we're going to get surrounded.' 'Get in the ship then Flinch. Now, don't think, do it!' There wasn't enough time to think about their actions, only to act, that's what he had said. For someone who had allegedly been a coward in the war, he acted quite bravely there. In a moment's notice, he punched through the control board and pulled the guts out of the engine, as if the ship was partially alive. It made a wicked sound and had wriggled as it reached the floor. The woman made as much of a tainted thing without the notice, she spewed on herself and suddenly the parasitic entity decayed. Such an explanation would be reckless and helpful to less than a clever soldier like himself. 'Get in already, what were you waiting for?' 'I was making sure.' He had been caught off by the invaders. They were there, with their heads much bigger, their arms almost giant. First of all, they defaulted to the first ship and seemed to change around the edges. This was alien to him, the way it worked and pushed around. A dreadful spree of thought made him feel that he was wrong. If that thing wouldn't start because of him, he'd be abashed. Taken by them in a most automatic manner, through which he'd suffer at their hands. Only now he realised the terror which he saw in his reflection, against one of the closed upper region of the ship. Yet it somehow came naturally to him, alas, the ship had started. 'Sargent, you're a genius, a genius I say. Mad man, you saved us both.' The wail that could be felt through the rails made a signal which hadn't been expected. At least they could worry not about being caught, for reasons of which the railing stopped. They were on the ground no more. What they saw and felt was hard to explain in words. For space alone would rival, the endless dark. Flinch looked and could finally see through the walls that they were floating through some structural entryway of energy that passed both on the outside and through the ship. Despite what they had thought of themselves, this dreadful thing seemed to bear something to it. It was a signal, the kind of which was dreadful and filled with despair. There would be no need to look away now but they had entered their world, somewhere in their own copy of the universe. Now the gloom had faded and it had become apparent that they could be distracted no longer by what had been around. Without a doubt, this might be the place from which the source of their trouble came, or a new one which would have them despair. They had multiple planets and satellites which were inhabited by their kin. Even from the distance, it had become apparent that there was some kind of differences which weren't as keen to be ignored. What they saw was some kind of regurgitation between the planets, which just so happened to pull some of the tiny rounded satellite rocks closer to the atmosphere, even as far as going to say that they were touching their own planets and seemingly pushed others out of the way. Then, it appeared to have stopped; this entire motion and set of rotations seemed to have stopped right as they have entered their general gravitational field. For a moment there, they looked at one another, rather set on the fact that they might've been watched or seen. Here it was a strange system in space and they were just getting caught in the whole affair. 'Look, I think they've all started turning, what's the reason for that?' But the whole concoction appeared to have left a bitter taste as suddenly it turned again. Buried in the soles of each of the cosmic construct, there appeared to be one side of a giant body, twisted, caught, cut in halves. Such were the pieces spread, a great insectoid being laid there. It was darker than the rock side and seemed to be in a somewhat living state, only if it weren't for the fact that it had occupied at least half of the planet's mass, there would've been a reason to change trajectory. Nonetheless, they were heading there, soon to land on it. 'Try not touching any of it at least. I don't want to touch any side of it we aren't supposed to. We can only assume of what could happen if something were to go wrong.' Flinch said with a kind of smirk that he had been known for by now. Sargent appeared curious about something there. Far, in the distance, there laid some kind of forming stars. Their radiance had shone through, but their colours had been pinkish-brown. As for their movements, they appeared to be akin to ambers which flew and pushed themselves, trying to be devoid of any kind of dampness which may distract from the dreadful enterprise the world had shown. 'Those aren't stars.' He said while looking away, certain on himself that perhaps Sargent hadn't heard him. But glowing eggs, they must've been protected in a layer of that putrid shining blight he had felt as livid in the sky. It was a thing he almost dreaded to forget and rather looked away at the command. There wasn't any kind of pleasant thought any longer, sadly, as the planets and their satellites turned. As soon as their rotations ended, there appeared to be some kind of opening which made itself appear, both through the atmosphere and through the planet. It was easy to observe that the main difference between their planets and the home region was the lack of solid ground. Most of the plateau was formed of floating movable mush, a morbidly obese mass having formed right under their feet, as it landed and took them in. From behind, the vastness of space seemed to have vanished under the planet's own disparity, for which there'd be no explanation whatsoever. One light shone, it was flat and gray but they were aware that the being they have spoken to weren't blind. 'I don't know where this may lead, friend. But I don't suppose this can get any worse than the hole you found me in.' But his words were bitter and had been rushed. As soon as they were brought closer to the various floating pumps, they realised that this was some kind of pseudo-life support in which the various parts had to be kept. Various groups of suitless creatures stood on floating masses of the substance that floated so freely and didn't appear to interact with anything at all. Dreadful as it seemed, they appeared to be content. Flying beings, rather, it seemed that they have non-developed wings, or rather, have gone through the evolution stage until they have evolved beyond it. They were glistening, alas. And in a moment, the ship had been taken apart. Soon enough they found themselves standing above one of their masses caught looking around. The emptiness was vague but it was there. Other than the main structures, which had no other purpose or reason but to keep their progenitor alive, they were only the masses which were used by them to stand on. 'Look down there, I think I see something.' Sharp eyes, he had, that Sargent, perhaps too well for his own. It was a moving solid mass ball of the same wriggling, dusty kind of substance which appeared to have thrown itself around and crept through. Despite trying to act decent, they have been noticed. What were they to do? Those giant organs were far too big to disrupt, they were out of their element, with their only way to escape having been left out. 'Do you think there'd be a platform for us if we were to fall?' But that question didn't have any respite any longer, though they have seemingly caught themselves off guard. It appeared that the way underneath them seemed to have been diminishing slowly, as in no way had it known the likes of men. This wasn't theirs, they didn't belong there and now, they would be driven out. 'Can you still breathe?' 'Can you?' Flinch in return. Most of the atmosphere was alike to them, but it was getting heavier, harder, pushing far deeper into their lungs. In no way could they determine whether or not there was some way to get out of it. Pointless as it seemed, it was true, but soon enough they'd get to find out whether or not there was a way for them to return. One way through or the other, her name still appeared to ring true, what was it after so long a time? Had he not realised it yet? There was some weird sound around the district. Some people were messing around the round booth which lay in the middle of the street, despite the fact that there wasn't any kind of distraction to move around. This was the main appeal, as it seemed to have appeared out of nowhere. One day it wasn't there and the next it had moved in. Mostly men were pulled towards it, but some dame would sniff around. Something about it being out of place pulled everyone. For starters, it had been covered with some kind of plants which had grown around and over it. They came in shades of putrid yellow and green. It seemed like they were out of place there, especially when accounted for the fact that they had no roots underneath them, but rather stumps where there should've been. A distasteful thing happened that once and again it would spray an odourless scent around the place. 'What's that? Did you feel that as well?' 'I did, the dizziness, I think it came from standing too much around it, I think I need to leave.' But he was pulled back, like the other rascals whom couldn't explain why it was that they were there. A peculiar thing it was indeed, unexplainable in the least of sense. More so, there was some kind of strange happenings which made him feel that there would be nothing of the kind, worse so, that no one would notice. Throughout the night, some snuck, only to approach the booth with bags of bone and human throngs. Plenty of organs, bottles and curtains of man's blood had been brought to the mixture. It seemed like whoever managed to come up with those things had been an expert, a dreadful expert who had taken them by surprise, unable to come up with anything less mortal, the hatch opened. It seemed like a long way down there, but the wretch starved itself and spoke, alas. By their minds, akin to slaves they listened and obeyed. This was only one small cap but it was part of the giant machine in which it laid. The blasted thing seemed peculiar there, a fat lump which had grown upward, elongated, to the point of having weak limbs. 'Do not worry, our decrepit damnation, you shall deliver us from this madness and reign free once they come.' With which there came another puff around. And with each fragrance of smell, pieces of their brains seemed to decay, perhaps in the worst way possible. Only the obedient parts of their brains remained, the rest had no use which made it corrupt them even further. 'What's that? You wish us to bring you more?' Said one of them chimed in as soon as he had the chance to put on a word as well. There appeared to be some personal taste there, for that alone, the booth lifted and got pushed aside. It wasn't that hard, as a matter of fact, it was merely akin to some kind of metal cap on its head. Nothing blocked it from getting out and pulling itself out. It looked awful, like some bloated accumulation of fat which had grown lumps in every direction, bearing some yellow discoloration around it. There was confusion at the first glance, whether or not the small rounded black ball around the top of its body was its head, but it wasn't. Whatever the function that thing had, it was nothing alike the face or the head which had lost itself inside the body and had become part of the bulk. Alas, the small limbs revealed themselves and came forth. They didn't look right, but seemed to have been made to dig through dirt. As much as that connected with its bearing of the plants, it seemed to have become lady and dreadfully slow. Now that the illusion of its might was empty, it finally came out with its entire body and started slowly moving towards a lesser side of the town. 'Should we follow it?' 'What do you think of the hole then? I see that it had left something behind to grow.' Inside the hole, there seemed to be either something which would grow, or a piece of it which had been cut off. It appeared to be nimble for one its size. As soon as they had realised what was to be done, they moved around and started pushing the cap back where it had been. This new one would grow the same way, being fed the same, knowing only the dark and leave once it had grown during one dreadful night. But for the other, there came the final destination. As soon as it had started pushing out of the fat, it revealed only the most cherished pair of twisted and interconnected pair of sickly-looking bones. They bore the kind of apathetic and seemed to bear a stench. Under all that fat, there laid the twisted limbs, which held only one rounded, curved ball which held most of its organs, covered in the deadliest of carapaces. From it sprouted something near hundreds of limbs, bone-like and without meat. Though as the meat spread below of it, there came the hunger and the time for its proper self-devouring feat. Each of the limbs punctured its shell and started pulling all the fat back in. Most of the legs had grown, but that wasn't enough. In-between the legs it formed wings out of the fat, and moved like some sort of satellite which had crashed. After the initial spins, it had the greatest of desires to get rid of the place which had taken it so few a moments to keep in check. Its servants had just arrived and it barely noticed their existence as it were. Had this been happening for years or for aeons? There wasn't any way of knowing. Confusion came, at last, as it spread its wings as farther as it could and sprayed the entire city with its mad fragrance. There wasn't any way of knowing how many of them had been affected. But throughout that night, people walked, en mass. It wasn't even a few of them, and they didn't even seem to be awake but sleepwalking under the gaze of very moon and the large being which observed them. It wasn't pleasant at all, to be looked down in such a manner but that couldn't be helped, not to mention that it was the least of the concerns to be had. Safety had become a kind of concern, of which standards couldn't be met by normal means. For a glimpse of a moment, it looked like it had come out of its carapace, holding a thin version of the long fat-one which had emerged from its hole. The top of it was still as hardened as it seemed to be but thing elongated body had attained the freedom to move around and twisted as freely as it would. At the time when the mass of people formed in front of it, that's when it started striking and wrapping around them, absorbing them inside and pulling as many as it could hold but growing less in fat. Not only was it pulling everything in its legs and wings but those things would soon be functional and soon enough, it could burst into a flight. But a dark rain had come and the amoeba-like coloured tainted started changing. It darkens at the feel of rain, the wings splashed around and suddenly it had retreated. For hours at least, safety was attained, but if rain were to continue, there was no way of knowing whether of not it could keep its grasp over them. The creature was being banished and it knew. Without a way of going forth, it change its stance and threw itself into the air. Most of its form suddenly flattened and wrapped itself like the form it had grown with and never changed. Behind it, the restless sleepers whom had walked suddenly returned to their places and walked throughout the night as silent eyeless creatures. Most loyal of servants never met their rewards, they were only tasked to stay behind and take heed of the younger one which hadn't even yet emerged. Unlikely to be surprised, as they came there, they noticed that the cap was gone. As soon as they ran to see at that point where it had been, the hole had revealed itself to be filled with the murky water. 'Let go off my hands, I have to swim down there and take it with me. It needs the air, it cannot breathe down there.' 'Take a hold off yourself brother, can't you see it's already over? He had abandoned us, it's true, but that's how it's supposed to be. Don't you get it, yet? We're free, no longer will we have to carry its will of evil throughout the land.' 'No, you don't understand me. I wanted to serve it, I wanted to follow it and do everything I said I'd do. I have been chosen, I've been his loyal servant, and how dare it abandon me that way?' He said right before he was released. It's strange, thinking about them like that, at least in the past. He must've lost his mind then, as there wasn't any explanation on why he leaped down there and swam right to the bottom. I waited and waited for minutes, wasting as much of the night as I could possibly get away with, only to realise that he wasn't going to return. That hole had been plastered and covered with cement, all the way to the bottom, the next thing in the morning as well. Whether or not he died down there is least of my concern, but if anything, I like to think that he had followed through some kind of portal which had lead him to his master. There's no other way to look at it without getting bitter and thinking of the remorse I felt for not trying harder to stop him. The man at the bar ordered him another drink. He's been listening to his story for at least two or four clocks. Every detail, every single inquiry he had, everything was answered, even to what he wore, how much he knew of the man as well. 'Oh, he was tall, at least as tall as I am. And he enjoyed wearing this neatly tailored vest, especially made for him, dark brown and leather pants, wrapped around a snake-like belt. His beard was long and he wore a top of glasses over a scar which had extended from around his forehead to his cheek. He said he got that from some kind of fishing accident but I knew better.' 'What do you suppose happens now? Were there others under its command?' 'Oh yeah, it was Brother Matthew, Harold Glenshaw, Brood Grimmway, so on and so forth.' The list could've taken at least a few hours to complete if he were to start listing everyone who had contributed before that dreadful night. 'But if I understood correctly, neither of them had actually arrived that night, have they?' 'No, they haven't it, a damn shame as well, we were expecting them to be present upon its release. But a strange thing happened, as I came to realise that they had actually been dead, for a while as well.' 'By dead you mean.' 'Lost, never to be seen, no bodies, missing, that kind of thing but let me tell you this. Every word of advice that you may hear if you get yourself involved in this type of activity. Once you're in, there's no way out and once you've heard about it, it might be too late already.' He got nervous for a moment there, kind of paranoid. He looked around the bar, good bark underneath, warm candles and the curtains had blocked the view outside. But somehow he knew that they would be waiting for him outside to get out. This could very well be his last drink there, not to mention that he'd be lost by the knees as soon as he'd find a way out. They were weak by now, shaking at the thought that he was the last one to know and whoever was looking for him wouldn't be less cruel than it was expected. His beer mug had arrived and he couldn't see where the tongues laid on the top of the clock. Had they stopped moving? It appeared so, especially now, while the fellow looked at him confusedly and tried shaking him as hard as he could. It felt surreal, everything around him seemed to have stopped or slowed down. Only this man who tried getting at him seemed to be listening. But it was late and he excused himself. By the top of the tablet he left a small blank of fifty and excused himself. It was unclear exactly where he went, for he took upstairs and seemed to have lost himself in the place. Without a doubt, this was the only time when one would have to seek as hard as he could, only to find a trace of the man. 'Excuse me, if you will, bartender, but what's upstairs?' 'It's the other lounge.' He smiled a bit, despite him not understanding what he meant by that. Not to mention that he had been intoxicated at large as well, which made him decide he should've taken the bait and followed through. He was by the stairs, without realising that he had already climbed and got there. 'Would this be the other lounge?' He appeared distressed himself when he failed to see the fellow anywhere, but for what it was worth, this did look like what it had been called. Rather empty, with only a few people standing around and waiting. A strange thing as well as there were no other floors above this one and there'd be nothing to rent. The exact purpose had been lost on him, at least by means alone. Behind a counter which stood straight above the one at the bar, there laid a man. He was hard to look at, something was missing and he himself couldn't figure out exactly what. The image of the man was stagnating evil. Something was wrong and he couldn't exactly pin-point what.

Perhaps that wasn't even a man, he saw no arms and no legs after all. Merely serpentine coils dropped from underneath. Could it be that he saw it for what it was then? But wasn't this place where the man who had told his story went? 'Excuse me, if you don't mind, but have you seen a man come this way, a few minutes ago?' There was some time specification there, but that had been completely lost, by the likes alone of which he couldn't be rid off were lost on him. He couldn't stand any longer despite having had only a few drinks. What had they put in there? No answer either from that thing, which only stared and moved inches at time. He could swear on the fact that it had somehow pushed through the counter and walked through it, in the manner of which he needn't any answer at that. He had been touched by it as it went through. By then, he turned and saw the window only to realise what the ruckus outside was for. It was the same man at the bottom, legs twisted and a look of supreme distress on his face. He had been surrounded and covered by a black bag as he had been taken away from sight. But those weren't any kind of men to whom you could look at. Under their hoods they seemed to have scrawny bodies which could be seen as wrapped around by their bears. In their eyes, and that had been important, there was red globes, almost made of red stone which floated instead of their pupils. 'What exactly is going on in here?' He asked himself as he got away, walking on his back, until the point he hit the wall and fell on the stairs. There was another shock that night, following the disappearance case of the man. 'May you rest with us, Brother Martin?' His voice had been deep and it seemed that it crept inside his head. Even though the man had attempted to end his own life, he had been carried by the couple of figures. Not only him either, for they seemed to have arranged with the bartender that he'd be taken as well. The witnesses have been disposed of and there was only one thing which needed to be done forth. Both bodies had been united and brought to the same pointed barrel. It was evenly crossed with metal pins and wrapped from every single side. Until that night, there hadn't been a need to carry bodies at such a risky place, but times had changed. There were those whom they could trust and they weren't going to take kindly what was going everywhere around. But slowly, they had taken both of their bodies underneath the channel, in their underground crypts, smuggled into a place where they couldn't have been disturbed. The flaccid scent seemed to have crept inside the room where the bodies had been stored, but the stench of death was far stronger than it had been expected. Worse than that was the fact that they had thrown away what they wore, revealing their almost starved bodies. What mad force of nature could've kept them in that manner? They looked rather strange, but felt even worse. Humanity was in them no longer, just as well as it could be said of their sanity. Secretive abominations, as they were, this was great. As much as they tried hiding themselves, this was fresh meat, something to be worked on. Both of them were placed on two stone slabs which had lain inside their crypt. It was large enough to hold as many as they pleased themselves with. For them, it had become some kind of game, or rather, a way to taste their many tools. Simple reanimation wasn't enough, at least not for them, knowing that the bodies were still kind of out of order. Neither one would survive, at least not until there was some kind of dire change that could take place. 'Why can't I move my limbs?' One of the sitting corpses said. Whatever happened to him there had been more enough to scare the poor fellow, as he couldn't see, wasn't able to move, no muscle spasms, only his voice and the general feeling of cold seemed to be prevalent. Nothing else appeared to distract him from the fact that he was in a place he didn't enjoy being in, rather than dislike. He had been gripped by the throat and a dire force didn't let go. 'Please, don't choke me, I beg you. Free me, I'll give you my accounts, my apartment' His throat had been filled with some insects and other crawling creatures which lay in dirt. They had fallen from the top of the crypt, the part of which had kicked in.

One more prevalent detail was the fact that some kind of miasma was floating around, accompanied by some colourless mist that crept in every crevice. It had been great for the bones, for it allowed them to grow once again and expand. 'We shall pick you to join us and prove yourself in the hunt. If you are worthy, you shall join us and walk on the plains of darkness for as long as your body remains untouched.' As he spoke, a cold hand entered his body and there seemed to be some kind of process, finally involved. There were a lot of whispers, as if many watched this kind of process in which organs were removed, pieces were replaced, and mostly, the body had been taken care off in the most dreadful manners. The skin dissolved the muscles spasms began before the mass quickly fell apart and crawled on the side. What came after were some kind of secret techniques which have been passed through them from immortal to immortal. A hand-full made of crawling worms inserted directly into his lungs, another one of crawling beetles came into his guts, after which the ball of flies entered his heart. His body quickly decayed from that and blackened, a robe having grown from the inside of his bones and crept out. There was a dreadful need to shout and attempt to flee but that wasn't him any longer. He knelt, this stranger as he said. 'Master, how may I please?' It was great, for he was needed, called upon the plains. He wasn't entirely turned, as this was merely a test to see if he would grasp at his humanity, most of the muscle and skin would grow back in the few hours they needed to prove that he was the right choice. A dreadful tale, it seemed to be, as neither one of them contempt, did see. There was a black trail of smoke coming from the woods, as it became much clearer that they have been waited for the longest hour. Fingers have been cut and crossed on top of the tall oaks, with their nails carved through the most decrepit ways possible. Dreadful, dreadful thing did seem to creep about, in a fashion which did reveal what they have done there. A hut had lain there, on top of the far hill. Its host had been brought down and taken care off before he even had the chance to fight back. It was a shame that he hadn't proven himself as being the one which was needed, but alas, they had something to do. Rulers they would be, and their rule would be regretted.

It was an attempt there, for they looked pale all of the sudden. The only one they had expected had been there, impaled by some kind of device which had thrown a multitude of arrows. Their strength alone shouldn't have been enough, but as one of them approached, he felt at it, just how his hand wriggled in pain. 'It had been touched with blessed water, brothers, this is an affront.' His crooked teeth suddenly appeared yellow under the light of the moon.

There had been a general swoon which seemed to creep into them. Yet neither of them moved from the place. Strangely, it seemed like they had been caught around a small camp, a ditch more likely as it would be called, all confused, standing. Neither of them had been properly taught how to fight, since they were mostly used to bringing down men and converting them into the dreadful things they had become. 'Enough of this, I'll wait no longer to make a move.' A voice, which belonged to a man, did reveal itself. Soon enough, it had been joined by a few others, which had crept around from the shadows and surrounded the gloomy hole in which these abominations had found themselves. Out of them, the most scared of men was the one who had been forced to join them, for he knelt and almost begged not to be killed. 'Get up, you pathetic wretch, there'll be no one to be saved from this slaughter, unless you are a man, which I can clearly see that you are not, I'll make it so you leave.' He had been certainly afraid of it, but refused to get up and put on a fight. It would appear that only they were going to put forth a challenge. Damned peasants, they looked like damned criminals to be brought to the chopping block. It mattered little, at least their deaths would be swift, and for no man could kill one of their own while they were there. 'Before you make a move and fire your crossbow, look into my eyes and see how pointless your actions are. Even those of us which you have killed still reign over the realm of dead.' He rose up from the position he was in, with all the stakes falling off from his body. Despite taking as much punishment as they have forced him to take, there was still the need to walk again. A dreadful horn called from somewhere in the woods as well. 'We should retreat Leor, they're coming.' One man took enough time to say and wager that it wasn't safe any longer there. There were those in the woods who made it hard to follow. Howls of that strength and magnitude made it hard to follow but they were sure there would be danger, for they were no strangers of what it was like. Dread was spread around as one of the crows arrived. It had looked putrid by the looks, missing most feathers, it seemed like a transplant had replaced half its body with that of a rodent while the other bore a single man's eye. It ate at a single thread which looked like some bloody chord and wept while doing so. 'That terrible, terrible one must be in misery.' 'Lower you bow man, there's a far more dangerous threat ahead, and a far worse one coming.' But what could be worse than them? They were dreadful necromancers, reanimators, those whom had defeated death and could walk while being blessed by immortality. Compared to them, there could be no foe, nor any thing of dread which might defy their blessings, of their own kind, less. Though the howls had gotten louder, far stronger and the men had disappeared in a flash. 'Where did those go? Where are they? They were there next to the oaks a short time ago. Find them so we may begin the ritual of hunt and you, pitiful scum, get back on your feet and travel, we're yet to make you one of us.' Despite being as late as it were, they continued through the woods and came to their most dreadful encounter. It was worse than what they had expected, as the ones who had revealed themselves were no wolves but bore their heads and trophies. What they did was only a poor imitation of a howl while they bore their heads with their long arms. Their bodies were thick and strong, almost chiselled in the pale light. From them came some sort of tail on which they walked, but underneath there could be heard the sound of feet. Even as the wolf heads bounced on the ground, it had been revealed that their arms had no hands, from inside of the apparent holes coming out what looked like long paired thin hooves that pushed tiny stings at each end. Despite their almond shaped pairs of eyes, they could see more than well and went on the hunt. A hive-like notion was in them and seemed to bear to the transmission of signs from one another through various pheromones. 'Stand still, I think they might avoid us if they think we're dead.' There came the silence after the need to avoid being caught. It seemed a bit unnecessary, as to look back at it, but better than nothing, as one would presume. A strange night indeed, as they had pressed on and only when they had gotten closer, did they notice where the men had gone. Damned two legged blistering taints, they had climbed on top of trees and seemed to bear only the deadliest smile that could be had. Wicked just as well, they would now get to see two of the pests eat each other in their benign attempt to get rid of the corruption which had spread around the forest. 'Don't do it, we can leave and promise never to return. There need to be another way, one that's fair.' Plenty of the men had smiled and only shook their heads. Those pests had stopped and only seemed to scan the area for some kind of compromise, making the entire encounter kind of strangely aghast. But they had made one dire mistake, which had suddenly turned the tables, while the pests had come closer, they were afraid of those robed starved men, and kept their distance. But one breaking point had aggravated them, when they had to force their hands. Small rocks and branched had been thrown in a pitiful attempt to make them attack. It was infuriating, at least from their point of view, where every insignificant change seemed to produce a sound which had been quickly absorbed in their blocked heads. They turned their heads above and started climbing. 'The turns have changed, it would seem, make sure you watch and learn, for we may deal with their likes sooner or later.' The leader had spoken, his knees had been broken, but it appeared as if he could still walk. All that waiting made him feel dead, but this had to be an exception, for it was no sooner that he saw the fight, one arrow didn't go straight against them, but had went through his skull. Four more followed from different sides and brought him down. 'Bring them down, now!' Below, they moved with their robes, almost floating through the air and started ripping wood apart with their claws. There wasn't any chance that the men would survive, either they would be killed by those ghastly bags of bones and wicked hair, or by the trophy collectors. A man had shouted. 'Please, it hurts, let go of me!' His agony had been shouted and echoed throughout the night. Apparently one of them had been fast enough to grab one of the men and spread him apart, straight from the groin and enter him. The substance inside had made them both one being for enough time that it would return to its hive and as he fell, his fellow men could see only his back as he struggled to get away from a many legged-serpent tail which had been protected. Though no one spared arrows for him, as no one wanted to share their fates with him. They have been caught there with no chance of return. As the wicked old corpses came, finally in their hands again, they started ripping, started chewing. There'd be nothing else to get from swooning. In their minds there was less of a fight going on, as their thoughts were clear and needed to be done wasn't farther away. Once one of the oaks had fallen, with the men and the fiends, one of them had broken legs, while the pest had bashed its head. Quickly as one noticed, two or three who lay on the ground, stated pulling their own kin apart, right before jumping to the man. Both would be taken to their hive-minded den. 'It would seem like there's nothing to them here, just lambs for slaughter who got pulled in something they did not belong into. To think these children threatened to kill us in our own realm, in a place of our own control.' He laughed as he stroked his inside tracts, the pulmonary one especially, or what was left of it, alas. Both the men and the pests had stopped, now that they were at each other's throats, there was nothing else to do. 'You may stop chewing and ripping, I think they can handle what's going on up there. We may be needed somewhere else, at least through some place where we may be useful for once.' Most gritted their teeth but came through the wood running. They moved like dark shades, observing everything around them, from the most sudden movement to the strongest foe around. And in their travel they have found a place where there had been a great fire. Corpses had been burnt, in the mid-way of the woods. Judging by the distant marking which had been left on the rocks, there had been a ritual. But of which kind was it? 'Is this the work of a witch?' He wondered but looked less surprised, the moment he observed the small cut inside one of the cinder-licked bodies. One of his fingers ran across as he noticed an opening above the corpse which lay atop of the others. 'Hold me as I explore inside of it. But spare your eyes, for I may look alone. No, not you, I want the fresh one to come and grab a hold of my chains, as he's yet to prove us what he's capable of. A mere test of strength shouldn't do.' For which he came and seemed to check. There were large chains attached around hands, which seemed to be made of iron. Holding them alone hurt his hands, more than it would hurt them now that they couldn't feel pain any longer. The pressure was slowly pushing stronger from inside, and finally the heat had burst to blisters. Even being partially dead hadn't spared him from being affected by the things which bothered the physical realm. He was still a man after all, growing his muscles and skin back. 'Hold still I said, you come were as well. I'll try not going far.' He only wanted to look inside. As for what had laid in there, he seemed to have thrown a look where his broken red rocks didn't belong into. He had managed to see how it had spread all over the molten rock which flooded the place. It wasn't safe to stand there for long, at least not from the reaction, he would at least risk getting fire. But the place was nothing he had ever seen. The fires weren't just blasting away, they seemed to reign freely in there, to the point of moving inside it, as if they were made of actual blood, floating inside the body. And the place, as well, followed a clear pattern which was similar with the insides of a human being. 'Dreadful ritual, what have they done to you my dear? It looks like you've been robbed of all you had to offer.' There had been scrapped objects in the building, but that had seemed to have been taken away. Whatever was in their mass, whoever came to own those things had to be aware of the unnatural aspect they had, even for their own world. 'Pull me back, I think I've been enough.'

Immediately, without much wait, he had been taken to the point where he stood there watching over the corpses. Pushing one to the side, he took it to himself to make a cut, while the others formed half of a circle around him and stood watch. Someone, whoever was here would return sooner or later to reclaim what had been lost to them. As the next body had been opened, it seemed like this one was empty. The burning round mounds of flesh could be seen there, pumping and trashing at bay. He had to have them, and this time he reached. As he took each organ by the hand, he had become mad, seeing them just turn to red dust in his hands. 'Useless, they are all useless. They've been made to be as useless as they could.' His tainted heart almost shattered as he looked at his hand. It seemed like a dream then, one of which had only begun. Now all of the sudden, it hadn't mattered whether or not they'd be together. The human had to go, as he didn't belong there with them. 'I shall take my gifts back, even though I don't need them any longer.' The words of which had made everyone turn around and look at him. He was quick to push with his new red-like rock-encased hand and penetrate through his veil and sickly looking body. By the side fell the balls of flies, beetles and worms. As a matter of fact they had been crushed, while the remaining ones were left there to rot. The man had lost the glimpse of his life and died, leaving them there alone with the spoils. 'Look, brothers.'

He finally continued. For this was a moment soon to be remembered. From this point alone they wouldn't be touched by anything which may harm them or even bring them near the damned gate. They each pulled from the insides and started coating themselves entirely with that sand. What walked now were the living statues, encased in their red forms, walking through the woods unnerved. 'Wait, what of that? We cannot leave them behind.' Someone would use that pile of corpses if it wasn't late enough. 'What do you propose we do then?' After a quick deliberation, so it seemed that the only way to get rid of it was to break one of the corpses apart and encase the pile as well in their red prison. As they went on, their hands ripped too quickly at a body, unexpectedly so. The red dust particles appeared to have spread and wrapped themselves around corpses, growing into the sharp mass of crystals. 'Get away from it, unless you want to be imprisoned in there.' As they ran, they looked behind only to notice what had been going around. A part of the forest had imploded into a mass of red crystals, straight from the point where it had detonated. It had been thoroughly spread across the dirt plate, to the point where they couldn't have known what the extent had been. It bore enough height nonetheless to take anyone by surprise, in the fact that there wasn't a man from inside the city who wouldn't see the red mountain top which had come from the woods, in the middle of the night. 'We flee back to our place.' 'Look, there was another corpse which had been spared. What of it?' 'Bring it with us, so it may serve us well enough. That we may be able to coat our crypt and bear it as it once was. We may extend our rule over it and expand, below and underground. Who shall stop of us then?' He wondered as they have picked up the body and marched towards the point where they would return. It looked like an awful sight, as the corpses which they had gathered still lay inside. There was little to no choice any longer, to the point where they had to pick one or the other. Would they seal the corpses as statues inside their crypt? 'Let them be stored there, as a reminder of what had been and how we had acted. No one would dare approach us in the most peculiar manner, no one would know as well.' With that he slammed the corpse and saw it spread, devouring like a virus and spreading across the stone floor, walls and ceilings. Not even the bodies in their places had been spared. As for the reach, once the body had been crushed, it seemed like there were openings from which dirt had been left unaffected. Through those there'd come the expansion, but for now, they seemed caught by it. To have looked like they were in a crypt of red jewels was magnificent. Their greed had overcome them this day. Such wretched creatures were impressed by the shiny objects and by their own reflections in their crimson crypt. It would be their prison, from now, as their desires faded and nothing caught on, as they were dissuaded from leaving their home. In the woods though, the men had suffered the wretched demise. Caught around their bodies, wrapped around and soon to be used as nothing more but food for the pest was vile and unnerving to think about. 'Wurr, can you hear me? I can't seem to feel my legs, neither can my arms move any longer. What's happening?' 'Stay strong, brother, stay strong.' Though he himself was greatly in pain, he couldn't move nor could he be anything else but tainted. They had all become wretched and seemed to have lost some of their awareness as they have entered their hive. No opening lay outside, only soft moving dirt that was their secret. Most of them were moving through funnels of dirt, creeping inside until they had arrived. It was a long journey but the change of pace had happened. Some of the men had the strange sensation that they had been transported to another world, through some portal which lay hidden beneath the ground. But how could they comprehend such a thing, if it weren't for the fact that it was just another damned feeling? 'Are we going to be eaten now?' Most of them seemed to ask themselves the same question, even though no clear answer laid aside. They were mostly shaking and afraid. Each one of the tubes they now went lead to a different cold part of their colony. Workers lay around, scraping at what seemed to be some kind of ore, shaping the halls even more. These new hybrids appeared to have kept most of their human intelligence while going on to keep the lower strength of the pest form. Clear differences between them and the workers could be seen. As it was clear that they didn't hide their legs behind covers of tails, but rather had them displayed. At least some of the workers there bore a connection, one of which felt human, under their many layers of carapace. He hid his sight unlike the others who observed the newcomers and the procedure which followed. They were to be taken to the chamber of creation, where they'd be taken care of before resuming their activities. 'I can't see well, where are you Wurr?' He attempted to get to him, but that came to no avail. Each of them, as far as twenty men had been salvaged mostly if not entirely alive, kept so by their strange biological concoction in their bodies which ran ever so bluntly that they could even revive their brains hours after their own deaths. Regardless of how much of their minds were gone, there was still hope for them to serve. Alas, there came the room from which their new lives would begin. At least half of the room had been raised up to their knees. On the floor there were at least, what appeared to be multiple corpses waiting for this process to begin. From the top came the long high-precision tools which would cut every piece and help reform their bodies into what was right for them. Not only would they be hybrids but this would seemingly be for as long as they would last. 'I don't think there might be a chance for us to be human again.' Though there was no one around to share this thought with. From this point on, he was alone, with little knowledge of what might happen with him or those after. As soon as the liquid came, he felt something darkening around his eyes. Something had gone wrong. Perhaps the colony had been under distress. But their blue and pale halls had been covered by some kind of dark moss which had spread. It grew it stone, which made it even harder to shatter. Those mindless slaves were growing inside the ground, becoming some kind of living plants. Most couldn't even reach a point where they could cut themselves free and those whom could, rather stopped. As the intensity of the pain seemed to have mastered the mindless beings, the organic machine with its many limbs had fallen and crushed the man. To say the least, he had remained alive, broken as he was, kept alive but in the dark. One dreadful thing which had fallen there, far above their underground realm, had been some kind of star of dark. Filled with the essence of a vile space, the outside of which, emptiness would be its realm. From it came evil, from it came dread, but those around it could never lay dead. It had been a curse to live and one to watch. Vile one, one that wouldn't be able to track himself from a realm of dread, he opened the door and came there. For, he was pulled towards the essence of a star. The armoured eight-limbed creature with its rounded head, it came to be called from its dreaded hiding. It came up riding on its dark disc, strolling through that tainted world, as slowly as it could. For the world had become dangerous, the sky greyed, the ground blackened, in peril of being tainted and remaining so, it stood there for as long as it could, unable to lift itself back to where it should be. Oh star, you call me at this hour and want me to dread, better yet, I'm weary when you'll be utmost dead. He was late, as he stepped out of his disc. From under the hood it wore, a twisted head revealed a pair of eyes on each side, most of which extended inside the helmet and appeared to peer closely at the star. Already it had become obvious that more than plenty of the tainted beings had come to worship the star. It was tasteless but they followed through. Each of them whom came in distress appeared to have taken to themselves the fact that they needed to mourn their losses, be alone. 'I have arrived as well.' It spoke in its own tongue. No one else appeared to bother, other than a kneeling one, whom bore a large engraved blue coloured torso, with golden inscriptions on the side. It wore the decorated armour with pride, from which a pair of wings which belong to some kind of sickly crafted creature stood as its crest. Its limbs were thin, almost as thin as one could be to wear the armour, and it seemed to encompass its entire body, other than its thick and long neck, from which emerged a tiny rounded face. A mask bore on it, some kind of wavy metal which had cuts on every side and pushed forward. It seemed strange that it would move that quickly for one so thin and heavy, especially since its pale gray skin made it look sick, but it had wrapped itself near. Not on him but it gave the impression it looked for something and nothing was off. 'You may join.' It said in its own language. As peculiar as it appeared to be, there was nothing deranged in the fact that it spoke with its hands mostly and it understood. There had been something near to it being untrustworthy, but it chose to follow. Henceforth it looked. Another dark being there, bearing some kind of silk, two heads emerged, which were blocked in place as if they had been made of metal, their tops were as flat as they were shaped as triangles. From the bottom to the very top, it looked as if everything twisted in the most dreadful manner, which pushed forward from a spine that couldn't be held inside the armour. Only one eye on each head, and one would have to ask them whether or not those things were pillars or rather only dreadful blades which had pierced a body. Other worshippers wore cowls and hid themselves from sight. It was time, now that it started pulsating. Soon enough, they all came to understand exactly why they were there, the main reason being the pool which had been expelled from inside the star of dark. It felt messy but everyone drank from it, including himself. What prevented the others from having too much of it was the fact that they would feel the rest of it slipping from their mouths and through their hands, like living pieces of shadow which returned to their source. From this point, it almost appeared to be done. Everyone had been mesmerised and looked inside the star, the globe, the sphere from which came all that was dark. It was empty there, far too empty, and spread around a mass which wouldn't end until going as far away as it could. They saw through the fields of spores and the bottomless pits which bore themselves far enough. What lay at the bottom there and what would be formed appeared to have been pulled inside tall blocks which only brought the promise of some kind of structural change down there which was never to come. Most of its surroundings seemed to have been caught in the trap of being out there, looked upon in plain view. There was no hope for one to come and build and even less hope for one to attempt. They weren't making progress standing and trying to guess what was going on down there. 'We should try to find that place and claim it as our own.' One said. The facial expressions which sprouted were a dead giveaway of his desires. They all appeared to be caught by the images which followed, farther inside the veil. It seemed like it had been only one layer which hid away the true gem of those depths. Underneath there was the world, where there were countless beings like them. All of which were very much alive, moving freely and active, colossal in their size, they moved into their strange structures, which had to have been created by them. It was dreadful to look at it, as every sight was damning. More so, one could look and see, without a piece of doubt that there was terror down there. The likes of lesser beings, which hid from sight, tried not getting crushed beneath their giant feet. One dreadful thing appeared to bore toward the pain. But their primordial sight was only an intrusion and the vision seemed to have gone. What remained of the star of dark now sunk into the pull while it waited for everyone there to drink their share for one last time. It was an approach of dread, it couldn't be fair, but as far as they had been together in this share of sight, they would walk together towards the end. 'So will the company be formed.' It was said by one of the wicked fighters, bearing a small pair of strange looking needles. The path ahead was dark, they moved through the night, caught only by their worst of needs. Pain couldn't have been more pure than it had been there, when one looked mightily surprised, caught by some sort of demise. It wasn't even certain what was going to happen from them, but finally they had arrived. Like a company of barbarians, though their origin laid benign. Where have they arrived on foot? If not the part of the city which had been in the dark, the wicked and the mad, that's where they arrived. Even so, they weren't greeted but treated as some kind of strange apparitions, by those whom had remained awake. There'd be no other explanation for the dread they felt and the strangeness at hand. Most were soulless, speechless, and rather morbidly into hunting the likes of men. As soon as the first had come, the sacking had begun. 'Waste no time with them, we're in for something grander.' But the words appeared to have wasted, as each dreadful one entered a house and appeared to have started everything which could go wrong. Their arrival signalled for something which had gone wrong, more so about something which couldn't be avoided any longer. As the wicked crystal fiends have been called from their crypt, and those wicked creatures arrived from their hiding spots, it appeared that there was no return from it. Carriers of disease, those whom cleansed the land appeared to be at some kind of distress now, as it came to no surprise. The whole city had been under siege, as the twins revived, men woke up. 'What's happening? Fire, is that fire?' On the streets, it had already begun as soon as the fire spread from whoever knows which Abyss might've thought off. No longer would they stay behind, as the creatures boiled and burst through the doors, trying to creep in some more. Children went missing, those people went shouting, and instead of trying to be sane, it was time for everything to crumble. The darkness was shallow, but that was a sign that there'd be no tomorrow. Not for them in any kind of way. 'Dreadful beings what have you done? You spread your wickedness and now you'll be gone.' Said a peculiar looking creature as the boils of the ground had finally come to burst. From the inside came the wretched gas. While men were sacked and fought back, it seemed like there'd be no way to come to be, to an age which had long passed, unable to flee. Their arrival was destined and no realm was safe. Even those trapped in their realms would fall victim to the dreadful gas which spared no one, not even the ones who hid themselves. Right in time as the last of the sacrifices had been pulled inside the vessel. There was nought for it but to cruelly deal with what was done there. A way of saying there'd be no one to miss them once they were done with. The most satisfying thing of all was the fact that they were dreadfully, all and all, caught into their own trapped. Another set of kidnapped men, those of which would be fed. It was almost as if they were controlled, unable to refuse what was going on. But inside the world, nonetheless, the colossal towers came, from inside their restless holds, this time stronger, faster, old. As ancient as they were, they crushed and curled around like a disease, everything around them bursting in tremors, fiends were dead. No man had been alive for far too long once he came into contact with the gas, the likes of which had no escape. Now the twins, who went through things, they ran away and tried to cope their way. Somehow they had been brought, only to be killed for one last time, as everyone suspected that this way of being cleansed was nothing but a ruse, a way of taking care of loose ends. The sky had darkened in the sense that most of it had been swallowed by the far ends of worlds and seemed to be caught into the endless expulsion of gas. That had become the embodiment of toxin and seemed to have no trouble as the rain began. And as it had, the water was grim and yellow, bringing nothing but pain and misery as it came into contact with flesh. 'Get under cover, quickly, quickly I say.' Which was a shout, an order and they listened to its dark command. The man had looked around and determined for the fairest time that it was safe to stay but thought look away. As the lightning flashed in the sky, the yellow flashed burned through it and for a moment they all felt that they were ready to die. The whole ground appeared to have been shaken, if he wasn't in the least mistaken. A dreadful need came to him, for he forgot, even though the streets were cornered and lost in place. He could see nothing, not a hand nor a face. In hindsight, he was all alone, being lonely and prone to mistakes. Just as soon as he could handle his own, he looked away and saw a piece of his soul. It felt as if he had been blinded in an eye, looking widely around, in order to see what was going on. Of his mind was the fact that he couldn't take his gaze away, being caught by that of which had seemed to dance. Mad spirits, wild apparitions appeared and brought nothing to him but distraught. 'I know you, sir, I've seen you before.' The man said as he covered his normal eye. Mostly, around the streets, he could see that it was safe to be, near them at least. Nothing could've been clearer to him now, as a matter of fact, he felt dread and fear, knowing that death would be near. Some kind of fear appeared to be grasping his soul and mind that of which remained, he grasped and held it behind. At least now, most of it had been gone, but he managed to keep a piece of it inside. Seeing it darken wasn't right, nor was the rain as it had through his body after coming in the middle of the street. 'Look at me, there's no need to be confused. I'm still a man caught in this world, I'm alive.' 'Not for long.' The vile voice reminded him. It had done much to bring him the thought of trying, wagering against the dreadful one. The creeping thing seemed to catch on. It hadn't felt as if there was any kind of woe or despair, as he broke apart, the man had turned into a pool. He stood too much in the rain and felt as if he could droll. Far too late, for he had thought of being released, but his soul had stuck inside of it, laughed at by the vile apparitions. Women as well as men ogled at the one who had gone mad and ran into the rain. Nothing could've gone worse, until the second one came, from the farthest side of the city. It alarmed everyone in the area that they could be caught into this sea of despair, for which there was nothing but dread. One could look away and keep the likes of fighting to him. More than that, there were those of who desired less, cutthroats whom would try getting at their own kind, leaving others caught in their own demise. Some were blinded, while others were caught in their own traps, seemingly obscure and unaware of what was happening around them. Most of what was thought, little which had been brought to the obscure thing. Alas, there was a dreadful being, one which would creep around, the fiend. Ogling despite not being what they used to be, there came the train from the other side. The passengers were unaware of the on-going mastery of wicked flies. As they followed from above, made way from whoever knows what hive or nest. 'What's that? Why had our train stopped?' It was something which wouldn't be answered to the lady of Ilchon, as she seemed to be speechless at the fact that a rounded man had appeared from below the rails and somehow entered the train. 'Demon, there's a demon, vile creature, fiend, pervert.' She screamed as he seemed to grasp with his own great hand around the pearls around her neck, with a smile which encompassed both sides of his face. If there could be a happier man, it couldn't rival him or his brother. 'Sit down before I make make you.' He slurred as he came to his feet, having pushed the table away in the small cabin there. It was nerve wrecking, at least from his point of view, as they were too shocked to be properly robbed blind. 'At least my brother could have the decency to ask before taking, perhaps I should try doing it his way the next time.' The thought alone made him grin even wider. Two of the other passengers inside the tightly sealed room he was in appeared to have been twins as well. Younger, which brought them to the age of something he could place near fifteen years old, a good age all and all. He could remember the time he was their age, going inside various places with his brother, those two scoundrels. Their exploits were diving while they were young, but not as much any longer. It came to his mind that he'd be taken for someone frightening. 'No need to be scared, children, I won't do any harm to you nor to the lady as I only came here to collect.' 'What's going on out there?' He took a break before adding. 'Only if you'd be willing to answer me, my sister is quite unaware.' He overlooked her as well as the cabinet atop the space where the luggage laid. He could almost sell the jewelry through which laid inside the leather bags, which meant that there was nothing which stopped him, other than the noise. The old lady and the children stopped looking through. Some sort of twisted yellow floating mass seemed to have found its way inside the train as well. It came by normal means and appeared to creep inside every corner and spread pieces of itself inside every cabin, overcoming them in little to no time. Without any hesitation, he grabbed a bag and shoved it through the lock, right before it could arrive. 'That should do you, lousy thing that you are.' It stopped and caught itself quite low, stopping there for a chance to bypass his entry and come inside. Everyone was silent, but they knew that if something were to happen, it would go down there, near the lock, when no one was watching. He could feel it trying to push itself through the cracks and prick some of the material in order to get in. As much as they endured, there wasn't any telling whether or not they were going to fall apart, at least if it were to enter. 'Hold on, I think it's leaving.' Their thoughts were all set on it, whether or not they could foresee something akin to it, there wasn't any telling. It went on like this for a few seconds before it moved on, though nothing looked right. He had looked in the same direction he had known his brother to be, but knowingly refused to warn him since he knew he'd be prepared. As it happened, his door was closed and blocked off from the simple thing which wanted to get through. The same couldn't be said about the others who had suffered from the intrusion. It came as no surprise that there was no survivor there and instead of what was expected to be found in their various places, their small chambers were filled with that obnoxious yellow thing which had grown itself inside it. 'This mad thing wanted to grow itself inside, hasn't it?' There was some questioning involved there, mostly by himself for himself, but little mattered. More importantly was the fact that he was afraid of any other type of contact, especially with those around him, which prompted him to face the only immediate action he could think off. 'Wait, those aren't yours, my necklace.' She paused before she could even get up. It was something inevitable that she would be confronted by the heavy man, who had apparently saved them but refused to give any of what was his. 'Let's consider this payment for now, for we both know there'll be no need for this if you or those children get caught. What had he said? What was the mistake he had done? In a moment she was with him, while the other had her fainting. 'Aunt Wrynn passes out frequently when it comes to stressful encounters and I think you gave her more than enough, sir.' He turned at the child for only one second before peering through the window. There was a short distance to get around to the ground and one could make it just well enough if he were only to jump. And there wasn't any time as they had noticed. Whatever happened in the cabin just around the next few steps wasn't supposed to be any helpful or showed any sign that it would somehow retreat. It grew bigger as it pushed the metal walls in every direction possible, even cutting through with what seemed to be large conical, sharp blocky needle. There was a short break there, where they had to make a choice in order to get through and escape, for as long as the world had. 'You'll have to jump through the window and make a run for it kids.' 'We cannot leave without our aunt, mister.' 'She wouldn't abandon us if he were in our place.' Said the boy as he held his chin up and came to the same conclusion. It was an awful thing to do but he gave them no chance. With a strongly clenched fist, he broke the window, grabbed the old lady and threw it off. That mistake seemed to have caught on, as she only turned to wakefulness only during her mid-flight before reaching down and staying in the mid-crawl pose. Nothing came out of her either, as it turned out that she wasn't moving any longer. 'What have you done to our aunt?' Her neck was shrewd on the wrong side and it seemed that there was little which might come out of it. They were reluctant but were threatened into it, just as soon as he had heard another cabin blow. Despite being in tears, it wasn't as if they had any other chance of escape, henceforth, it had to be the obvious thing which had been picked. 'Either do it on your own or I shall throw you as I have with your aunt. Do not make me go through this again, as this may be your only chance to escape, now leave!' The children obeyed and had a rough landing. Both of them survived. By the time he was done search, he had passed through the wall and found his brother entertaining a bunch of corpses which had already taken off. 'Shots, it might've been quick but I suspect they knew something about it that the others hadn't.' A double suicide by the looks of it both had been reluctant to continue their existence there. At least, from the looks of which, it had been more than a mess, there had been something wrong involved in it. He had looked around, the train was being brought down. Could it have been the weight or another factor? But one thing had brought it clear, with it being the bridge on which the train rested, that had been weakened by something before having felt the resurgence of movement. It might've been the mere pressure which had been pushed there, or some kind of tectonic movement which instead of doing anything right, it had made a vacuum right under the bridge, pulling everything inside. 'We should leave as well. I don't think it's safe being here any longer.' This thought not only remained prevalent, but for once it seemed to be consistently bothering both of them there. In only a moment's notice, their fates had been shifted to being uncalled for and unnamed. Something had indeed grabbed a hold of the train and started pulling it down. That was quite impossible to say to disprove since they had the evidence straight in front of their eyes. A damning amount of evidence as well, as anyone sane could tell. Dreadful things that they were, one escaped only to watch the hiatus going around the world. There'd be no return. Shouts began to pour, even the nastiest, hidden caves weren't safe, where tribesmen dwelled but couldn't tell the difference between what was normal and what shouldn't have happened. Fire, light was in their eyes. An explosion below the growth had engulfed them and pushed them to a dreadful death, a sparing thing which they wouldn't forget. Obvious blisters and melted skin, they were pulled aside, the evil grin. It bore through them relentlessly watching, peering, without even a chance to retreat. The world had been laid under their feet. Above, in the outside world, it was already late, as eight of them had taken the chance, they came and moved, without a dance. Buildings cracked and many suffered, in the end, none of those even thought about the supper. The small group of crystal withered corpses moved on as if they were unaffected by any of what was going on outside. Soon they spread and touched and scraped, they cut and managed to impale those around them. Dry as they were, men of dread, ready to be kind of fed with what was left in their surroundings. 'Let go of me, please.' 'Shout louder woman, for I shall be your doom.' One of them had been bold, as he approached and managed to grab a woman off her colony. They had run at his sight, one man alone was with him on the same street. It looked worse than ever, with the blooming sky which had been dark, the wet floor, and the overflowing sewers. Those were only some of the things which had ruined the view, other than the woman. Her knees had been taken care of, as for the fact that there wasn't any way to save her any longer. The man had worn his overalls, his blue coat, his many pins were bloody, and his face had been scared from some previous encounter or an accident. Something sharp at least, by the likes of which, it had scared him well. His pants were covered in dirty, he had been running through the nearest field. Most likely that's where he was planning on taking her if he survived them. But he had missed an important detail about him, one which was now hard not to notice. He carried a small calibre with him, straight to his trousers, it had lain hidden until it was time, and he had noticed that the withered corpse had taken a few steps forward, grasping its claws and readying itself to approach. 'Don't take any step forward, I'm warning you. I don't know what you are but I think I can shatter you.' 'Many have tried before you, but this isn't going to end well for thee. What if your weapon fails? I shall not come for you first but return to the young lady and have my way until she's completely used. But for her sake alone, I'll give you a chance.' In his arrogance, he had never tested nor could he have known whether or not it was possible for him to actually be harmed by a firearm. But what was there to lose? Even he himself knew that there'd be no escaping from what was going in there. But what was that? One of the doors, it was close to him. The man had been distracted, perhaps he didn't seem to care much about it. Some dreadful thing had come to pass between the two of them there, as a man who spent most of his time being caught in his own near-sightedness. It had to be a lucky shot. The cold was there but he didn't see it. 'Perhaps I'll just.' Too late for his words were spat. Below the ground there was a mixture of black blood and a substance similar to ruby. This armour wasn't resistant to metal, nor had it kept his body dead. 'No, this can't be, I can feel pain, I bleed. I'm sickened!' Two shots had managed to get through his skull and one in the lower abdomen area. Despite that, he moved like a spectre in order to avoid the rest of the shots which would've put an end to him and crept behind the door. It was cold and snowing, hard to see, but he took it, instead of trying to die out there. As it closed, he didn't appear to bother much, other than pointing his gun at the door the thing had gone and seemingly waited there for a moment or two. 'Can you walk or do I have to carry you? Please, I need you to be strong here, we won't be able to make it far if you keep crying and be reluctant to me.' She had strained joints which almost appeared to be broken. It wasn't even fair that she would suffer through this but that's what happened. He was there. 'I think I can walk through this but....' 'With my help, don't worry about it, I'll.' He was taken by surprise there, for moment, he almost stared at a cold spectre, crystallised and encased in light blue. There wasn't anything which might be less degrading than the image of the two of them, trying to go through the field. It wasn't even safe any longer, as the robed men had come and overlooked what happened. 'Look, brothers, there are two souls which be fleeing, we should make sure they're prepared to face the consequences of their actions.' It was fair enough that they were give a great chance to run, but nothing could've made up for what would follow them through the field. The rain didn't even seem to mind the fire, as a fact, it appeared to even make burn even brighter at time, giving the impression that there was some kind of flammable drop every now and then. But without the confirmation, there was no time to argue. 'Do it then, blaze the fields and let him squirm if he wants to drag the dead weight. I know where the field ends, follow me brothers.' The fire blazed and soon there'd be no escape. But it had come to the attention of a dire being to which there'd be no end. It moved heedlessly and had only taken some of the scent through the hole in his throat. Mad son of a headless goat, they looked surprised, half man and that. It moved in strange patterns and seemed to have just arrived, bearing some kind of long veins from its arms and by long, they were as thick is not thicker than ropes and even longer if they lead below. Some peculiar sounds came from its trap, but there wasn't even a chance to creep and snap. Dreadful sounds came to be, there wasn't even a place of it to be. 'Another one of those, do you think it could hear us?' 'I don't know but keep silent until it leaves.' The loose pieces at the end of its long serpentine meat chains appeared to have the same discoloured look they all had, at least until it came into what might be referred to as being light. It came as no surprise that their dreadful leader would destroy, everything at hand, including all of their wicked meat toys. 'Worry not for I can hear you just well.' He responded as quickly as he could, making sure all nine of them would hear. There was only an adult with them, the rest being somewhat unable to comprehend what was going in there. But he had come there with a reason, which was soon to be made clear. Most of them appeared to fear him even from the first seconds which had been spent around. There was also a strange attraction which they felt. It wasn't that often that you'd see something like this and get to interact with it. 'Look, there are more of them, around the spot.' A band of scoundrels seemed ready to pounce, the likes of it wasn't even determined at that. That of which they bore crept inside their skulls, small knives and arrow heads, something which shouldn't lie between them, all of which was chained to the ground. From the moment they approached, the children seem to cower, the beast stood like a tower, only having its legs to stand on and nothing else. There was some fright, but there was also the might, which would run loose. First step came, and it had ended. Despite the fact that they wouldn't have been much of a match, the little men with their tiny elongated features that were spread in very direction, they had served their purpose. A mad flash came and seemed to have overcome at least a third of each of their bodies, instantly assimilating them in the metal which had shown itself. Quite contrary, as it happened for it to be crept by the nodes, there was a rounded object which seemed to have to entry. Only a number flashed in front of it, going down at a slow rate as well. 'Don't go near it Bo, come back before they show up again.' 'Give me a second now, I need to see what that is.' He appeared to have been surprised but without the confirmation, his face was shocked. It was indeed what he had expected, for a kid of his age, he would've been close to being called smart otherwise. If only the circumstances were different. But he supposed they all had to be told sooner or later. 'It's a bomb, I think. I've read about them in one of the history books you gave us Miss Clive.' The initial shock was nothing compared to the outburst that followed the realisation that the clock was ticking. 'We need to.' She took a minute to take it in. After looking at herself and the children around her, she noticed the discoloration, the droopy eyes, and the sweat which had accumulated over. She had known for some time that it had become had to breathe, but hadn't expected anything to come out of it. 'If you wish to escape, there's only one way, which may be to take your chances down there, for which there begs to be one entryway. Lower yourselves and touch my arms, for as long as you hold them there, you shall at least know the right where to which to go. Worry not of danger, for no one would touch you as long as you remain in sight of my bearings.' 'Why are you helping us?' 'I'm only helping myself, for my arms had grown numb and I can't move them. As long as you can squeeze around my muscles, I might have a chance to get through. I beg of thee, this might be my only chance to be set free from the burden which lay below.' It hadn't acted in much of an aggressive manner, but could it be trusted? There wasn't any chance it could be. No, don't listen to him, he's not human. It can only bring you harm if you bring them down there, they'll all die. There was a chance at least this way, without doubt, she decided to concede and give up any other attempt to get through. It had been irresponsible for her to try doing anything as harmful as that was. What was mostly disturbing would've pressed on through the vapours around them, numbing what was left of them, but it said it couldn't be affected. Her mind was more than twisted, in a way, it might've been true enough about the toxins in air, as, without realisation, she was already down there, guiding the children slowly, one by one, as they held on those metal bars which had been its stumps. It felt strange and demeaning, but at least there was no death there. 'Teacher, I don't feel that great.' One of her children seemed to have noticed the effects, but was that what it was? Could it be that she had felt something else? Perhaps it was time for her to inquire about what was going on rather than go on a limb. 'What's wrong honey, what's going on?' She tried her best turning around but something wasn't right. It could be noted in her expression and in theirs as well. Everyone appeared to have bore the same thing as they looked behind. Despite going down the stairs for who knows how long, there wasn't any progress which had been made. They have been there for hours, taking each step, only to find them stuck so near to where they started. But how could that be? It wasn't clear yet, but there was another thing which seemed to bother her. 'Alsea, please remove your hands for a moment, I need to check for something.' The girl struggled to move even the slightest finger, but she hadn't managed to move a thing. It appeared like they were moving again, since they were attached to some kind of extra layer which covered the long meat extension they were tied to. It bothered both, as they were silent. Most of the children would become unnerved and scream over the few minutes they would spend together. Such fairness in the trade, they were broken apart and used as fuel for it to escape. That was the deal, and it had come as being far too long before anything came of it. Now, they were a part of it, broken apart as their bodies were being converted into digestible enzymes. Children she had come to know and love had become mindless walked, handless as they were connected by stumps. It was hard to watch for she, knowing that she would keep her mind for long enough to see them become nothing but small connections, bridges which would allow for proper support in order to pull them out. There, the headless one walked freely, dragging its long arms, which were as heavy and armoured as one could have. Another layer stood outside, which had been as sturdy as iron and just as long lasting. Weren't those things supposed to be straight? 'Look at the scrapers, the towers, the moulds.' One man shouted as he pointed at the buildings which had come to pass, there was something which could be just as unexplainable about their appearance in terms of being rather bizarre. Everything around had changed again, they couldn't see well, the land was strange. All of the sudden, the buildings had been given life, during the pandemonium, there was a rather strange device, which had been grim. Neither man nor foe could explain the woe, as some had sharpened their tops and stretched, impaling some of the nearest being in order to devour. The smaller ones were easy prey, they couldn't fight back nor could they outrun the dampness which had spread around. It wasn't easy not to look around the ground and not notice the signs of the fight. But those had meant nothing compared to the destruction the giants had brought, from their undergrowth, all the spores had come and darkened through the coming plague. They spread diseases around and killed mostly what lay in town. Their magnificence finally came, and bred and pushed forth open the gates from the dark below to crawl in. Soon, the streets had blackened and had become just as harrowing to be in as the ones below them. As for the call of distress? Their shouts had been carried on by the warranted winds and had been missed. It came as no surprise that no one would be alive, no one walking on the streets, at least no one who was human any longer. In the police station, there were some that were spared. It would be unfair to say that all of the men had fallen to the plague. Those which had sheltered themselves inside their homes were still alive. Plenty of the citizens had looked for some kind of refuge to come into and this had been the closest one. Mostly unfair, it wasn't so, there couldn't have been a thing of woe. 'Well, what might we do then, officer?' 'I don't think there's anything we can do any longer but hope for the best. So far, I think that we won't be able. Hold on.' There was something he remembered as he wanted to do for a long time ago. People would be looking but it was his only chance now. Since the world wasn't going to get a glimpse of another day, he would at least satisfy his own curiosity in the matter. He had to know whether or not there was a man behind the Chief or just another one of the sods. One whom they have received orders from, one of which they had respected and treated as one of their own despite never having seen his face. He had known and perhaps it was there in the deepest of thoughts. But something came to him there and neither thought would be satisfied any longer. He had gotten stronger lately and now there'd be no stopping to him. He had to know for his own interests and nothing else, who was the man behind the curtain and this time there wasn't even a need to knock any longer. Whoever he was and what his reason was behind that couldn't have been explained by normal means. Looking around the look had made him aware that people were starting through the transparent walls. 'Do me a favour and pull down the window blinds.’ It was more of a command rather than some request, but he was eager to comply.

There was little room to deny the fact that he had still been responsible for everything right around their city, regardless of the cues and the seemingly peculiar demands, he had was a great chief. ‘Right, chief, I’ll get down to it.’ The room was darker now, with the curtains behind him having been closed, and the ones covering the windows blocking almost everything but for a few old wooden sheets that wouldn’t stay straight, the room was partially dark.

Tiny fragments of light came from inside and creped in. As tainted as that was, he wasn’t as deranged as he appeared to have been inside his mind. ‘Do you truly want to know what I’ve been hiding behind for the last few years as the chief of this station?’ ‘There’s nothing else I wanted to know, chief. You know, I had my suspicion a long time ago but I never dared approach you in person, fearing what might come out of it.’ ‘It’s already late for either of us to be sorry now, isn’t it? This end isn’t satisfying for me either and I thought that I could stay and witness it alone, but I should’ve known that no man deserved it, especially not I, of all people.’ ‘Don’t do anything irrational, chief, I only came here to look at you, nothing more, a glance or even the slightest shot and I’ll finally feel content.’ ‘This room, you know it’s soundproof, right?’ He nodded, at least from the likes alone, he knew and was more than aware that he would be the only one who’d see him. At least before the people became impatient and barged in without even the slightest remorse for their actions. In that tight room, he waited. It was dark and it came to the point where he almost suffocated. ‘I believe it’s time. Promise this one last thing, officer, once you see who I am, would you turn me around to where I stood, drag down the curtains and watch the end with me?’ It felt odd but he somehow believed that he wouldn’t be himself there, whilst watching, but a shadow of himself. As he’d known before he turned, he knew what to expect. The man had been what he had claimed, and now it had been done.

Without a doubt, he had died there, with little to him to deny the fact that he wasn’t alive any longer. What lay in the spot where his face had been was the giant hole he had expected it to be. It was large in its diameter and seemed to have encompassed most of the zone where his skull should’ve been. There wasn’t a word to be said about it. Its red edges said more than enough, despite not being fresh, it felt as if there had been something there keeping him alive, right before he turned. But now, it was all him, he had to take the blame on himself and turn him around. Malloy was swearing around his neck, trashing his black uniform on the side, while moving closer to the curtains. He had been unaware of the view but managed to sit on the desk while chief had the grant view. By the time he came closer to the window blinds, he ripped them off rather than pulling them and someone normal would. At least there were some things he didn’t have to look away from but there was little doubt, there was no hope, that this would be it. ‘It’s not that bad of a view chief, you know? I think you would’ve loved it if you haven’t seen it already, but it looks like the sky could go ablaze in blue flames.’ There were sparks across the sky and small blue sparks which had spread across it. Nothing was out of the realm of possibility and there wasn’t any doubt that there could be some kind of reaction that would engulf the entire planet as well. He expected nothing less of it. Rather, there was little to be known of it, the taint of which crept along. Streets were empty, light poles didn’t work, the sounds from outside were rather unexpectedly caught off guard and it wasn’t like there was. His parade ended when another officer entered the room. He had left express orders for no one to enter and this didn’t look right. ‘Chief, Maloy, the people have started being impatient, you’ve been here for quite a while and there was no answers when we knocked. Is everything all right?’ This didn’t look right in his head now, and there was no return now, no other chance to make it right, as soon as he asked about chief, he knew how it would look like. He's been there a while and chief was unresponsive. Though he's never seen chief before, he wouldn't have the chance to think it through. With no blood on his hands, nothing on him, there wouldn't be an explanation for it, but he was aware that the mere shock would work more than enough. 'I think we should take it outside, Kristin.' His golden locks had been pulled off, he was quite lean and tall for a man of his age. But other than that, there wasn't anything which made him stand off other than his sense of justice. That's what made it seem like something was wrong, something going off in his head there. He wanted to do his best but little did he know, that something was wrong, he couldn't quite understand, even if it were to be explained in the utmost minute manner before he came closer and made a judgment for himself. It went down several ways inside his head and most of them ended up with either one of them that lying on the floor with a bullet through the back of his head. He grew more suspicious about what was going on before deciding to move a few feet closer. 'Look, I think there's something you're hiding.' 'Stop, you don't want to do this.' With another step, he was just in reach to throw a glance and see the gun which lay on his lap. If that wasn't a sign, there couldn't have been any other clearer than it. There were only a few things which were more distracting than it, which had happened mostly outside. Out there, there was a damn mess for which there could be no sort of rest. Messy as it were, there was no one out there, no man, no human on the streets. Only the vile ones remained inside, the case for which held his firearm. His eyes wouldn't betray what he thought and it was clear that either one was bloodshot. It's so hard to focus, but this isn't Malloy, this couldn't be him. He would never threaten me in that sort of manner. 'Look, I'm only here to talk, may I have a private conversation with the chief?' 'No, no one may leave this room now, neither of us nor him. Do you understand that?' There was a path of destruction lead outside, for which there appeared to be no return any longer, at least not after the outer reaches of the sky had been broken and invited them to come. They were at large unseen until they revealed themselves, but it seemed to be the case no more. Observing what had been happening around for that long, it appeared that they had come into existence just then. Tall and broad, their legs were absent but their arms were long and draping with their skin being pushed as far as it might. It appeared like their heads had been split and opened to a growth which spread, a mass of meat, which had its twists, pushing forth just the most atrocious parts a creature could have. Brownish-gray in colour, its skin was sagging, but from inside its expanded brain, there came those blue lights, from which the chain reaction seemed to have been given birth. They floated in pairs and seemed to cause only the famed blue ignition, for which they appeared to have been known by now. Not that it mattered in any sort of way, but there was a foreign element to it which appeared to have been thrown out of the way. No less than it had been shown, there came the element of sorrow, the dread, the fear and disgust. The more their connections inside their heads came to be threatened by the observation the tall ones had, the more did they produce their bluish gas, of vicious smoke. Moments after being released into the air it ignited in various veils, only to poke holes through the atmosphere, as if the corruption wasn't enough. But it somehow managed to purify the air and stop the rain even if it wasn't going to last. They invited men to come outside, while the wicked on, repelled, would continue through the city, taking various paths to make sure it would be destroyed. The wicked being laid outside, which had to be stopped by the ones who were threatened rather than the being whom had appeared. As long as they were there, hope wouldn't be in vain. But alas, their tubes had pulled and pushed, and from their heads there came and crawled into the ground. In a flash they started glowing with a radiant blue. Somehow they had noticed and quickly understood that there was some kind of small device which would go off, in the distance, not to show off. One of them floated towards it but stopped, opening its eyeless face, a mouth that couldn't be agape pushed forward and seemed to have crept through the masses of rock and stone. Through the various outer planes, there wept a transparent veil of blue light, which had instantly vaporised what was left of the metal case surrounding the explosive device. From that point, there could be no doubt, that these observers had powers that went beyond anything which had even been seen. And what did they do? They grinned. With their mad smile, which stretched, revealing nothing but the emptiness of space inside, for that's from where they had come. Some of them had spread, others followed the towering ones to make sure there'd be some which were being saved. But what would be a continuous thing had to be the fact that there was little to no doubt, of their abilities, which had become broadly used amongst themselves. For, even if one were to throw a rock, he'd be unable to fully go on with it since it would twist and turn into energy and be absorbed. 'Look, I can breathe, I can finally breathe and be free. There's nothing stopping me.' A man, who had lost his mind, relentlessly trying to chase the giant towers which had already brought destruction throughout the planes. No explanation would suffice, how he survived for so long there, under the shadow of their black clouds, he followed with seemingly no vile effect on his health. He walked proudly underneath their flag and appeared to enjoy what they were doing, as to add to him that he would follow for as long as there was a need for. Even if his life was in peril, he would come to be and never stop. A worshipper who never had the means of understanding that the vile thing had brought his destruction as well, being no human any longer. He brought upon himself the followers of other regions of the town, there being safe as soon as they could see one man living underneath destruction. There was a need and a call for action, they could do with less of a distraction.

Despite the following floating fiend, without a doubt, the human race had become extinct by now, perhaps even sparsely spread around. Neither their corpses nor any sign that they had left a trace of their existence. By now, there was only this strange alternated world which had its mad inhabitants, overlords who still destroyed and living buildings in which the survivors hid. But there, in that small frame where they stood together, far away from the floating one and giant tower, they felt human again. 'Follow me brothers, as our faith might protect us from it.' With which, they looked upon the floating demon-like creature, who didn't deserve their gaze. It looked sagging there in the sky, with its mouthless but cut-through face. From its inside, there came more smoke which would indeed purify and stabilise the atmosphere, yet their presence and their original had been unclear. 'Blast you men, stop hiding and come outside. You cannot fight us so why don't you just die?' Four of them, crystal red, their grouped around the living, then, there came the time to break through. Neither of them desired to leave a man alive, not through some sick method, far beyond their drive. It was pointless then, neither could tell, but they were being watched and followed. Other smaller fiends would want to join in after all. 'Be gone vile creatures, perhaps I should have to make an example out of one of you in order to understand the unnatural order which had been placed.' He was quick, while the others prepared to break through. A band of small hunch-backed deceivers with small knives and nothing sharp, mere rocks and what not, brought it on themselves, laughing with their mocking sounds. There was a quickness neither of them expected from a red corpse, which moved and grabbed the first one, only to break it apart, to twist it and defect itself in the utmost dreadful nature. Of things like that, which might not happen in the least, there had been no sign of this restless dead, for he chose to defect itself in hunting off the rest of them. Every now and again, nonetheless, a spear flew only to break. He thought himself invincible, a spectre which would kill and gut. Their hunger would be soon brought to his attention, but the others couldn't wait. As soon as they had managed to open the gate and get inside the building, there was no doubt any longer that there was some need to push it through. Their advance couldn't be stopped until, everyone inside had gotten through the punishment, the dread alive. It was unexpected that they would fight back. But like spectres of red, of hues of crimson, they followed and tried to grasp and eat. 'Spread and take whatever you want, there's no need to leave any of them alive.' 'But what about him? He's been out there for long enough to have grasped for their blood, now, he'll never return on his own. 'Leave him be, this can end either way for us.' There had been screams, and all of the sudden, the red killer had smiled his toothy red grin as he wanted to push forward and take care of everything. With a leash he had brought, he broke through a room and started whipping the couple apart. Their child was watching, while the husband begged him to stop. 'No more, end this, please, don't make our son watch through this.' Its relentless assault had stopped, but not because he had been considering it, but rather, because of one hole made through the ceiling, which had broken through. One of them had been so rough that the body which now stood in front of their room had become indistinguishable. Worse than that, another flash of light came, almost blinding, but this one had become different in a way. It wasn't one to bring a thing, but had affected most of fiends. 'Look, mother, the, it's the, the corpse.' The child was the first to point, that the bloody corpse had started lunging around the giant wheel which had impaled its guts. No more had it a head, arms or legs, but flat limbs which had twisted enough time that they had created mazes between them. It freed itself then suddenly drew itself together in a curling blob which moved in circles. At first, the sight was rather confusing, but after his patience ran out, the red creep had lunged and grabbed it. For something which had only started being given life, this thing was rather light. It flew right through the window tightly, right before it had been exposed to the world out there. Then it was then it finally came out in its true shape. From every corrosion and each face, the blob popped into a face, being owned by the one which had belonged to its master. It burst into some flight, a multitude of maze-like faces which were still connected the same way their body had been. As they witnessed, the distraction, the man came to the fire poker, ready to push through while it had been distracted. A mere scratch appeared but it only seemed to be deflected by it. For one moment, the dead one thought of the fact, that they had thought themselves to be immortal and indestructible for as long as they had been encased in red. But in truth, no one was neither him nor the man. 'Alistair!' His wife shouted, unable to look away from the bloody mess. At least, it had been a quick death, as his heart had been impaled and seemed to have bled away in a most peculiar manner, which couldn't be least of all prolonged. Their fate was similar to the man of the house, as far as it seemed, there wasn't a way to look at it without being dreadfully aware, that someone out there was watching. Without a doubt, someone had crept and looked around despite not having met any of the conditions, but the smile of gasoline was pure. He couldn't smell properly, nor did he think it was truly there. But a flame had sparked behind his legs and all of the sudden, the entire house was engulfed in fire, unnatural it seemed. 'This place is compromised, brothers, it would seem like we'll have to find another.' He said, despite of the fact that he swam through the blue flames, and took his time walk the stairs, a few floors as well to add up to his search, until the point where he had come to the conclusion that everyone was gone. The fire somehow came to an end. There was no one around any longer, not to mention the strange shift to night he saw while looking through the window. 'What happened?' He asked himself, rather caught in the whole conundrum there. Without a doubt, there hadn't been any way for him to tell whether it was normal or he had gone through another hellish plane. Even from the distance, as far as he could see, the streets were almost empty, if it weren't for the small creatures which inhabited the place as well. Something had affected them, it would appear, as the gas had broken through. They were trying to squirm on the floor, changing their corpses while tearing apart their tiny suits in order to join one another in a being of pure amalgam. From its inside came a pair of long tendrils which close its normal mouth. It spat and turned its own material which made its clothes into a paste in order to devour and prepare its growth. For now, it looked like a giant star, with legs growing from every side, no feet being attached but rather, many round spheres which hadn't touched the earth. From a mere sight, it would've become obvious that they were slippery and strange, something which brought the thought of the deranged to it. Even as he came he realised how tiny he was compared to this creature and wondered just how he could approach it without the least of distress. He himself was all alone, unable to confess. By the time he had come near, he grabbed one of the spheres only to pull it out and see for himself. There were thousands of them, or more, fit inside its body. 'This is what your bodies composed of, isn't it?' With which he smiled and opened his mouth. For now, the creature was passive and it would only be right for it to have its insides devoured if it stood there and wriggled in its misery. From its sides, though, it signalled pain as it released a substance in the earth, the same one which made material into the paste, reaching the point where it could melt entire buildings and break them apart. What was this place after all and why did he feel like that? He had been a creature of the night, one who didn't live and shouldn't have felt pain. But after an entire bite of this wretched thing, he started spanning around, feeling a growth inside his restless guts. It grew there and filled the cartilages as well as what was missing. 'No, no, spit it out, spit it out.' He spun and threw himself on his knees, trying to push out whatever gluttony had embodied him there. In his misery, he felt like he heard the shout of a woman who had no hope of getting through. What human would still be here after what happened and why had the sky become encased? There wasn't any mistake in his presence there and he could feel himself being caught off guard, taken by the toes and having most of his wrongs corrected. 'What are you?' The wretched corpse asked him, looking at the growth inside of him which gave signs of being alive. It went as far as to make his red crystal armour shatter under the entire weight which pushed ahead through every crack until there was nothing but the littlest sign that there had been something in there. He had become yet another piece of armour, just a walking piece of bone. Whatever had given it consciousness wasn't there anymore. Now, it walked on its strange ways, with its long mandibles pushing forth, its blue skin and need and hunger had already taken care of what had to be done. Most of what was needed lay in front of it, as the piece which had given it life would also satisfy its hunger. But it wasn't as easy for the others who had fled the burning building there. They spread like red flies, each of them in its arrogance, feeling that their time was about to come. It would just so happen that they had signed their own red contract of dead and it happened for each of them to get engulfed by the destruction. 'What is the meaning of this?' 'Could this be a part of the disease?' 'Tear it off, tear it off.' Some of them said, once they notice that they were no longer dead. Whatever happened seemed to have crept inside each and every one of them, right as their hunt for men had come to a strong point. It wasn't feasible anymore, whilst knowing what would happen to them, the growth, the chance, each of them would harbour the darkness which had taken care of them, and push it forth. A dreadful thing, to lose what was left of their mad life and get lost into the annals of time. Red shards spread on the ground as each had become what they had come to hate, pure biological concoctions which stretched and spread. There hadn't been a logical explanation behind it, as there was nothing connecting them which would force them to change in such a manner. As a matter of fact, there wasn't anything stopping the dreadful tiny dwarfing men from coming with their tiny blades in order to harvest them for meat. Soon enough they had been surrounded and under the veil of a virulent hatred, they couldn't be stopped as they went ahead and started cutting, slicing and eating them. 'What's going on out there?' Without much of vision, there was something behind their converted barracks, which was to say that there was some kind of sight which was unfit for a pair of young ladies to see. But the room in which they stood was kind of limited in those regards, as there was another door which lead to the stairs and the elevator and they stood in the in-between. Others stood there with them, seemingly morose and caught in their own worlds and by their own kin. Some were staring at the ceiling, trying not to fall asleep. One man, in particular Phil, his name was. He had carved on every wall inside the room various names he remembered, just so that he would stay calm. 'Are you feeling right Phil? Don't you think it'd be time to stop?' 'Not while what's going on out there still hasn't stopped. I think this may be my last chance, unless those fuckers decide to let us in!' The last part had been almost shouted through the brass door, but he was right either way, the door had been locked and every now and again a neighbour would pass by, only to show himself and pass by. No one might've been more paranoid than them, as a matter of fact, there was no one else for which Phil had a more widespread hatred towards than them. 'Back away now, another one's coming.' At which, everyone in the room took a few steps behind, only to avoid the ones which were bold enough to come a few inches from their barracks and make trouble. A being devoid of a mind, which hasn't been seen anywhere around had come. It felt as if that creature hadn't existed at all, and its single purpose was to appear and harass them, which was undoubtedly impossible. There was a threshold between them, which couldn't be sturdy enough, but it held. With its wide tongue, it pushed it through one of the gaps and licked the rust off the nails, the wooden planks which had been pushed inside and even the iron parts which had belong to the door, more so around the lock. That wicked thing had been hardened, for there had been several attempts for them to cut and stab its tongue, all of which had ended up being in vein. 'Can't we ignore it like we always do? It's going to get bored eventually and leave like it always does.' Another one of the survivors had been Gaul. He was a red-headed sturdy man, with a torn jacket and a lop-sided hat over his head. Silently watching, he had had thoughts of his own involving that creature behind the gate and an axe, if only he had been blessed enough to have it on him, things would've turned out much differently than what they were now. Nevertheless, he was set on napping. 'He won't leave that soon, and that's not the reason I'm afraid of it. There's something behind that search, I know that one of these times, and it will find a way to get through unless we track it and the progress it makes.' 'Do you think so?' Asked Clay, the other one had been called Alma. Were tightly knitted together, caught looking at the wrong things and somehow had been dragged inside rather than be killed outside. The young man they were talking with was Grant, which left just another man with them, one who had locked himself in the one man room built on their side. Ever since he had found a way to get through, he simply stood there, thinking he could wait this dreadful end on his own, without food or water or anything at all. It wasn't like they hadn't been doing well either, as they had been suffering of the same condition as he had been, the main difference being that they hadn't been entrapped. Regardless, neither of them had any idea whether or not he was still alive, and neither would try breaking through only to ask. 'There, it had left, I think. Give it a few minutes in case it decides to return.' The thing was that it hadn't. There had been plenty of opportunities for it to strike at them, most of which had gone in vain attempts, nonetheless, there was still a chance it might return, he kept repeating in the cell he had been locked in. But outside, that thin creature was still starving, with most of the body mass having been gone, the only thing which had been spared was the thick tongue. Other than that, its primal instincts had been benign, the dreadful nature it had, crept outside. It came to another block, this small house which hadn't anything to do with either place have been there on its own, standing. A scent which had been vile crept from inside of it but it was dark enough to see. How had it missed that house? The door hadn't even been properly locked, but as soon as it arrived there, the door came open. In a fraction of a moment, there had been light there, which revealed them, a few people sleeping with one senile creature which had once been a man. His sight had been dimmed and in his shaking hand rested a key. A pitiful attempt, that it had been, to close the door, which had utterly failed, and their screams after the door slammed closed served as a reminder of agony of what happens when you leave your guard down even then. They have never been heard from again. It would also be needed for their attention to be drawn to a more important point farther away into the north, from which there appeared to be some kind of cold agony sprouting from the girth of the ground. Vile winds started flowing and pushing in as well, making the atmosphere even colder than it should've been. There was no doubt about the involvement of greater forces but the minute moot would have to be over one way or another. 'Cease this things, I want it to end now, please, father, why can't it end?' 'There's nothing we can do son, but wait through it.' 'Why can't we see mother either?' 'She's out of our reach, I've already told you that, listen, and I can't keep answering your questions all day because I've got work to do. We're depending on this to keep us safe and if the system fails, there'll be nothing for us to hope for any longer.' There was a period of consideration but not from the kid. It was from the man behind the pillar, who was looking ahead from his side of the bell tower. Obviously, the giant bell had been disposed of, as it had been placed inside the perimeter in order to serve as a conductor, but there it was, the frame with which its functions had been taken care off. An improvised board perhaps, which had used some various pieces taken out of some car they have managed to disassemble, but it wasn't at all what was expected. It was the time to strike, and he didn't delay. He was no monster, but a man who managed to infiltrate and take a nap under the provisions room. 'This will be over quickly.' 'Father.' The boy yelled but his mouth had been grabbed as soon as there had been the knife lodged behind his father's neck. From what he had felt, that had hit all the right spots and the death was instant. 'Listen, kid, I'll leave you here unconscious, but I also need you to know something before I go. Don't worry about it just yet, this may only take a moment. After this place is done for, you'll have to run until they find this place unattended, right? I don't remember a night in which I've been in here that I've not witnessed some face which wasn't human on the other side of the electrical fence.

They want to get it, no doubt about that and between you and I, you had a better chance at survival than your father.' He pointed with his other hand at his missing leg. On the long run, he wasn't a runner, and worse, he'd get his own kid taken away and killed before he'd give himself in. He's known his kind before, always standing into that tower. Muscles which had grown weak, at least this way, and the kind would have one drive to keep his alive.

As he spoke, the kind tried stretching his arms in order to get to the knife. That had been a one way deal, as he thought of what would happen as soon as his men got in. 'There's my signal, it would seem like my men are on their way. You wouldn't happen to know how to operate this board, would you?' Even if he was almost gagged, the boy shook his head from the sides. 'I thought so. Well, it was a pleasure talking with you kid, but I think it would be time for you to fall asleep now.' With which, he seemed content to let him there, for now, just to set his priorities straight, he pulled some cords off after pushing some bottoms. From up there, he had a great view and seemed to have a great idea whether or not the electricity had been done. His men, for one, were throwing metal shrugs and shingles at the pile, only to be met by the sparks. 'Damn kid, I would've used your help if only you had known how to operate this damned thing. It was still far beyond the hour they'd come, that had to be dealt with as well. Luckily for him, neither of the people who lived there woke up or stood on guard. For so many of them there, that had been it. He's stopped looking and grabbed his knife back. It'd be some time before the kid would wake, in case the chance was for this to re-activate, but he had at least got through with it. 'There, this should be it, come in, let's be quick about it before someone wakes up.' Splint had showed his men the place and it had been the prey of the week, as it would seem. They filled their bags with everything they had and were already out of the deposit. When they got at the gates, they only saw one single thin creature with round spherical bulbs around its body, which were standing there, faintly glowing. It was a scout that had been a scout, which made everyone aware of it. 'Close that damn door.' 'But, we, I did.' Splint couldn't shake off the fact that he had killed a man for it, his plan had been perfect, to the very end. What had happened there? 'Splint, if we get through that door, we'll be ripped apart along with these provisions, do you understand?' 'I killed the kid's father up there, don't you think he'll remember? The first thing in the morning, they'll look for us.' 'We're not going to stay until they're waking up, only until they leave, but for now, we have to make sure they won't get through. Understood?' He had to deal with it the only way he knew, which was only to bear it through, and he had been told what had to be done with the boy as well. It was unexpected, even for him, as he was no child murderer, at least not until that moment. Unknowingly so, he would have to return and turn on the system before taking care of the child, as the other men had made a great job rebuilding it. There would no passing through as soon as it had been turned on. Up there, the child was still sleeping, apparently, a backhanded slap wasn't enough to wake him up from the stoop he was in. A poor thing, as he could've used his help when it came to bringing back the electricity. 'How do I actually do it?' 'Now why would you go ahead and do something like it?' A voice said, a bat-like creature standing a few inches ahead from him. Its head belonged to a man, though it had been coloured its dark grey, not to mention the longer features that didn't belong to no human he had seen. Its eyes were bigger and rounder, black spheres, against which he could see his reflection. The various moves still pushed through his vision and seemed to attempt gripping for his throat, at least until he pulled back. 'What are you, why have you come here? My men!' They weren't down there any longer, at least not in a visible spot. He had wondered whether or not he had been cut off while making his way up the tower as if they ran. 'Feeling alone? Missing something or someone?' From his chest, tiny soft bat-fingers came in the dousen, pushing forth while crawling for something to grasp. There wasn't any sign to show whether or not they would outstretch and push forward in any possible way, yet, he couldn't give in either. Whether or not they had hid inside, there were things out there already, not only him. 'What do you want from me? You can talk like a man, but can you reason like on? I don't have time to waste trying to argue with you, not when there's work to be done.' It never passed the frame of the tower, always standing in a frame of a few inches flying in the air, watching. 'May I come in, please? That's all

I'm asking, I could take care of your certain problem for now and you'll have this entire thing to focus on while I'm getting around.' 'No, leave already, no sane man would let you come through. Have you looked at your damn self lately? You're an abomination, carrying some kind of dreadful abundance of inhuman bat cunt inside of you.' 'Well, that's not a polite way of talking about someone who can help you.' He had told himself not to be distracted. The board was his main focus, the various starters which were turned from number eighteen to zero, those would have to be twisted back into their original position. One problem being the fact that neither of them had been turned to the maximum amount, meaning there'd be a chance for it to actually blow from the amount of energy involved. That's right, keep your head on your shoulders. 'I would just happen to know the right combination needed. It's not the first time I have flown above this place and my sight is almost as impure as any dark pit of your choosing.' With which it tried getting closer, only to signal the fact that it had been repelled by some force that didn't belong there. Woe to him, who hid himself into the tower, soon to be brought to the slaughter. He could hear the ones that had gathered below, trying to get bolder once they found out that there was nothing preventing them from touching the gates. 'Well what do you want in exchange for those? Please, I'll do something for you, right? That's what you want. I won't give you my permission to get in though, that's not a deal yet, not until me and my men escape.' Which had been a scam slip he had, if there was one to begin with, regardless of which, he would've known anyway. If he had done what he had claimed to have done, there'd be nothing to hide. 'Give me the body of the man, now.' At which, he tossed it over and immediately saw the two claws underneath it release from below and grasp the body, crushing it with mere force. It kept its part of the bargain and told which way to turn and where to stop. 'This won't be over, make way for I shall return.' There were sparks now, but it wasn't what he had thought it'd be. The long cord was pushing in farther and then came the lever on the side. He hadn't noticed it at first, but apparently there was a button to release it. Where? There had to be one there, if only there weren't as many there. He hadn't done a lot any longer but tried forcing it as hard as he could. 'Come on, come on, before they get it, oh, just get through, damn you!' The lever broke apparently, leaving him in a state of distress. He had to clear his mind, there was still time. He would run out of ideas soon, that's when he went down and started searching. Where were his men? They were being surrounded and there hadn't been a sign of where they were hiding. This outpost had only a few buildings and so far, he had managed to run around them with a fair amount of sweat involved. 'Don't tell me, oh no. They couldn't have left, they, they.' His voice had given in, while positioning himself to look through one of the windows of the other half cylindrical building. Men were definitely sleeping inside, along with women, children and the animals. Neither of them had belonged to his group, which meant that they had to hide inside the other building, where they had stored the food. Empty as well. They were nowhere to be seen, which only meant they have gone through the only way they could've left. It was obviously their only option and they have taken it while he had been away. By now, they might've been out of his reach, not to mention the fact that he had been surrounded. 'Bastards, I'll get you for this, somehow!' He almost winced there, at the clear sound of his own voice, only realising that there were people sleeping behind. It had been a short walk from where he laid towards the tower, and his only option came to mind. It was the child, who was groggy but had awakened confused. Perhaps he had lain there a few minutes while he had been unaware of the band of thieves which had abandoned him and left him there. Regardless of which, there was a distinct voice which had guided him beyond the clueless sea of dark voices below. One of which would make him ignore what was going down there and focus on something far more important than the pile of wretched ones that had gathered around. Oh the madness was vile, he could see it from the top of the tower. The child had to be taken care off, he said, that damn bastard, that filthy man. He should've known, he should've smelled it from a mile. 'What are you doing?' Asked the child as soon as he came to his senses, after having noticed that there was something wrong with the man, he tried coming in-between him and the stairs. 'If you throw that away, there'll be no way to stop them from entering, do you understand?' 'I think it's too late to argue now!' The frame had been heavy but that only worked against it as gravity took care of the rest. As it hit the ground in some sort of blow, there had been a small explosion which could only be unexplainably loud for the people sleeping. Without a doubt, not only have they heard it but it would be soon enough that they'd come. 'Right on time, as well. I know why you're here.' He grabbed the child by the head and kneed him in the lungs. While he would be out of breath, there came a short period of recovery which made him feel something beyond tiredness. 'Well, it would seem like you need help escaping. Are you ready for some kind of trade?' 'How can I know I can trust you?' 'They are waking up on a side, look at it.' There it was, the light having been lit inside one of the buildings. It was clear that there could be no way for him to deal with the men and it had gotten even worse on the other side, as the cumulative strength of the crowd would be added through to push the pieces which had formed the block apart. Either way he looked at it, there wasn't a way for him to escape and get through the bars. 'What do you want?' 'Give me the child and upon my return, I shall come and grant you freedom in a place they might not reach you.' Before coming to his senses, the boy felt his head being grabbed by the man. Immediately, he was thrown into the claws of the vile flying creature and despaired. There were tears in his eyes, the talons which had grabbed him not only held high but had pierced his skin and body. Recklessly, he had tried doing something, being limited to trying to chew and bite, only to having his teeth crack under their pressure. 'Don't worry, tiny one, you may not be able to pierce my scales. No metal, no bullet and no blade my pierce my armoured body, so you may use the time that's left of you to rejoice until you're reunited with what's left of your father.' It said and grinned. Seeing how the boy couldn't think of anything and chose his remaining time to spit and trash his words out instead of getting into the spirit of conversation, he decided to fly lower and trash the boy into the nearest trees. With little in mind, he was come to coincide with the madness he had felt. The pieces of wood which had flied against his mouth and eyes not only distracted him but also made him realise how much he had hated his current conundrum. 'Stop, enough, enough. Just let me go, I don't want to end up like my father.' He bit his tongue hard enough. If his father would've heard him, if he had been still alive, somehow, he might've kicked his head in, harder than the man who had killed him perhaps. But this? There was no kind of bargain he could strike with it, as the vile thing tortured him for its own amusement. The boy had been lowered as close to the ground as he could get, the point where his feet could walk on their own, before being forces down and his knees pushed in. They would be dragged from time to time, after being lowered too much, with all that extra weight coming down his waist. 'Let go of me, please, stop harming me. I don't want this, I didn't ask for him. I'll talk, I'll talk, hear? Listen.' 'That's what I enjoy listening to, compliance. Great, we may continue this until we reach my nest, after it, we'll see what happens.' And they had flow through a forest of leafless trees, with brow oaks and cracked tainted soil. Without a doubt, there had been some kind of restless wonders which had gnawed at him to see. Like the giants in the distance and the restless souls which walked through the night. 'Are those apparitions real?’ ‘They are as real as they can be. Most had their souls trapped in here forever, without a chance of coming back to the physical world or receive any kind of closure.’ The boy had been afraid that he would either end up like them or that he would see his father below, making sure he avoided his gaze from any kind of imagery which would disturb him. There were other things there to take from when they came. More of them, flying in some kind of strange rows but never together, appeared and seemed to be aggressive. They started flying in as close as they could and began pulling and scratching, almost anything to take the boy away from him and have him for their own. Large claws began to pout as their shrieks made it way too obvious that they engaged in unlawful activities which wouldn’t do anything less than frighten the child. ‘Hold on, they are getting at it again.’ With a pressure from underneath its wings, the consideration that the boy could be abandoning there still came to its mind. Sooner or later they would track his nest, and he would rather lose the boy rather than lose the man. Much more meat was to be attained from him than the other way around and even if he chose to have the lad trained, what use would it have? The world would never be seen in the same light any longer and everything else would kind of become restless and impure. ‘They have to give in, make them stop, I don’t think I can take the abuse any longer.’ He felt their claws row down like whips against his back, which made him unable to thinking sanely any longer. A few other things came to him, others which might’ve been overlooked while a few of them came as sudden as their deaths. Something in that forest made the trees and their long trunks sharpen wooden spears. Some hadn’t taken the warning nor were they aware. ‘Walk with me boy, I’ll have you crawl if you desire to live.’ They have enter the densest part of the forest, where sudden creeping gestures coming from the oaks had turned from mild shakes to turning and impaling one of the flying humanoid cold-blooded abominations. From every direction as well, it would seem that they would break the body apart while each part was being drained of its fluids. A few things had been overlooked around the surrounding area, but the lad got it. He had expected its nest to have been somewhere above or into a mountain stop, anywhere high where it would be unreachable for even the experienced climber. But nay, the nest had been hidden there, in the hearth of the forest, where neither of them dared advance. Surrounded by some kind of wooden dome above, where the branched reigned and cut off anyone or anything which dared approach, there it was. Trinkets, skulls and bones, shiny weapons, pouches of blood and even some kind of treasure. But more importantly, there he was, his father, looking rather peaceful and content. He was somewhat sad in his expression but he chose to approach him nevertheless. Sparks of red could be barely seen in the distance, not for the boy, but rather the beast. It could feel it as a giveaway of some great explosion happening there, far closer to the dark vacuum than inside their plane of existence. ‘Well, child, have you seen enough?’ ‘Are you going to take my life now?’ He hadn’t even properly turned towards the creature, out of fear that he might be gnawed at his very own face. From behind, there were obvious wounds which had cut deep enough and wouldn’t stop bleeding. In other words, he could feel himself getting worse, sicker than before, dying before he’d get better. Could he even say something rational in order to save his own life? That was a thought. As he turned, he saw not a face he could bargain with, he had seen the face of a man no longer, but the beast. It could be seen in its eyes, the way light reflected, slowly fading as its dome darkened under its own command. From there, the boy grabbed something, the nearest sharp object he could put his hand on, regardless of the pain and the fact that he was bleeding because of it. ‘I’m sorry.’ A few hours had passed and they had been awakened by the noise down there. It seemed like the barricade that had been placed there was some kind of long forgotten dream now, as many of them had come inside. One peculiar one got his eyes, bearing the twisted bodies of two giant spiders which had their long legs connects and eventually lead to a larval kind of upper body. From the insides, it pumped something, while never using those legs to move and pushing its fat bodies in. The way it crept gave the impression that it only hid something inside those bodies and they weren't actual specimens of the arachnid variety. For a few various reasons, there were others viler who disguised themselves in order to pass easily through the fields unnoticed. Some deformed grasshoppers which seemed to bear far too many legs for them to bear any kind of legitimacy, while dragging at the end of each leg some human head which appeared to bear their bodily function. To look upon it with less disturbed eyes would be unfair, but they could roll most of their eyes, almost perform some kind of speech and wouldn't have been questioned whether or not they weren't human, or if they used to be human at any point. Dark times came ahead. Soon enough most of them around there would be dead. The only thing which came to him was praying that they wouldn't see the man who was cowering in the tower. 'They broke through, no, lock it.' He heard some shouts but still hadn't dared look inside. Even having his head raised slightly higher would lead to his total damnation, which was something he could deal with. They were all dealing with something they shouldn't have, something which could've been avoided if it weren't for him. At least from around, there were those that made no sound but seemed to be able to crawl on the buildings and pierce the metal with some sort of long piercing organs that came out of their bodies and started immediately melting everything in sight. For a few moments of absolute terror, the women looked above their heads only to see the image of ceiling cutters. Some strange creatures they were, bearing some kind of long skin between their hands and arms, three sealed in heads which had mad features to them which shouldn't have belong to a man or even a vile spawn. There were eyes, but shred together, covered by ingrown patches of skin. Little was overlooked in regards of its body but there could be seen, especially from the side that there was some kind of chest area which was structured in various parts that seemed to have been stuck together like pieces of a puzzle. 'Come on, come on, come on, keep your damn part of the deal, I don't know how much long I could wait.' Not even the tower he laid in was safe, as he felt it shaking from some kind of strange undercurrent that he dared not look toward. His suspicion appeared to have had something with the fact that he thought they found him and decided to bring down the tower in order to have him killed. If that were the case, he was out of hope. The land was dead. Everywhere where life had once spread appeared to have been caught in that pagan hold of many peculiar deformities which stretched to the ground and hadn't stopped. As far as metal would sometimes become flaccid and weak, especially iron, so would water before hard and easy to hold but never cold. No, there wasn't a reason for this strange behaviour whatsoever, nor could it be explained why there was such a creeping feeling of innocence around the shrine. It had come from below the ground and bore a symbol similar to the round cross. In the middle, there was a moulded pair of eyes, many of which blinked and appeared encased, as if they stood on top of a tomb stone rather than some kind of altar. In the following moments, it suddenly raised itself a few meters higher above, revealing some sort of box for those to enter. Since there were no men outside, caught hiding in their various holes or buildings and away from the plains, only the mad ones would dwell that far away from any place of might. One decrepit one came, approaching on his weak legs, to the point where he crawled, with his hands tied to his own face. A few shades away from his greyish face and body, made him realise he could come closer. Another wicked creature approached which veiled in its weakness and seemed to bow. They were there, near the altar. Many more approached until they formed their small cult around it. Plenty of them had been too weak to hunt and devour so they survived mostly on rotten bodies and their rotten meat. With their faces in hold, they seemed to be something akin to rats, with short but long teeth which pointed down. The upper soles of their feet had been pierced by some sort of bulky fingers that were too shabby to touch. And, most of all, they walked in wearing rags around their bodies, some sort of garments which didn't look as if they had been made but rather torn apart from some greater material which shouldn't have been used. It spread some sort of small parasites which ate just about everything and the sheet from which their clothes had been fashioned out of had been their colony. The shrine wailed and from its inside there came a warmth which was both pulling and disgustingly pushing for them to enter. More than eight of them had entered in that tight chamber and as it closed, something had clearly been wrong.

Without the sound, there could be no confirmation that they had been assimilated, but soon enough, against the carved and sculpted sides of it, there were four spheres held in the hands of four statues. From there, an opening released itself immediately from them and suddenly, the remains had been thrown on the ground. Certainly, those weren't just battered and bashed, but they had been warmed and didn't look like any of their brethren at all. Even if they were, most didn't appear to care, as starvation had pushed them way beyond any considerate thought or even remorse for their actions. A madder approach came as soon as they departed from their own minds. As time went on, during the same night, the doors would open again, whilst showing no signs that there had ever been any kind of grim fruitlessness and destruction which would've made them creep away. But truth be told, they had been made, and from that madness there would be no way back. Soon enough, too many of them had become gluttonous and lazy, caught in their own trap. It had managed to pull the attention of someone who shouldn't have seen nor noticed them at all, but it had. One tyrant, granter of woe had arrived. Its body was that of a beast, close to the depictions of a Mammoth, but it was rather some kind of greater ape-like destroyer of which body bore a covering of metal, held in by chains which had been forged inside its body. Many pieces of metal made this armour, but neither crept aside. The helmet it bore broke any idea that anyone would see what type of being they would face, not that there'd be a chance to live enough after having a vision of the dreadful being in any case. But far away from that, the flying humanoid bat seemed to have crept back. His wings were spread across the sky and from the distance there he seemed like a hellish eagle that rode through a cloud of bitter smoke and spread only fear through its wake. From its senseless face there could be seen nothing but some kind of distress. What had it seen? 'What took you so long? I can feel the tower shaking. Do you not realise the risk I am in? Take me from this dreadful place, I desire my freedom.' 'Still, have you got what you need for a trade?' 'Flying damn rat, you said nothing about another one. I've already given you two bodies, that of the father and that of a child.' 'How did you?' 'It's not important, what I need of you now is for me to get out of there as soon as possible. No trickery or anything of the sort. I want to live, damn you, I need this!' 'Very well then, would you happen to trust me then? Was it a stranger, or worse than that, a flying rat?' 'I don't think I'm supposed to have any choice in the matter. My options aren't anything but limited with what's happening down there.' He took another glance and noticed just what had he done. It was because of him and he had doomed the fates of everyone alive down there, at least anyone alive who was human and mattered. It was time, nonetheless to flee. The flight was rough, he almost couldn't bear the pain and the fear of heights which appeared to creep up in his mind. Worse than that, he flew with the constant fear of being dropped down by this creature who could decide at any moment that there had been no bargain. But there it was a head which was twisted around as to face him. His eyes didn't match his properly but he had done it, he had made an unnatural pose which would've snapped the neck of any healthy man, not to mention that it had been done while he was flying. 'Shouldn't you be watching where you're flying towards?' 'I can do as well I can please. There's no doubt that I am going to be well on my own after you're gone. But that's not why I have decided to turn around and talk to you. See, I have decided that our beneficial arrangements are quite queer and deranged.' 'What we've done there, it was either me or them. There's nothing neither deranged nor cruel with what I've done.' 'Regardless of it, you've managed to rob and feed some of my prey, for which I may be indeed required to dismiss some previous arrangements I may have settled. Regardless of which, you may have given me something more than what I would've gotten on my own?' 'And what would that be?' 'Isn't it clear by now? A partner, if anything.' With which it left a crooked opening for him to see the inner workings of teeth and growing skin. They couldn't be called teeth in anything, those sharp blades, which gave the impression you were staring at stainless steel ivory knives. From its innards, there was a dark glow which encompassed its face, to the point of wondering whether or not it would change its mind and chomp his entire head. And it could, that maw could open just right enough that he'd have no chance to get it out in time before he'd die. More pitiful than that was the fact that he agreed on in, seeing how there was no alternative to this servitude rather than partnership. He felt no equal to the thing, to any of them. Even those who were weak seemed to gather around and worship, even though the bigger ones seemed more frightening than anything else, he started enjoying being up there. 'Morcholek.' One word came out of that thing, the hairy beast which proved to be no wonder. It fell there, like a giant, stumbling around a hill, he'd been a survivor of some distant land, who came there only to die. But pitiful as it were, it stumbled against some rocks and cracked its head. From the insides, though, most recently its back, the armour had been gone. A single creature had resided in half of its body and got out. From the outside of its body, there was a slippery veil which covered it, a blue and sturdy boneless one-eyed grunt. No one seemed to notice or be alarmed by the fact that it bore a few tongues still attached to the body of its prey. Nothing, there had been nothing to suck out of it. Not to mention that it hadn't been the only one. From the inside of the woods, there came more, crawling, not on all four but their slippery bodies just pushed themselves rather than them using their limbs. Some still crept, or at least attempted to push forward through some kind of pile or while curling into similar piles to form some meters in height, but there wasn't any need to be in a hurry. Those weak creatures far outnumbered them by tens and they hadn't come there to fight, they have come there to eat. Below sounded the sirens, in the city, where none would speak. There had been a siege and finally they had arrived. No one had seen a tank before and the army men had brought two at least. Even there, they appeared to be stern and bring some sort of authority which belonged to some dead man who had been absorbed. 'Soldiers, I want to fire at the enemy, the moment you have a confirmed target, I want you to unleash a spree of lead which would make us remembered.' 'Sir, yes sir!' They walked in rows, their tank was old, despite that, they weren't any more let down than had been over the fact that they had lost men, out there, beyond the clouds. Aviators and engineers had been lost, those who had to jump until they could do it no more as well. More men had been lost on the flank during their initial attempts to get through only to be brought to their knees and lost of the smoke. It wasn't that far into the field that they started going through a damaged field. Pieces of the clouds were falling from above in an utmost repulsive rate. Neither of the soldier could overlook the fact that it wasn't safe to breathe through the clouds that fell. But the battlefield soon became a desert-like trap which only brought their senses back when it was needed. No sense of smell, no hold on vision, only their brotherhood made them push forward through the terror which had laid into the blanket of the sky which had fallen from above. 'Sir, I think I saw.' 'What was that, soldier? Can you receive me? I asked you for an answer.' There wasn't anything of worth other than the static which went on for a few minutes before stopping. After the connection had been taken away, the next thing happened. Only a few of the men surrounded him, apparently caught of guard by the fact that there wasn't any way to communicate with one another that they hadn't noticed one of the engineers there. Standing near them, blocked by the various winds which had carried the dust and particles which accompanied them was a plane, or at least part of it. Despite being stuck in the same way it had stood, there wasn't a way to break through. 'Sal, open up, open the damn door up.' The shout had been heard but there wasn't any response or any sign of vacancy there. Neither did the image look right in the many ways there had been nor could any explanation do for the fact that the pilot was missing. And worst of all, the cabin hadn't been opened in a long time. 'Come on, the man's shaking, can't you see that's he's in shock? Here, let me get him out.' Another soldier came, turned around his rifle only to break the glass with the back of it. Eight's company was there, while the rest of them were nowhere to be seen. Somehow, they couldn't communicate either, which lead them under the status of being missing in action. 'Help me get him up.' 'Wait, Host, why did the glass break so easily? That's supposed to be manufactured and act as a window against bullets.' 'I don't know yet but I doubt we'll get anything out of him until he get out of his shock.' Bastard, poor thing was shaking thoroughly, having no way of moving whatsoever. He had to be carried a few feet until he stood up on his own. 'No, no, I can't be here, go down, land!' He shouted and fought back before being grabbed from behind and having his arm twisted. It was a damn phonery there with the way in which they had been caught. Without a doubt, many of them were still caught by surprise when they came near. The ones dressed in desert clothes. Every man there knew something had been wrong when the sand came and there had been hard to see. A storm most likely, that would've been the most believable explanation, at least something which could make them go forth and not sink with the rest. Speaking of which, they couldn't have even notice what ran down below, until one shook his leg forth and noticed the stone board upon which they went. 'No, this isn't' It wasn't right indeed but he couldn't make that comment yet, not while they were watching. Every brother in the infantry stood and watched the hooded figures with utmost distrust, to the point where their barrels pointed right below their hoods. Obviously those had been the first non-humans to interact with them properly, and most of all they appeared to be unarmed. 'What do you want? State it loud and clear or we'll shot. Stop right there.' A warning shot came a few feet away from where it stepped. There was a clear attempt to shake it off before regaining the position it took. Everything they did was calculated, from the movement of their hands, their bleakly hands which didn't seem to move at all. Rather something underneath their palms appeared to move, something which would sometimes push until they could be seen from both sides of the hands. Something akin to tongues, they were, but more mobile and far more protected from the sand there. Nothing had been pushed forward but they had to do something there. A quick flicker of the robes they wore revealed some desert travelling nomads who bore some strange garments over collected arms. Most of them had been attached to their armour and stood flaccid over their animated leather chests. The men didn't know what to make out of them, for they appeared to have thought those were of their own species than those of them. No one moved. At least no one until there came the next phase. Most had removed the helmets they bore and revealed some sort of strange deformed head which had pushed forth and forth into the air until they had grown long-beaded tails with stingers. From that point on, they didn't mention of the fact that they had been surrounded. As every single man was focused on the stingers, they had failed to notice how quickly those beings moved. 'Men, shoot. Nail them up, faster!' There desert muffled the sounds of the disaster. Sharp blotches of blood started being pushed out of their bodies, until the point where their strange bodies had become fatter and started taking in the bullets rather than letting them get through. 'Fall back, this isn't working.' Three men had been taken down already. It was clear that they were intelligent since they chose to ignore the engineer rather than immediately murder him. But those fattened coagulated blocks bore with their tiny flattened legs more than it would've been possible for a man to bear. A failure to communicate, as it appeared to be, there was no one left around to give orders to. They were weak, pathetic creatures which couldn't hold against them. And there, one which would've otherwise stood there alone, acting like some sort of servant, only now did he continue going at it at a most peculiar hour. Despite the other ones being of its kind, he pushed them aside and seemed to have changed. From its every side, the open holes where there would've been his arms and legs if weren't for its serpentine body, there came a dreadful approach, four more stings, which pushed through the ground. Its speed was insane, how it moved and hunted, even how it slid its sides to cut down the others because it couldn't bare any other kind of competition. A fruitful approach it seemed, for which there'd be no other kind of excuse, on any other occasion. It bore itself deep and managed to cut down everyone there before they could react. The men were finally spread, trying to get through with their head gear to no avail. 'We have to make it to the tank, if not, that thing will hunt us down one by one.' And what they didn't know if that there, in the storm of dust, covered and hidden away, it sprouted its eye in the middle of the body while it started floating in the sea of sand like some mad starfish which hunted for its prey. More than that, there laid in the dust particles which belong to man. The bodies of those that died long before them were spread through the air, without a way to be there. It was dreadful, leaving them aghast. Some felt the smell of their brethren, while others didn't care enough to be out there. A singular thing came to pass, which had been their need to rest at last. One metal pole, Ryan had noticed. At its top, there hadn't been a light, and most of its insides seemed to have been covered by some kind of spark eating fungus. 'Here, here, I'm Marshall Ryan, I need an immediate extraction, and do you copy? If there's anyone out there beyond the border, my name is Marshall Ryan and I'm in need of an extraction.' This thing isn't even working, is it? With the nasty signs there couldn't have been anything else to note, other than the fact that it was coming. The one thing which had killed his brothers, and he only had enough bullets to fire continuously for a few seconds before he ran out of it. 'I've got no damn cover, do I?' Ryan looked around and seemed to have found the nearest side turned car. Its condition was rather deplorable in terms of neither it trying to resist nor being encased in that solid sand. He took a poke at his own hands and took a glove off, where he saw that underneath his skin, there had been patches of the so-called sand, which had somehow managed to crawl underneath. They were crisp and in a way, such were his face, going by the fact that he felt his cheeks harden at a touch. Was he a man after all then? He asked himself after wiping away some of the sand off the windows and looking inside the car. There had been some sort of mould of a man, which kept his arms and legs partially erect. They didn't let in any kind of sign that there had been life there to begin with. Hell, this could've been some sick kid's fluke by the likes of it. But he couldn't trust it nor could he look away. As soon as he stepped out of his zone, with his hand exposed as well, he blocked. So had the trigger stopped, at the sight of that star, which moved one of its stings and impaled its own eye in a glaze. It was dipped in it and moved slowly, going through the car and immediately melting the metal as if it was nothing to it. An agent in the eye dripped on the ground and appeared to burst through the ground. He could see no eye in the middle but white milk-like teeth grinning and laughing at him. That thing is toying with me and I cannot do anything to stop it. He thought out loud but had attempted little to stop it. He had been frozen, unable to think he dropped his only weapon and knelt away. Bubbles formed in the middle area of the star, and slowly it appeared to be growing another one of its white eyes and gaze into the mad sands. As quickly as that went, the soldier had no hand and half of its body had been encompassed in a white substance which stabilised in time. Minutes after the star left, the pool had hardened and seemed to have given life to the bottom area the man bore. 'They're coming, move it, take away the tank. We need to move the tank away before it comes and destroys it.' 'Calm down soldier, I said calm down before I put you on arrest.' The young kid suddenly stood straight, still afraid of what might happen if he were to turn around. Sounds of agony still reigned in his near memory and he could still feel dread every now and then. 'Well, is there anything you got to say for yourself? You abandoned your brothers, do you understand that what you've done qualifies you as being a deserter?' 'Sir, they're all dead, sir. We were met by something we couldn't face on our own.' 'I don't think they're all dead soldier, not as long as you are standing.' 'We needed the tank, that's our only hope to end it.' 'Lousy wreck of a foot grunt, I should have run in your shorts with nothing but a blunt knife to cut it down for what you've done.' Treacherous soldier, he thought. He ran again without looking back this time. There were doubts in the soldier's mind, but without a doubt, neither would he die for a cause which was unjust, nor would he be mad enough to head on that route and give his life to that thing alone. Silently it came, and no tank would to reign over its own domain. It flew it and only a sting could be seen, flowing through the air and cutting through its metal cover. Much of the metal had come off, and those inside of it could never be accounted of, but those which remained flew at the sight of it. 'Fire, before it notices.' One of the men inside the tank said it, as the sting had only pinched through the hulk and hadn't managed to take all of their lives then. There was some dread involved, but no word yet wasted. He could see and look at it that way, but when the warning shot came, it suddenly retreated. 'Keep at it, I don't think it likes it.' The barrel twisted and soon enough it shot through buildings, having been destabilised enough to bring nothing but ruin there. Despite the fact that there was no smoke or any trail to be seen, its wretched sounds were more than enough to signal them that it was on its way to retreat. And there were others like it, higher above the reaches of man. It flew above and avoided the giant ones who purified the air, coming to a sort of pack, while bumping their forms in the air, their eyes peering below through the storm now. Most of them had noticed how it made and despite the fact that it had been chosen to become greater than his weak brothers, it watched in pain. Their gaze allowed them to see just enough for it to look where it had happened and just how fast it had been. Others around him had went through the same process and came out as vile beasts which managed to bring ruin around them and take as many lives as it was deemed necessary for them to get rid of the vileness which infected them. More so, a wave of ruin had come around the world, which had crushed and smashed the fields and broke whichever machine wasn't strong enough to resist. Horrible, horrible thing, that came to pass, there was a dread, and nothing could bring it closer to the one thing which remained so. 'Look, there's someone there.' Keen observers noticed lost souls. 'I think it's a child, we need to, and we should save her!' But that voice was obscure and now they reigned around the town. Even those tiny beings, dirty as they were had been picked off the ground as those beings came with their desire to bring their vileness near and impale those around them. Defenceless as they were, a man had broken through, not to starve. From underneath their buildings came a tunnel, hand in hand, like miners they had arrive from their abandoned homes to everywhere around the town. 'Who's there? Don't come in, we have weapons. Yes, me and Clowe, we're not letting any of your kind inside, we got more than that, understand me?' 'Ma'am, we're human as well.' The leap of faith between them was rather large but she managed to get through it just fine enough. One thing still came as being unsurprising, which had been the rounded nodes which flashed from every basement. It came to look like the red light of a bunker under siege. 'We brought food. Thank you ma'am for having enough faith to let us come through, I promise you won't regret it.' There was a smile of her face, as this had apparently been one of the more populated homes. They had children, and not only that, but they appeared to be sleeping on the floor. Fresh clean water, actual chicken and pork, vegetables as well, to name a few. It wasn't just their resources they got but also what they had managed to salvage from around the buildings they had managed to invade. 'How did you people get here to begin with? I mean, how did you find those tools, if you don't mind me asking.' 'They're a bunch of simple pickaxes, nothing more, I'd be more surprised if we came here through the sewage system of something similar, for believe me lady, it had crossed our mind.' The men laughed around, but not as loud as to wake those around them. As soon as they gave everything which was needed to be given, they returned to their system. 'Now wait a minute now.' Came one of the residents, having his arms folded around his chest didn't prevent him from bearing a demeaning look on his face. He did look as if he bore a dangerous look on his face, well earned as well. Most of all, he had looked pissed and hurt. One of his eyes had been cut, most likely when he was young, but there was something in that pale eyes. A feeling which couldn't be explained laid there. In its blankness laid evil and anyone who had met his gaze was aware of it, the fear and the distrust, neither of which would end or even creep about. Some words had been exchanged, but as a man, he was deranged. 'What have you done to us down there? What give you the right to mine into another's man's home and put us all in danger? There are things out there that are trying to get it at every moment, so what happens if one of them enters through some house and finds the underground tunnels you made?' 'It's a risk we as well and you'll have to assume in order to have a chance at being set free.' There were mutterings to no end about it, still, the man was suspicious. 'Spend the rest of the day with us, you have to!' 'It's the least we can do for helping us with these.' The kids were extremely excited, especially when it came down to the small cakes which had been brought, and the candy wrappings on the side of that. They couldn't even believe their own eyes. The tunnels were benign though, but not because what they have done, as there was little danger there. Outside, life had been nothing short of close to being damned, entirely and without remorse. Despite the fact that there weren't clouds which fell and crushed the men who broke through and saw with their eyes the extent of the destruction there, nothing changed. There were still cowards and people who hid. Could that have been so bad? Food and water had been sparse and they would have to act like nomads sooner or later, well, at least if there was a chance for them to get through and live. Danger crept inside their minds and suddenly most of it disappeared. It was pushed on by a shortage of normal sounds and the coming of a high pitch that had been almost inaudible if it weren't for the fact that one man stood still. It's been hours since he was out there. Gilligan Mc. Anthony, whom only now touched his ear to notice the trail of blood which dragged itself from his insides to his shoulder, seemed to have been at a loss for words. He had cried as well for the past few minutes in one of the corners of the city. There was a winter on its way but no snow would come, only that petrified sand came. That kept him alive, the thought that there might be a chance for him to get through unhinged. Well enough, he was back on his feed, or might've been. He walked on empty streets and roads carrying some sort of axe, blunted at the edge but sharp enough to cut through the floor. He hadn't come straight through the front door. No, that would've been too easy, instead, he broke through the floor which lay in front of the door, and made his way through by cutting through the wood and smashing through the stone until he ended up in the basement. That way, no one would suspect him, if there were other things inside which were up to something. His hands and body had been rough, but inside there, some of the calcified skin had fallen off, leaving only a weak layer of skin which wouldn't last. Not if he were up to be kept in the same conditions. There was a short intermission in which he ran on the stairs and broke through the door. No one in there, even though the place looked in a great condition, to the point of looking untouched. Anthony turned to take a look and he could only see the light pouring from the hole in its ceiling he had made in order to break through in the house. With it, came that dreadful weather which seemed to pour itself in through any crevice it could find. The dark grey was slowly being encompassed by a fluid brown with dust that immediately started rotting and rusting any object it came in touch. Yet, as he turned towards the door, for which edges weren't completely sealed, as well as at the keyhole, there was room for the dust to settle. But it hadn't. The weather stopped at the door, and as he closed the basement room behind him, he knew that it would somehow stop there as well. Call it a hunch or just a feeling of some sort, but it was true. At least enough to guarantee his own safety if it, but not enough to justify the windows. He had been upstairs and they have been left open. A cold breeze came from it, with little if not, barely a few particles of the solid matter which had been outside. So it wasn't the door which kept it closed, that much he had known, but what then? What could the reason be? Had it been a few minutes already in which he stood there, almost frozen in place? Did he not realise that his limbs had been encompassed in that prison of unmovable dread? Neither his eyes nor his mouth had swelled as hard as he would've expected, but he felt himself entrapped. I was wrong, he thought, I may not see it come inside but it is there, my arms, my limbs, why can't I feel them? Anthony's mind went through some changes when the horrible high pitched noise came there again. Everything blanked in the few moments he got himself back together and jumped towards the window. It was closed, the damn thing had closed itself. 'I almost died because of you.' He said it with a grin, opening up to some kind of laughter. A few minutes had been displayed in his mind, but it looked as if he hadn't closed the window with his bare hands alone, but likely with the help of the axe. Tiny cuts which looked like bone fractures were engraved inside the window frames and it appeared then that there was a strange desire to get open it and get through. He had thought about it way down, after checking each room there, the shell of a man that he was. Dreading for a body that was whole helped him remember the fact that he had been missing pieces of himself because of the exposure. There were other things around the place, far more dangerous than the rotten food. Something was inside him, he knew that. However it had reached the insides of his cranium that was unknown. Little was known of the whereabouts of his family and his friends, anyone there. 'Are you listening to me?' Said a voice, rather, a thin sounding frail woman who lay at the back of a closed door. He held an axe and could easily break through. Would he wait for her to open up? Or could it be that she might've suffered just enough? He was already half-way down the stairs, on his way to get as far away as he could with little interest in trying to convince her of anything. As long as she was in there and he was out, there wasn't enough time to convince her to do otherwise. But the door opened and she came out. Thin as she was, and old, she walked with a cane but bore something which didn't belong. Her facial holes had been sealed, the mouth, the eyes, and the nostrils, all of which had been closed. In the middle of the face there had been a cut though, which almost split the face in half but was deep enough and black to be some kind of crater which would've been found in the ground rather than inside the face of such an old woman. 'Do not leave me.' The voice which came out was deep, though he had known that he wasn't thinking of getting near her. Not in the least, that thing was turning into a beast right in front of him. Long fingers stretched and fell, leaving two hands with holes in them. With the voice that came from its inside, he could feel his ears bleed from the moment it started shedding its disguise. Was that the source of that dreadful sound? The high pitch which crushed his mind? 'Leave me there, I want to take the nearest turn.' He couldn't believe what he said or where he stood. Another piece of his memory wiped. The passage in which he went through was dark, tight, but he followed the trail on the ground. Rust could be seen across the walls, the lights were fading, if he weren't to get closer, he would get no other way to see. Behind him, there it was, looking for him, the same old woman, blinded, apparently, crying in its pitch aloud. While he turned, he only saw a pitch, some kind of reflection, for which there'd be no other direction for him to take, at least no for his own sake. Misery was quite right, he followed the trail, only to be led to another room, for which key he had in his hand. There had been a man's finger attached to it, which shocked him instantly. And before it could hit the ground, the finger simply froze in mid-air and stood there, as if there had been another layer of air, or some invisible thing which kept it floating. His eyes reddened, Anthony appeared to have tried pushing the key in, looking behind faithfully in order to judge whether or not the old woman would come towards him. It wasn't there any longer. That's when he decided it would've been better to get through the door and lock him in rather than do anything else. There were mysterious deeds which would go unnoticed but neither of them would be at the same level as the one he would've expected them to be. Rather poignant, inside, there had been more men standing in chairs, glazing their eyes as they would prepare themselves to be drained. Atop, on the ceiling, there was a pool, a transparent foolish thing, with a longue tongue which acted like a leash and pushed in from time to time into a man. Skulls and ribs, most of the broken bones laid inside of it, surrounded by bubbles as they would be broken apart. Most were rather happy and discussing with one another as if nothing was happening to others around them. Anthony was shocked by the merry men who spoke and drank from empty glasses. 'Shall we be near the field of Oxburry course, lad? Will you see to it that Marry knows I wish her the best and well?' 'Right, O' course, Mr. O'Brian, I'll tell her immediately, she'll know. Her sheep need be tending after all, and there's nothing that would cheer up her day more than knowing you still think of her from time to time.' 'That's a good lad, I say, that's a good lad.' His vision was encompassed of green, for as far as he could see, there were the fields, with a simple cottage behind his back, and the tavern in which the others gnawed. But he could see no stranger, hear him but feel. That there was something there which disturbed him still. Anthony was still confused, as in one moment he was shaking the man and in the other he was standing in the chair. A tongue was rubbing around his cheeks and on his face that of which repelled him to the point where he pushed himself away and came to his senses. 'Get off me you damned pool. What happened to the old man? And the young man he was talking to?' There had been empty chair and seeing how it had passed the spots where they had been, he could only assume the worst. He had to get away, those people were mad. Each single one of them who stood in their chairs had become mad in some sort of bizarre way. It felt like they were trying to emulate what it felt like being human subconsciously while their minds were altered in the utmost tainted fashions. Most of all some had been afraid. Words couldn't describe what they felt, but that thing above them could. He pushed through the door and left them to their fate. 'Leave me be, I want to get through this nightmare and return to my place of refuge.' As he closed the door, there hadn't been guilt he felt for them, for he turned to another room, this one being bigger. This was a different pool altogether, which had grown so large, that it kept releasing droplets from its inside and into the ground. There are only a few words which can describe what was going on and neither of them were nigh. Those who had been there for a long time had small boxes attached to the lower sides on their bodies, going all the way into a floor as it had its tubes entering each man and on the rare occasion he saw one, each woman's privates. Anthony had guessed that sooner or late they would have to take care of their needs and all that work he noticed wasn't done by the pools. Someone or something was helping it and he was aware that they'd return. He crawled at the sight of the suited creep who had come in the room. Would he be found if he had stood in the empty chair? Could he even differentiate the thought from the action any longer? In that case, he hadn't, as he found himself sitting in the chair, with his arms upheld in the strangest manner he could have place them in. From the sides, his retina and eyes were going crazy, at least, it looked as if the colour was going to run out and his eyes were only an image of static caught in constant motion, unable to be figured out. And it had been much worse from his side, of that he had been aware. There were a few things. Words entered his mind, and they were kind of obscure in nature, if he even heard them well enough, as it had become hard to make anything sound right with your ears filled with coagulated blood. Hardened and unaware, Anthony turned his head around. 'Where is he hiding?' Whatever he had seen entering the room in order to check for the ones which had been taken appeared to have gone away. But standing there had been bad for him, especially since the pool above him kept salivating but hadn't dared touch him. From behind, he glanced at the chair only to see a set of tiny arched pointers, sharp, rounded but not quite like needles, for they had been much thicker. Other than the pressure which had been felt underneath his body, he had remained unaware of any other alteration which had been done to him. Unaware of the fact in regards of having remained the same was a whole deal on its own, one of which would have to wait until he had escaped. Alas, a hand grabbed him as the moustached creep revealed himself. He had been frail, dark, bore a pair of crooked teeth as well, and the clothes he bore could no longer be recognised since they had been partially disintegrated by the pool. Part of them had joined its skin and seemed to have lain there, quite attached to him in that unnatural fashion. What was more disturbing wasn't that he had one of his eyes missing, but that Anthony decided to help him. The old man hadn't the chance to scream as he grabbed him and tried pulling him away. But the frail thing had been far too unsure, and hadn't expected to have been weakened as much as it had been. No longer a man, though a body now lay on the floor after it had been ripped in halves by a man's strength. 'They'll notice you if they decide to come in this way, I need you. I have to take put you back, old thing.' Carefully he shoved the bones which fell on the floor in the lower abdomen. 'Don't let me rot in here, I don't want to be taken yet.' The old man continued. Whatever the pool had done to him, or whether it was the chair, the lower half spoke to him, if he heard it well. It even moved hands and flashed his guts on the floor as they wriggled in their wormish way. Its crooked teeth desired meat but it wasn't strong enough as to force anyone to get it. Clearly there were only a few words between them there, as from a man to what it had become, but he couldn't risk having it make noise. It was hard enough placing it back on its spot, but he was at least aware of the consequences, if any, there'd be. 'Well, this is it, you won't be able to feel or say anything now that I have your jaw in my arms. I think it's pointless for you to try grasping for my arm now, you had your chance, but you wasted your strength when my attention shifted near you.' That had to be it, not a single sign of regret. He clenched his fist with what had been left of its head, crushing the front area instantly, with half of its brain as well, if that wouldn't do, and then he didn't know what it might. Both arms which had held on his suddenly released and it was almost as if a burden had been lifted off his shoulders. 'How many of you are awake or aware this is going on?' He hadn't asked himself whether or not he'd want to check or free anyone there. Plenty of them were weak and breaking apart, even those who had been aware of it going on, but that hadn't impeded his desire to get out. There'd be no doubt about it, not as he went to the nearest door. Another one of those it seemed. Anthony had come into a control room. From the short-view he had, it looked as if there had been only two big controlling panes and the giant tubes attached to them which both descended and ascended into their respective sides. How many of them were there? Clearly, there had been some of them above as well as below. That was undeniable. But how had he stumbled there and why were there so many of them taken so, loudly? There had been a loud sound which couldn't be denied. As soon as he came near the door and looked at what was going on it seemed like one of the pools had lowered itself over a few human bodies and made itself a body to walk with. That had been generous of itself, in the way it walked and dragged itself not like a man but as some kind of four legged octopus which struggled on the shores and out of water. It touched others on its way but didn't seem to have any consideration or mind for those it pushed around, as the pool had become aware of Anthony's existence and desired nothing less but his murder. Not only that, but going by the scent, which was anything but absent, it found him rather easy not to miss and detect, even though he was inside the room, afraid and unable to escape. 'Where is it? I need a way, where could you be?' Anthony asked himself being unaware of any of his surroundings. It could burst through the door at any moment there, and as soon as that happened, it would be over. Think Anthony, what can you do about it? Don't let it in yet, I still have time to think about it. He was rather absent in thought though and it happened for him to already forget what happened before. Despite his anxious mood, he found himself hiding between the cables and holding each of them as tightly as he could. It had broken through already and mostly stood there confused as it dripped on the floor. Obviously, it couldn't hold on its form for too long, at least not without some kind of difficulty there. It wouldn't dare push through the cables and risk denying the others their meal as well. There'd be an investigation in any case and he wouldn't even dare to think about what would happen if he were to snap one himself. 'It left, that had been close.' He said, while seeing that there was a way down. The only path he had seen so far, being nothing else but the hole through which the cables went, with a simple reminder in mind. Do not disturb the pools any longer, as they appear to be far craftier than one may think. With that alone, he went on, pushing the other cords apart in order to slip through easier. Anthony could see that after he got through the tunnel, he was presented with a space unlike any another. It felt like he could swing from cord to cord and still couldn't managed to touch any of the walls, if there had been any down there. He slid while holding in and remembered the sensation he felt while creeping inside the room. There wasn't any other way to get through, at least none other which excluded forcing your way through, with the help of sweat and a tiny amount of pain. Inside the room there were some strange details he would've wished not to notice. Both of the panels which would've been mirrored otherwise if it weren't for the fact that they had switched position had been caved in, battered and broken. Little doubt remained of the fact that they were still functional or not. But one important aspect which could be undeniable was the fact that the something had ripped it and threw it against the door. 'I'm Anthony, can you hear my voice? Are there any survivors?' Entering the room was proved to be something done with ease, as he only had to leap over the board and travel inside. There were other things which left him estranged. It was his mind, he hadn't even noticed the fact that he bore a lamp in his hand, which was connected to a long cord from the ceiling he had come out of. How had he got it in the first place? Anthony must've found it somewhere and attached it to an unneeded cable that had to be it. At least that's how his mind dictated it. The weird thing wasn't that he held it but rather that it seemed to have entirely attached itself to his left hand, not to mention that he had stopped feeling anything regarding his fingers. Tiny amounts of pressure in the floor, no corpses, just a vague ruin of signs of a fight which had taken place a long time ago. Something badly scented down there, it would appear that he was indeed going far deeper below that he had expected. Half of the room had been submerged into water and yet he wanted to go forth, not with the light, either, as he'd need it no more. There were a few things he feared as much as the depths without a way to see of help himself but he had been there, the broken man that had been even more broken by the device. A few of his thumbs had their soles missing, to the point where he had believed that the lighter had eaten them and would've continued with his hand. Openings here and there, in the nearest walls, as it appeared to be hard to look through the veils of the depths. He had entered one of them and was pleasantly surprised, as it lead to a small cove with air in it. 'You're survivors, I knew there'd be some.' He spoke as his vision adapted, mere moments in which he waited and had raised his hopes up thinking there'd be some. No, no, this can't be either, not after this mess. Blunt hands came and brushed over the bodies. The cove was filled with far too many snails for him to count, but he had been cold and hungry and felt nothing else but his primal instincts taking over. Clothes were ripped out of the bodies, a fire had been made and there wasn't anything for him to eat there other than the snails. And they tasted awful, especially their chewy texture and how it appeared to seep between his teeth. More awful things happened there, as he didn't seem to trust his eyes any longer. The open bottom from which he had come from appeared to have sealed itself immediately. There was no way out any longer. His hands were trembling at the edge of the noise. Anthony had made a fire and appeared to draw in as much of the smoke as he could. Soon enough, he would gorge on the snail, taking in as many as ten or twenty at a time, trying not to smoke and waited there, in his sealed cave. Perhaps he knew, perhaps he hadn't, but there wasn't an escape for him and what he failed to realised that in minutes he was no longer in control. As he stood on the floor, he had been covered in mucus and eaten in turn by the snails. His throat had become a bulk from all of those which had been eaten raw and remained alive. They had snuck back out in an attempt to escape but managed instead to cause him to choke. Most of the mucus had spilled near the flame and managed to blow it away. Fear consumed some above, in the sector where they had no way of knowing. 'Sitting in the chair, sitting in the chair, how come my turn came?' It was too soon, and above of her there had been a most peculiar one. Unlike the others which had been clear and transparent, this one was dull and red. It was blood, most likely as well, as it seemed to take pleasure, if it was capable of feeling it, through the most peculiar matters. The room she saw herself in was something rather regal but dark, akin to some personal dungeon the monarch took pleasure while his servants had been busy taking care of their tasks. Only that, there had been teeth above her, attached to the pool, pushing forward in the most peculiar manner. As a matter of fact, she knew very well what would happen if she came to it, alas, caught. She wouldn't get together, but managed to free herself from the chair in time. Those tongues seemed not only to want to push her to the edge but even strangle her. And most importantly, the pool hadn't been keen on the fact that she had escaped. Rather, it foamed, having some of the blood fall on the chair she had been and marking it. If it were for her to even return to this place, it would be waiting for her. One thing though, still disturbed her. It was the marks around her neck, which had been a few inches in. Some of the blood on the chair had been hers most likely, which only added insult to injury but little doubt. At least, she thought of it while leaving those around her and going out of the first room she found herself in. The nightmare would never end. Even there, there had been room after room of the poorly lit dungeon she had walked into and too many of those pools above of her. What were they for? She couldn't tell, nor would she walk on anything but the room's edges. Looking at her wrist made her question her role there and how she. How she had come from there to the outside, on the common grounds. There were people around her who seemed to mind their own business, some which were looking at her with the most peculiarly questioning eyes. It was mostly her clothing which were both uncommon and which had become rags. 'Young lady, are you all right?' 'Don't turn around, please don't turn around, oh please don't do it. She kept telling herself that, only after she noticed that a few inches of her back were missing, in a uniform manner, to such extremes that it looked as if someone had taken a knife and chopped a good chunk of her. From inside there were various small thin arms moving around inches in the yellow murk they moved in. Just what were they and why was it melting in such a manner? How was she able to see the woman's back like that and not be disturbed. It had been obvious since she kept switching from one of the other ladies and her. Dianne knew what might just happen if she were to give in and ask for any kind of help. Instead she looked around. They were in a low rotten village, near plains that stretched as far as she could go, without having anything on her, of course, her journey would be cut in half or even a quarter in as she fell in the cold. And it was cold there, for what she wore. 'Poor thing, are you hungry, thirsty? Why don't you come in with us, you'll feel better.' 'I couldn't disturb your business like that, and I don't have the means to repay you any other way.' 'Oh but don't worry about that, you gorgeous bird in rags, we'll take care of everything. You won't have to worry of a thing.' As if she hadn't known the woman was wrong, most of all that they were all wrong in one or more ways. Their eyes were too far apart or too close, others moved in disturbing ways which weren't like anything a human walked like. Despite avoiding direct eye contact, there was this impression which was left by them, that behind their globes there had been some long arm-like tendons playing them like a bunch of strings, while pushing them around. It wasn't something she wanted to experience of look at, since she bore her head on her shoulders. They were hoarding animals it appeared, sheep, cows, pigs and what not, and judging by how healthy they looked, there wasn't anything she would do or say. Her tongue was missing, as well as pieces of her nails. What had happened? 'What's that my dear?' The high pitched sound came from outside. It acted like some kind of toxin to her own ears, in the way it pushed to the point of having messed with her insides a lot. She wasn't the only one affected. The table she stood at had been filled by what had dripped out of their ears, seemingly so since they have stood there with their heads inclined. Most of their eyes were going a bit vaguely mad, as they almost came out of their irises and pushed forth tiny wormish figures. 'Oh, dear, this is quite the mess we made. Would you be so kind as to help us clean this?' 'Of course I would, after all, I think I'm just as responsible for this mess as well.' 'Nonsense my dear, you've got nothing to be ashamed of, it just so happens that this kind of spill comes quite regularly around here. Worry not about it.' With which she nodded and appeared to have bowed. There was something wrong, with her little insight into which what made her think it was wrong being there, mostly it had been her intuition that held her aloft. As they made their way around and started bringing what was to be had, she noticed that there was something wrong about the meat. It was spoiled, in such a way that its insides were just as sickly looking as the back of one of the old grannies. There wasn't anything more dreadful she could watch, but there was one thing she would do. That of which was eating the spoiled meat and actually come to enjoy it, without being aware that what she ate had been alive. Few words could describe the taste as well as the warm feeling she felt inside of her after each bite as she crushed those tiny legs and malnourished green mandibles that weren't fully formed. Such a thing had been the greatest thing she ate, while unaware of it, she had been slowly changing for the worse. Most of her bodily composition had already been altered past anything which could be remotely being called that of a human being. Not that she cared, that they all acted like insects there. Without the realisation that she was still bleeding out of her ear, she had awakened out of the stoop, looking at the table as they had been eating out of the one old lady which had been opened to begin with. Either she had been prepared to be served all this time or this was an utmost dreadful consequence of being exposed for far too long. But she had been eased into devouring the meat, and this had only been the natural next step. There hadn't been any remains as they had been done eating her bones and the mucus between the joints that held her together. Had there been another on then? What stood in front of them, on the table was one of the remaining ones, leaving only this dinner between the two. 'Aren't we supposed to stop? Who's going to take care of the animals after we eat her? I'm not sure the two of us can handle that alone?' 'Oh, my poor, poor dear, do not worry about that thing, it won't be the two of us who're taking care of them, that role will be solely yours.' How had it happened that she was there, all filled, unable to think or see clearly, unable to remember the outcome of her getting through the gate and into their home. She had clearly not intended to eat them all, nor had she agreed to have the last one presenting herself on the table in order to be devoured. After all, she had been rather full. 'I do not think I can do it anymore. You won't be able to fit in, I'm afraid.' As soon as she looked down, at what she had become, she almost burst out in tears. Her limbs had fattened, grown and seemed to have lacked the toes. It was that burst in mass that caused her to lose all her clothing and realise in just how dire of a form she was in. Her skin would darken to a brown, her teeth fell out and instead of the soles of her feet, two openings formed only to leave out the pus and other toxins into the bile. Such vicious bile she produces then, that it felt as if the entire room had been bathed in pheromones. There was something about the way that spread and seemed to get into every crevice and every single possible entryway there was. She hadn't had shoulders any longer, just the mere extension which dragged over her ears. That bleeding she had regularly out of her ears, had turned internally rather than any other way. Feeling rather weak, she crossed her legs without the realisation that they had moulded themselves together as soon as they touched. Out of her fillings though there came another set of partially soft, but hardened tissue which appeared to creep out and crush the remains which had once laid in front of her to nothingness. Two sides of her face split as far as she could open the extension of her head, in order for her to open up and devour what was left of the creature which had lain in front of her. Most of her surroundings were no longer inside a house, but some kind of lair which had been made out of her own vicious slime, that spread around and infected everything. What have I done? She thought to herself as she crawled in perhaps the utmost repulsing manner she could do it in. Her body got elated as she pushed herself through the barn and near the animals. How she wanted more, oh, that feeling which wasn't of hunger but a deep desire to be even more degenerate and have herself in every single one of them. That was it, the thing she had desired most, from the insides there came two more hands which were made out of her real bones. Somewhere deep in her mass, she knew there was still something of her old body. But those thoughts weren't hers. And worse than that, it wasn't her actual bones, but some kind of poor imitation which was there only to give her some hope, as soon as they stretched forward, she had become aware that something was wrong. They were far too long and too mobile to be the ones she had previously had, not to mention that the claws had more than five fingers on each hand. Yet, she paired herself with the animals as they were all dragged until they stood together in her own curling ball of bile. They had become rather nice decorations there, not entirely dead, but in a strange matter of being alive. Most of her teeth had become long and the internal bleeding which had come from her ears flooded her mind. Another one came, a flat blotting man with the same appearance and who moved into the same manner. The main difference was the fact that he looked worse for the wearing, having grown thin because something had pierced it, which was obvious from the trail he left behind. 'Help us, we're in need.' With which it died at her gates, suddenly deflating into a mass of remains which had been covered and hidden by all the fat. It was a curious thing, at least one altogether because she didn't know what to make of it. Either she'd place herself in danger or she could stay there in her farm and be safe. Despite the change, this looked as if it might be some kind of life worth living, even though it would have to be spent alone. Was that kind of danger worth it? Apparently so, since she was already dragging herself and grasping for something in order to move faster than the way she had it on. Most of all, there was something inside her moving. Something was growing without her being aware of its presence. At the point where she had found where they were supposed to be, in some kind of limestone quarry, which had fissured in and left the top of it exposed, she went inside only to find that it had been made into a passage. Farther away inside of it, where stone had been fleshed out into a softness which disgusted even her in the current form she was in, at least she had become aware where she was going towards. Plenty of small eyes were watching her from the flesh. Those weren't natural, she knew after going through a shortage of light and coming out of them only to find out that she was covered by it. Artificial in nature, those eyes provided her no vision whatsoever and no need to look in any other way, as they were meant for their own as they watched from every direction possible. How many of them are there on me? She asked herself as she tried pulling one out. It was a pure meaningless action which bore nothing then and there, as her oily fingers slipped against the roundness of the pupils and fell around. A maw opened around, and in the dark there were some kind of limp limbs moving, towards which she wouldn't dare come any near out of her own fear. But into one of the arrays of light she stopped and a disembowelled giant frog-like creature approached. It leaped from above and was nothing but wet, dirty and afraid. Yet it bore a grin which extended and seemed to be moving still, on the inside and the outside. At least, there had been some kind of nuisance around, for she had been aware of the things in front of her was not only unnatural, as to square out the fact that it had been a giant frog, but to take into account the fact that it bore too many legs and tails and its head had been opened. The skull seemed to have taken the blows, but not the same could be said about the lower torso which had been completely open. Well, the thing was that it hadn't looked like it was suffering, rather, it had been delighted. No blood came out but that was only because those organs wanted to be out, you could hear them from its own mouth. One malformed mouth lie in the intestines and spoke while the other one kept grinning unaware at most. 'Who's done this to you?' 'Well, my serving body of course, honoured thing, you wouldn't happen to be kind enough to give us directions, would you? I assume you're here for one purpose only and it has to do with your kind being in need of help, would that be correct?' 'I wager it is, but what can you offer me which may help me there? The things are foreign to me, and I have little knowledge of them as it is despite having become like them.' The thing had grown inside itself for moments before turning towards grinning as itself. 'Pull another one from above and drag it in the light. It should know much more than I do.' And with that, she seemed to have taken the very teeth that most likely tore through the belly and opened them outside, rather to have been made by blows alone. 'Nasty, nasty parasites, they are. I heard you well, you want to join them, do you? Better be prepared for those that are against them only came to it because they had been cheated by them. Nasty things, spitting their bile at everything and expecting to have it all handed on the platter.' There was a clear tone of anger and derangement which could be plainly felt. It could chew through her undoubtedly if it were to it. 'Wait, don't go, I have noticed something of you. We see through his eyes as well and, let me, I mean, allow me to join you now, that's what I ask of you. The two of us may have a chance together.' She looked at it in a manner of consideration that lasted for as long as it was there. The procedure would be kind of painful for both of them but what had she to gain? Those tiny eyes had already spread a shallow dark pigmentation around her body, so this may as well be the only addition she had control over. 'Very well, I shall accept your offer. Know this, before you join me, that I am in control. No one else shall take any decision other than I, do you understand?' The mouth only smiled and waited to be ripped out. This had clearly been its favourite part since it grinned the whole time and desired it in a supreme sense. As for the ordeal, the guts easily came off with the frog-thing protesting little at the pain. It hadn't thought of anything at all, as a matter of fact she wasn't even aware if it thought of it in any sort of way. Had the dumb thing noticed anything or was it just a slave to its guts? The wonder faded as soon as the guts crawled inside of her, dissolving pieces of it until it had become indistinguishable from her worm-like body. It looked as if the extra mouth belonged to her and in a strange way, it had. 'Pull one of my brothers out, I have one last thing to tell them.' It was there, the last one which would see him, mouth to mouth, with dirty teeth crawling out and the utmost decency while they would pass one another. In the matter of a few second, words had been exchanged of the direction they would have to take. Though what the woman had said to them had been rather alarming, especially since she had described the place she had been in and what they had been doing with its prisoners. As soon as she was done they had departed. Her skin had become tanned from the sun, by the time she had managed to come out of the passage, there was nothing to them but the irregular shared body and the nest which had been under siege. Some signs had lain, as if there had been a fire recently, through which they had bore holes through the various tunnels dug up there.

It looked as if down there laid an entire colony of the sorts. One against which there wasn't a way she'd be invited. The upper side of her body had started flaking away until she looked like a marsh worm. The mouth spoke. 'Well, are we going to enter or not? I do not like being kept waiting, do you hear me?' 'Loud and clear, but what do you want of me there? I don't know the answer myself and I'm rather afraid.' 'Expect nothing but misery down there, as you will feel unwelcome by the dead and the wretched.' 'Have you any experience inside the nest then?' 'Indeed I have, dear, for that is no nest alone, but the centre of trade between various tribes. Do not be distracted by the bile outside, for, that's done only by the grunts and no one else. The ruling class bear bodies which are solid and large, they bear claws and many heads which had been collected and brought back to life.' 'The bodies of whom?' There was a sinister tone when the mouth spoke of the ones in charge as well. Not like she had felt in danger until then, but there was that awareness of whole thing which made her want to return. Had it been worth it until then? She couldn't say but keep crawling and dragging her body. One thing, before she could be answered. 'Aren't I like them as well? I mean a grunt, a worm-like creature, a lowborn of the sorts?' 'No. You are different, being part human, in time perhaps, you shall hatch and become something else, something.' Something not even the mouth dared speak of then. Her bowels opened right in time and from underneath there came a pair of socketless heads which bore long legs. It was unexpected then but appeared to ease the walk. 'Have you felt it already?' As she looked behind, she saw a pair of sagging necks which stretched all the way back. Somewhere from down under, she bore joints which kept her legs together. Nothing would have her fall apart, which was fair enough. The inside appeared to be dangerous and unexpected. It was no nest in terms of something close to some kind of simple hole but a bridge which lead them into an underground valley. Various tall structures had been built for no purpose whatsoever since their entrances were closed. But there it was, as the mouth had said and promised, corpses spread on every side. It had been dark above the valley where she stood, but down there, towards the very edge of the point towards where she had been looking at, she noticed something dreadful and become afraid. 'It's not safe to wait on the bridge, you must travel to the other side.' 'Are we going to do this then? Both of our lives are at stake now and I do not know whether or not I can make myself responsible for yours as well.' There was some kind of trepidation there, a fear of the kind, but they made it there as well. As she knelt and watched, holding on the stone pieces under her as well as she could, it was then that she noticed. Most of the field below had been cleansed and instead of it there had been trails of ashes from where the fire had been. Even now, what she thought to be torches at first glance had been nothing but the fires left. A screech came and she turned her gaze. A single attacked a sturdy being which bore its own neck by its teeth and came with a pair of long claws that had an awfully long attachment to its leg muscles. Its red carapace had the texture of some rotten fruit. Small hole-like domes lay inside of it, which appeared to go as deep as a finger tip. Otherwise, there was no focus on that deadly cadaverous beast, which seemed to have been ripped apart but came to attack. From both corners of its mouth, as it started foaming, there was blood being spat on her and not just a tiny amount. This monster had spat at least a gallon of blood on her, marking her with the stench before missing a hit which would've beheaded her from her throat to an all around circumference of the body. Though it had missed, the strike hadn't gone array as it cut through stone and revealed just how deviant and dangerous this had been. Its tiny head was splotching with some kind of acid as well, now that the blood had been entirely thrown. Perhaps that action may have been unintended, as it looked sick. But neither was it sick enough to lie and died there nor would it simply stop. On the grip of the moment, it raised a claw and chopped the lower half of its body, now crawling at a speed which almost made it deadly. She leaped and came down upon its arms with her tainted pair of headed legs and crushed it slowly with her body. 'Do not get up until it had properly suffocated or you won't see an end to it.' 'What was wrong with it? Why is that it turned out that way? Take a look at the rest of its body, this thing has taken too much abuse for something like it to live.' 'Worry not about it but for yourself, for you're in danger.' It had come right before the snap below her, as it had become apparent that she had broken its neck. Dreadful, dreadful night, oh how much I must suffer the wait! The eyes looked in every direction afraid, for she had decided to spend the night into a hut, having set a fire, she had been cooking the remains for the last hour or so. 'Nomq, that's what it is, in case you were wondering, mouth.' 'I wasn't interested in trivialities, Nomq, only on the meat I started smelling rightfully above the fire. A part of which may belong to me.' There was enough for both of them, even though she had no way of knowing where the meat would go after being eaten by the mouth. In no way was it connected to her guts, which meant that it could just have ended being thrown inside her and rot. But at least, as much of a hindrance that mouth was, its voice or presence had brought a stop to the sound and internal bleeding she felt every time that noise came. Regardless of it being a consequence or not, both of them ate the meat, which tasted most exquisite. 'Bring me closer to the edge, I wish to feel the air on my lips.' The wind was indeed stronger as they approached one of the cliffs. Words could not describe the feelings they felt, nor how fearful Nomq was to enter the gate. Down there, she loomed over the entrance of a deeply set shallow mine, inside of which there could be nothing more but to deny the entrance to the point where they had to go was nothing short of sacrilege. The night had come, they had devoured and burying the bile which she had regurgitated from inside her body before returning to the damned sleep. Bloody wash covered her and would draw in more of them. But no, no, throughout the night, she found out that it was not for other members of their tribe to find her, but a punch of pheromones which drew in insects to nest inside her body and bite. It had to be endured during the night, for those would be the only few hours she'd get. And it was a night where she dreamed of being a girl, unchanged, human again. One of walking through green fields and drawing in good air, but not this! A few hours passed before she woke up worked and still groaning.

From the looks in her eyes, the bloodshot small black spheres, one could draw in the grogginess which had accompanied her mind as she carried on. Words couldn't describe what was going on in her mind, nor the many woes which had been felt at the corpses. 'Those are the ones I was talking about.' But those vile grunts, the workers were nothing like her, but rather starved men, humanoid if it weren't for some disgusting features which had changed them and almost gave the appearance of blind subterranean strain or race. 'Are those the ones?' 'Indeed they are, but they had been flayed away and their outer skin had been taken as a prize. It looks like there had been a struggle between the workers and their master.' Small wooden bars seemed to have been placed everywhere. It looked like many of them had been struck in the process of carving through stone and readying themselves to create a kingdom. 'So what pulled them in? You know, like that one which attacked us. Was it a debt, or rivalry?' 'Could it be that even underneath that one, there had been a man who had attacked us? She knew that the mere thought of her having eaten human meat was somewhat wrong and brought her only misery but this had been ridiculous. They weren't human, neither of them, only their corpses looked vaguely so, but in rest she woke up to the reality of things. 'The reasons are unknown and frankly you shouldn't care. What's important is that they came to sack their place and they appeared to have succeeded.’ ‘So they’re not here any longer, that’s what you’re saying.’ ‘I do not know as we had only been passing it by when we decided to return and bumped into you.’ There had been plenty of signs related to the danger out there which had been ignored. Somehow, they would have to get through the fact that there could possibly be no survivors down there, at least not on the field itself. Plenty of signs down there made it appear as if it had been more of a slaughter than a fight. ‘Look at those pile of corpses, can you believe it happened here less than a few hours ago?’ ‘How would you happen to know the exact time?’ ‘I guess I cannot answer that, can I?’

Nomq left out a nervous laughter but seemed surprised at the mouth. She would be in peril soon enough if measures weren’t to be taken in order to assume her protection. There were a few times she looked around before deciding to go in. A few moments in front of it made her realise that there were no simple worms. No, the mouth had been wrong about them being flayed. Nothing which was as tainted as that, as fat or as slow could’ve built the entrance and what lay inside. The reddish rocks appeared to have been mined in and as they went deeper, it started getting harder. But she was set on that, mostly on the fact that they were men, they had to be and she was surer on it than anything else. Small crypt-like spikes were left in bulks around the walls, as to scare any of the intruders. ‘That hadn’t worked so far, has it? It didn’t manage to stop any of them from coming inside.’ There were a few corpses laying around, grouped in piles, while they bore the marks of the ones being cut. Clearly, something with claws had tried carrying them there while doing more damage in the process of cutting their limbs. The thing was, as she had thought about it, both sides were humanoid, yet they fought for no reason at all, but the territory. It had been sickening thing which lead to the deaths of many on either side, as she noted the corpses of the opposition. ‘Look at those red ones impaled in rocks, I could sense their scent even from here?’ Clear signs of pain had shown but not because of that, but because something much worse. From above of it, tiny drops of hot magma dripped on its shoulder, glazing and melting its carapace and body as it went through. ‘That looks rather dangerous.’ ‘It’s about to get hotter as we head deeper inside.’ And that was a promise in itself that she dared not name any conquest against.

She had dreaded fire and light and seemed to have been pulled towards cold and dark places. Half of one approached, cut by another claw. It grasped for anything to launch itself against but she wouldn’t let him. There was the clear human will and the need to push forward she herself had once known, but it had been wasted on this abomination. No amount of cruelty was enough to prevent her from crushing its skull after an immediate leap. Better safe than risk having one of her legs being cut off while she was distracted by the smoke coming out from between the cracks. It appeared to be hard to breathe around there, her lungs dealt with it in an utmost concrete manner, breaking the air apart and allowing her to survive. Most likely, her outside skin had looked like a broom which had been used to clean a chimney by now, but she doubted that this subtle changed made any difference when it came to the fiery thing. ‘Just what are they doing?’ ‘Don’t raise any noise, or they might notice you.’ Those were the first signs that there were living things around there. Past the carved corridor there were workers who kept doing what they were great at, sculpting. But they didn’t stop as that dark stone, the dark men had used the corpses, which had been impaled to sculpt features and make them akin to sculptures as they jointed the walls. ‘They’re not as I am but I can see some similarity which had been kept.’ For those men used a different kind of bile, one of which had spanned around the heat and magma, which encased everything in a hardened layer which wouldn’t melt under any condition. The same layer coated their bodies, yet they moved. Not only that, but she had realised that they were hidden ones standing on the walls. 'Look, they're here, and there and everywhere. You don't suppose they're still alive.' 'Do you smell the corpses as well?' It felt as if those red insects had been stopped and killed entirely, as the head of their chieftain, who had been one of the bigger ones rested at the top of the pile they were taking body parts from in order to tie them to the wall. A few hours ago, it had happened, as well as she had been concerned. The halls were tight and the steam coming from the inside had become thin as soon as it had come. A small tribe was driven in by their leader, a bulky bloated neck which had grown so big that it connected to the legs and arms. It hardened to the point when such a violent thing should've had no sense or right to exist. Even its long claws had hardened and fattened to the point where they lost their sharpness and got replaced by blunt fat, which had been previously used to inflict trauma upon the lower beings. But they were on a territory they hadn't been aware of. The rising temperature presented a conflict which wouldn't do for anything else but encourage them to push back for a retreat. A roar came from inside. Neither of them moved nor attempted to put an end to it and flee. Only a handful of workers were around there, perhaps the same workers which had remained there, later carving their stones. They thought they would be able to pick on them as they were nothing but easy prey, but their strength came in the fact that they were only a few of them around there. Nothing could be lost. Nothing could go to waste, at least not as long as there was work to be done. When they approached, the workers had become alert, for as weak as they appeared to be, there was some fierce spirit in them. From above they seemed to peers at the way in which the ceiling would shift around with head and dread. Neither of them would've been able to handle it if they were sons of men. But their long hands reached and started scratching and pulling aside hot rocks until the rooms around them almost pushed from every side, like some knuckle pushed the walls inside a chest, or a hearth crushing from their west. They were at a loss, for the heat was awful, infernal to take. Rocks started melting and coating them in a terrible manner rather than granting them protection. 'Mygoh yaar waar bagohr.' Yelled the leader, in a dreadful tone, before the hall released and they were lead on. It felt like in a window of a few seconds, many of them died and laid behind, suffocated by the extreme tightness, while others fled, their leader looked around. Only a handful of warriors had remained, but he had reached them, the workers, ready to rip and sow. But that hadn't worked despite his strength, he couldn't smash them, regardless how many of them had been grouped, those damned ones were rather nimble. Quickly overrun, his giant arms had been forced in place. His army couldn't come forth because of him. What had happened there was a complete disaster, as one worker climbed on another one's shoulders and reached over the ceiling, releasing one of the hot rocks. From inside, there came a shimmer of a river so hot that once it fell on its chest, it pierced right through and fell behind. Most of those behind him had evaporated if not for the fact that many of them had been kept alive in pieces. Seemingly scattered around, the ones whom were alone had been lost, as they fled. With no leader and no scent, they had been lost, cursed to run around in the valley like mad things, cursed for their attack. Unable to sense any kind of danger, Nomq appeared to have approached. Plenty of things had become wrong, and nothing could've been as strong as her disease. Despite showing no signs, it was still inside her, she had known. At the time she had approached, the workers came to a halt and seemed to have stopped as well to inspect her. The strange appearance she bore was nothing in comparison with what they had been used to. Only that she bore the mouth and the legs, it was unnatural, but she wasn't dead. She was let through as each worker moved to the side, silent as they were because of their tattered mouths. It looked like her skin had adapted so much that it gave the impression of pseudo chrome like or metal encased. That and the constant smoke and fogs of coal which darkened her, it appeared that she would be allowed to pass through the gates. Many workers came on each side and pushed marvellously carved gates which depicted their reign below. From the engravings, as well as she had had the chance to study it, they appeared to have sprouted from some giant organ from a locked place. There had been water running through the giant tunnels system from its every side, leading what appeared to be floating corpses from the world above. An emphasis on that creature had been made throughout the tunnels she was lead in, as if the importance was greater than everything she had ever expected it to be. Most carvings had been excellently made, to the point where their craftsmanship showed through the most tainted of inscriptions. Their words had been nothing alike anything she had ever seen. 'But I would just happen to know the language, so be my eyes if you would kindly please. They speak of their migration here and how they came to be.' Through the many decades of misery in which our ancestors swam in filth and mud. 'We would prevail no matter what.' It had been a sign of their mighty will and inability to give up on their own survival which had pushed them forth. Most if not all had appeared to have crept from holes in the walls in which they waited. Since there weren't always enough materials to finish the walls with, sometimes they would crawl and act as if they were part of it. Standing there and growing old, the ones which had been alive appeared to leave their spots in search of materials to fill the gaps, while others didn't appear to have a care in the world, as they had grown too old. Not only that but with age, they had hardened and become encased and part of the wall itself. They were no exception at all, and Nomq had little doubt she wouldn't escape being used as structure battering material in case she died. 'This is how they survived, it would appear, this relationship where they would use one another rather to weep or waste their dead.' And it had worked, by their words alone, they had managed to get this far with the help of their own blood, guts and soil. All of leading to this, their city, the grand one, surrounded by nothing below. No fire, no magma, nothing which would burn lay below, as far as she could look and see, it was the nothingness which they had mastered and loomed around. Even the outer reaches of the ground they stood upon stood above the abyss because of the chains which held it in place. Was it safe to walk? There appeared to be different kinds of faces which Nomq encountered but if anything else was there to notice, only a few were entirely revealed, as the others wore robes and were hard to guess in their true form. As one appeared to be bulky, tall, a being with no feet all, there were some horns coming from its head and from the back. It floated above the ground and seemed to be blind. Behind, it appeared to have dragged a tiny wooden room, which had light smoke coming out of it, as it just happened for them to carry on and creep, there was no one inside by another lady who'd weep. She watched through some window which was barely made of anything which would cover her sight and saw how the lady's tear ended up in an ash tray. It wasn't right, how she was taken but she couldn't do or say a thing against it. Caught by an arm, she appeared to have been taken by one of the sick monks. Under his robe, there was only the head she saw, and even his face was pale and hard to see, as it its sockets laid only one bulk-like red eye which stared. Only pieces of its mouth appeared then disappeared in seconds while they never saw eye to eye. 'What do you want with me?' There wasn't any response to her language, rather, it release her from its grasp once he saw that there were others around who stopped to stare. Everyone was being careful there, not to make any mistake and definitely not to say something which would impede their way. Looking around at it she noticed that one spoke but Nomq understood no word. 'Allow me to translate my dear, for I know and I can hear.' Well enough that strange eye-gutted flat tall and musty thin handed one started pointing and whispering in her ear. Even as it knelt, the difference between them was something not to be ignored. 'You're an outsider, look, everyone had been waiting for you to know if it would be safe to get through.' The mouth spoke as soon as the peculiar dialect faded. There wasn't enough there to make anything out of it but she dared not ask a mere question. 'I'm glad to be of service, worry not for the way behind is safe.' He nodded with its false expression. Though it had been blank ever since it approached, she could see the visible pores move around his face like some kind of spores or seeds which exited his skin and hid in the dark near the back of its head. Was this one dead? She wondered but said nothing, as soon as enough tiny spores moved away, it looked like in their place remained only some kind of skull. Socketless, mouthless and kept by the spores, that explained a lot of what she had seen so far as she moved and glanced. Plenty of them only wanted to get out and distance themselves as far away as they could by the ones around them. At least that was the impression she had been given. 'Want to purchase something?' A dark and weak creature seemed to have crept. It held itself like some trader but she knew better once she threw a glance, at its weak form, the girth aloud. Plenty of its feet were flat and caught, its weak hands and arms seemed rather fond of themselves but somehow it grinned what seemed to be a pair of teeth held by strings. That was just one of the things it had collected in its journey as they went. Most of all, it was bent on selling her something, perhaps anything, if the mouth were to buy as well. 'Was that a hint at you? Those teeth I mean, as I have no need for them yet.' It sniffed around trying to read her and the strange words she muttered, longing with its crooked nose and strange pose in which it stood. Most of its body laid covered in fur, in which it hid most of the objects it had collected and acquired, even the coins and those of value. Before long, it spoke in a language, dialect and tongue which wasn't known. 'We need to stay away from him.' The mouth said after they walked away and apparently had done much to anger the one. It was one of those mad and sick ones who wanted to have at them before they could wake up out of their stoop. 'There, the gates, we need to make it in the city before anyone else comes near.' Out of anything but fear, they went on. Everyone was in a hurry for a reason or another. To be fair about it, as soon as something sudden did come to be, like the metal statues dragging the gates open for her, the road behind cleared and everyone stood on two sides. Everyone being her near the gates while the others had ran on their side of the bridge. 'Hold on, hold on, hold on, hold on.' A voice from the distance said and as the mouth translated, she suddenly got a grasp of it. The chains which had been attached to this structure started lowering it down slowly. It looked as if her claim of them conquering the abyss below them seemed to be true. Inside, she had been pulled by a combination of workers and commoners who saw the gates blocked from closing. Immediately inside, she was held still as to not get caught by the spell which had hit so many of them. There wasn't any time to admire anything or the vastness of the place, for she bore around her too many pairs of hands which held her as she stood aloft. Soon enough they would be too far below the ground to notice anything going around or to care for any insignificant group of invaders. At the time she was still caught by some sort of shock which didn't do her any well. Neither could tell how soon it happened but the city was whole again, held by chains from above but whole for an entire period of time. There wasn't enough time for her to stand and peer at the city, as there was too much to see. Nomq had been pulled there for a reason which was unknown to her and she could use nothing less of the discovery she had wanted to find. From the main square, near which she came near, there looked like a sizeable globe of glass lay, which looked hot and bright enough to serve as some kind of explosion. She was strange, that alone she realised. Many followers had gathered around her, some of them being the broken teeth, featureless workers which looked like the static from a coal mine. Others wore robes and followed neither pattern nor anything distinct to differentiate them from one another. But if one thing she noticed, it was the fact that they all bore a head or two, not necessarily connected to the rest of their bodies but as neat trinkets of decorations near their necks. Not the workers, never the workers, who remained pure and seemed to be already busying themselves with work. Four distinct dialects came in her way and as far as she was aware, the mouth understood and spoke nought of what it heard. 'Well, what do you suppose might happen if we were to get lost, especially in there?' Nomq pointed at the hive-like district. That looked like it was the infested part of it, rather than to have occurred naturally or be constructed by neutral means. Even from the distance, she could notice various layers of vileness dropping from the top and internally grasped for her own skin. It wasn't there, she tried again with a few of her organs. They weren't there either. 'Should we not look for another place? It doesn't look like a place you may be able to return from.' 'Don't you mean a place we may not be able to return from?' 'I am but a mere mouth, with nothing to lose, you are the one giving me thought and a voice.' But she had looked away, distracted by an uproariously loud noise.

Where had it been? Where could it have come from? How come there were so many things wrong with her then? Plenty of times, she had looked back and forth, unable to keep to herself, followed by a few who mainly kept to themselves now. No one spoke, but they watched and listened. Despite everything which had happened she wasn't sold on the place, as it was too great and malignant to be real. The pillars had been squared, the floor beneath them was a bright yellow, almost close to marble in away, stretch for as long as the limits of the elevator side of the city laid. The patterns below seemed to have told a story, at least one which hadn't been meant to be interrupted by a line which came out as a crack or a dent. Most, if not all homes followed a few patterns themselves. With a bit of guess work, she realised that the huts were the houses owned by the poor, while the taller ones, to the forts from the distance and the great spiralled forms she could see belonged to the richest forgotten ones around. She stood clear of the guards and bowed down at their sight. 'Keep your head down and do not make eye contact at all. They must not see you raise any trouble while you're around.' And they were armed. Without looking for too long at them, they were wider and taller than their peers, almost specially bred for this kind of work. Near their bones there appeared to be some kind of breast plate protectors, faces which didn't belong. They wore black masks and suits which bore tubes at the back of their necks. Was there something wrong with her vision? She wondered but got no response. It felt like the golden vision of the place she had looked at chance at a heart piece. Blackened woods from below, as soon as she looked above, she saw that she wasn't that far in the depths or fallen into the abyss, but in a cave that went as far as she had looked. She was still in the city, but this was wrong. The chain, that's what she checked first, they were still there. Of the creatures that followed her? They were darkened but still hadn't looked like anything human in any sort of way. Nomq had, but looking down at her guts, she realised that a mouth had been sewed on her, manually, painfully, the memory of which would never go away. There was dread in her eyes after seeing that the huts and houses turned into rounded things which had been spiked, coloured in the deepest red and black. Their robes now spoke of no sophistication but of sadism and madness. Some wore white symbols on their, which popped in the eyes but she dared not raise any alarm, not yet. 'Look at the hive, can you not see it yet?' From the distance, the silk which had encompassed it looked like a glistening dark ultramarine star, lost in the moistness and the dark.

If there had been anything for her not to understand before, not she was being hurt by the way they spoke. Their tongues or lips had been bitten while they spoke, splashing tiny beads of blood while they spoke. She had to get away, to get them lost, but now, out of all the times and places she could be in, she felt afraid, too afraid to be left there alone, unable to cope and unable to hide herself from anything or anyone. It was time for her to get lost and look for what had called her there. There were grottoes which seemed to go deeper below, staying in some kind of static field of bleak grass and tall flowers. Surrounding it, as well as it had been aware, there was a door which lead inside, a gate rather which laid in some sort of disguised. Nomq took initiative as she opened it and entered inside, looking past the tightness and the shortness in which the room had been presented, it felt as if she wasn't followed any longer. Neither of the followers knocked or gave any other sign that they had approached. For a great reason as well, as it seemed that inside the chamber there were two shelves, from the entry door to the far side and the opposite end, there were trinkets and parts which connected and made a man. Out of pieces to be more precise, only a few of them appeared to have been caught in the same trap of being solid. They were looking, watching, peering with their globe like eyes. Many heads watched and seemed to chew on nothing as the frail creature which was Nomq approached. The condition in which everything inside laid in was nothing worth of mentioning. At least, the shelves were old, as were the pieces, neither of which appeared to have any sort of value whatsoever, not to mention the fact that she feared that she might catch something while she was there. Nothing might've hit her less than the fact that she wanted to confess how eerie she felt in the presence of the one behind the counter. It was then that she was wordless and only watched, as had the mouth sealed itself and held its own lips in place, meaningless in tone and cold. It was tall enough to loom over her, wore the same normal bleak-like robe and felt distant as several voices came from its inside. From the sounds of which, there had been a clear distinction which had pushed forth something out of its mouth. It was a device which had been attached to a long tongue or the projection of his insides as the long thing that came out of that ancient slobbering face had a dial-like box lodged in it. Many things appeared to have crept inside her, but neither of them seemed to answer her question at all. What was it? What could this thing be? Looking even closer, she noticed small eyes being hidden underneath some damp folds as well as having opening on the sides of its throat instead of bearing a nose. Mostly, it was the hair which had been distraction, those greyish things which hadn't belonged to it but had clearly been taken from the scalp of a man. Trying to break it was pointless in a way since she knew there'd be nothing she could to satiate her newly-found curiosity about the damned machine. Some numbers came to mind, one, five, eight, one, zero, zero, and three, four that had been the entry which had come to be passed inside. The dial suddenly made a sharp noise, and whatever she had done, the response had almost been immediate and without delay. As she had noticed the tiny beady hidden eyes underneath its folds, they appeared to have been burned out of its face, or boiled in their place. No one had ever thought they might admire what was happening to their host, but the puppet heads turned and grinned. Despite not making a single sound, they waited for her in silence to insert the new combination. Why wasn't it trying to fight back? She wondered that as well, before noticing the chains which held it in place, dragging as far in the back as she could see. It wasn't its choice to be there or do that, not to mention that there had been plenty of devices attached to its back, that of which she wasn't even aware of them or their functions. 'It can't defend itself any longer. Are you certain you're willing to get through this alone?' 'I am only trying to satiate my curiosity, nothing more. Regardless of me willing to get through with it or not might be a matter of how far the dial will let me get off with. If it's going to have it killed, so be it.' She had tried hiding the expression on her face, hearing the slobbering one chant in silence as it waited for her to continue pressing the dial. Words couldn't describe the fear it felt and the shudder its hairs around its body as the dial crept again. Five, five, zero, zero, four, eight, nine, one, by now they appeared to be some kind of coordinates to find and push the spots which weren't supposed to be pushed. Something had burned internally but crept at the top of its head. Nomq had been right about the false hairs as they fell off immediately after that tiny arched bone popped out, seemingly getting through its brain. The sounds of pain had been terrible, and as the struggles began, the chains had finally come into place. It had been hard for her to keep watching it go that way, attempting to get rid of the bloody concoction at the top of its head. Something had pierced it too far for comfort but it was too late as she had acquired a vile taste for it. She wanted to eat a piece of it and it hadn't mattered what went forth between their needs. Eight, eight, eight, eight, and this immediate effect she saw as it stitched out on the counter. One of its limbs had become rather boneless as it pulled out of the cartilage and turned inward. Its entire body now knelt on one good knee while the other one had crushed or at least pushed the organs further inside. The agony was no joke to it but it could hardly be heard since its throat had been blocked by all the wires which had been connected by the machine. The pain and misery the creature felt was akin to some kind of pleasurable wail she had wished it never stopped. Something inside her signaled for her to stop and made it seem as if it was wrong and yet there wasn't anything which would've made her desire more. Peculiar, as it was, she almost knew or had a vague understanding on how the dial machine worked, and seemed to have quickly come to master it. They were indeed coordinates as she had initially suggested to herself, or rather, though they were acting in a similar manner. As the next set of numbers came, six, five, five, zero, eight, something started being pumped inside its chest. Nomq clearly saw that something in its chest was getting past some sort of limits that would've drowned her or as if it were a man underneath that thing. Its lungs seemed to have cracked and pierced the chest until they seemingly revealed themselves. They didn't look like what she had expected, since their horns had to be subdued, and they had been sharp enough that they would manage to pierce through the body. Fear overwhelmed her once she saw it climb on the counter. She felt back and was looked down upon as the creature suddenly got stopped in place, held only by the chains. As she was met eye to eye, she felt something that surpassed fright and agony, something which crept inside her mind and affected her in a way she wasn't even aware of herself. It was that which made her want to stop. But one thing made her desire to go forth and made her less reluctant than anything else, it was the thing. That horrible, horrible thing, the realisation that someone might come after her from the outside, another would come in and finish what she started. It was then that she noticed the huge open way behind the creature. A way for her to escape through the back, be it a way for her to be free. As much as she felt some kind of understanding for it, the machine was dangling just at her reach. The weight alone seemed to have caught it off guard, as the body had less strength than it needed to set itself free. No one appeared to have known where the vile human went, not would they have recognised it in any sort of way. She had been there, and they had spoken of her, for little matter as she had been lost in a manner of a few seconds, fleeing in the realms that had seemed beyond her awareness alone and theirs as well. Most spread but some remained, not as many as to attract any sort of attention but enough of them nonetheless to repel anyone who may think otherwise. Nomq had bitten her under lip and started inserting numbers again. It felt great, ecstatic, that rush of power she felt while it came to her in that moment alone, when all of it was used for the utmost pain and suffering she herself had known. The illusion felt off, but the pain great, after seeing it get ripped apart from the inside, one final entry appeared to have sealed the deal. One of its heads suddenly burst out and fell.

There wasn't any scream but a lot of its liquid suddenly fell off and spilled across the floor in some sort of pool which immediately vanished in a mist. Nomq covered her nose in hopes that it wouldn't come through her and make her sick, but she had no final word or whether or not she had taken too much of it inside. Minutes passed and the machine inside it appeared to have lost its function. One final deal before she jumped over the counter. For that one moment, it almost felt like the creature had one last beat which went through its heart that of which vanished in a moment, as some blast would in the peculiar manner, caught by the worst possible way it might've been caught. Its arms expanded stretched, the heart and lungs started pushing back and forth like some pumps which pushed forth for one final strike of revenge. But it was not the creature, the dreadful infiltrator, but, rather something more dreadful and afraid. Something which shouldn't have been that way in any type, sort or shape, which made it seem stranger.

Well enough, the tubes had done their task as they started pulling from its inside, all of the liquids, the guts and every organ which had been attached through some tube. Its body had been dragged back as the chains automatically dragged the body behind and ripped it apart. From it, every organ which had been pulled seemed to have encased itself in a small dome for protection. No further action had been taken from that point, as it did appear to have been caught in its own trap. She followed nonetheless, through the peculiar halls, following the most expensive things she could've set her eyes on, before someone came to replace the grunt with another. By the next entryway, she stopped and peered from the floor. As she squatted, she looked inside the room and saw a room filled with cages, in each of them one similar beast had been stored. They were fed and given water but the conditions only felt like filth. Nothing could've been more agonising than being in one of those cages, nothing indeed. There were a few things which went off the top of her head, which involved her looking at all the stored boxes which laid behind their cages. Had those all been organs then and if so, how many of them had been harvested for them? It looked like each of them had its own category in which they had been included. Peculiar and tainted, as it appeared that there was little they could do in order to set themselves free from their prisons. They were insistent as well, as soon as she had come crossed the threshold to get a better view of the place, they had all turned to watch her closely and silently.

She was strange and unlike the one at the counter, the other creatures around there looked as if they had been unaffected, unlike the one which had been partly made of circuits. A clear determination came to her mind as she looked at the other door in front of her. Someone had left it open apparently, and not only that but there was a constant show of lights coming out from some machine or another. Nomq hadn't noticed the empty cage inside the room, which made her unable to comprehend what was happening in there, beyond her own gaze. Silently, she stooped closer and looked what kept the cages locked. They were the same kind of devices which had been attached to them. Had they looked nervous around her or was it all in her head? She wondered that as she looked at them shaking. Big beasts shaking, unusual per say, not to mention that, if they had even a slim idea of intelligence, they might've put two and two together. One of them own had been broken apart and she was the first one to come after it. Anyone else would've figured that out by now, with her being the culprit, ready to attack. But not them and not yet, as for the time being they looked at her with fright. It was unsettling to say the least, being there amongst so many beasts. And what if she failed? There had been too many combinations with as many entries as there might be. No confirmation either could come over each cipher which was entered, making it look as if the combination could be made out of tens or even hundreds of numbers, which dissuaded her from going forth. Could it be such a loss after all? What were a few more dead ones amongst the mountains of organs which had been stored around? Some noise disturbed her. Without wanting to return the way she came, since that would be the first place they'd look in, she came around the storage passage, tight as it were, she managed to slip in and hold herself as tightly as she could against the small containers which held the organs in place. The disgust she felt meant nothing to the fact that they were there, in the room, looking around for another specimen to take. Their vileness became obvious while they started making their primal sounds and act as violent and vulgar sounding as they could. Despite the fear she felt for what they might do to them, she had held the fear in place, at the thought that if roles were reversed, how many of them would make an effort for her? Without a doubt, they wouldn't have hidden in a human organ storage room and held out as much as she had done. Clearly, she wanted to do something but waited. As close as the light had come, there was a certainty that she would be caught. Nomq knew that herself but dared not say a word for the fear that they may get her never left her. It was only after making the cut, through the passage that she realised how important this place was. Hundreds of rows that went on and on as far as they would stretch to the reaches of her eyes appeared in the distance. Most, if not all were dragged around by metal arms, bleak in the gaze of the creeping metal numb pads which pushed and pulled them in place. It had gotten colder the closer she got to the centre of it and there was one. A giant dome lay there, with a sort of gut brain, surrounded by a pair of giant ribs, all which had become one, as if they had been grown together. It was kept alive and stored like the others but unlike them, there seemed to be an entire thing rather than harvested pieces of a bigger abomination. In the pool it saw there was clearly something transparent, to the point where everything inside it had been so, even a piece of the brain or the ribs and the other things which swam in its pool. Parts of them had looked as if they were only parts of a greater thing which had dissolved and absorbed it. Unnatural, in a way, she decided she could get away with it. After all, how often would they visit the place? How often had it happened for someone to break in? There had been no clear answer to that as she dared not make a sound. As soon as she had seen it in sight, she came near one of the metal arms and pulled at it until it came off. The strength which had been needed for that was beyond anything a human would've been capable of pulling off on its own, yet she's done it. Lower expectations came as soon as she was near. With one strike, the glass dome around it crashed, and in a few seconds, the entire image of the vicious slime which had almost become a body blackened and turned into a gas so vile that she had dropped the piece of metal she had carried and fell on her back. Looking at herself helped her see how hopeless she truly was, how tainted and dirty she had become indeed. There wasn't any explanation for this kind of deal and why it had happened to her. But she knew, once she had pulled herself together and had taken a look below the now empty and broken dome, that she had ended the abomination before it formed. But how many of them were there? How many had they been making? It wasn't clear enough, but she knew that either she could go forth and smash as many of the domes as she could or return to the ones that were caged. There wasn't enough time, as much as she was aware of do both of them and get away. It would make too much noise, per say, not to mention the chaos which may come immediately after they were freed from their cages. At least, the chaos wasn't what she'd expect but sooner or later they had to be done. Even as far as she stood, there wasn't anything which made her wish to return to them as soon as she could. Nomq wanted to see what else was in there. 'You're starting to stall, and that isn't great if you're still set of breaking down their locks.' 'Not yet, I don't have any way to break the codes, well, do you? Last time I checked, you were just as silent as I was when we were near them. You could've suggested a thing but you haven't.' 'But now I am, so we may return.' 'No, that's pointless, not after this, definitely not after having found out what they're making here. Do you remember those tall guards, or figures or whatever they were?' 'They walked near our after the crowd gathered but it hadn't reacted in any sort of way.' 'Exactly, I don't think they're as aggressive as they look, which should give us an advantage over them, if it were came to be.' 'Very well then, you control the body, after all, the decision should be solely yours.' As it had always been, she came to the conclusion that the lives of those animals were rather meaningless to her. They were disposable in every shape or way. She went on with her search, thinking less about them being harvested and instead focusing on those. Guards being made, with that in mind, she had to look for more domes to shatter and more unformed primordial goo to make it vanish. It was dangerous, as much as she had been aware, there were a few things out there which could go wrong. Yet there was little doubt that a part of that vile gas that had come out of its death had entered her and changed her insides as well as it might've affected her mind. Nomq could hear their wails from the boxes. Those were silent but she couldn't exactly pinpoint the reason for which she felt bad or guilty, especially since she wouldn't feel that way even for her child. If chances were, she would do it again. But this wasn't the time to look at the past, there'd be no fond recollections to gather, for she was alone and there was barely a shimmer for her to grasp off. Plenty of seconds went unaltered as she looked around at them, while thinking of their fate. She had to take just one there, after hearing its kind whisper. 'Devour me, devour me, save yourself, please, I would be yours.' Nomq had little choice in the matter, and as soon as she got the guts from inside one of the boxes which had no effect on the stability the entire column had, she gouged it and started eating. 'Feed me as well, I desire to be fed.' The raw guts had been covered in some smile which was used for preservation. For both the mouth and Nomq, there was little doubt of the magnitude of dysentery and disgust they both felt at one another as they shared the gut. It tasted awful but at least the smile prevented any virus or any infection from the contamination which lay around. And she was aware of it, looking as the greyish vision around and the small white puffs which floated around. Black trails underneath various counters seemed to drag all the way down, not to mention that there had been something akin to dry blood pools which was been the aftermath from a fight. Something big had been in here, and it had almost managed to trash the entire place. A dreadful appreciation of her own came to be, and little was held in regards of what she had done. In the distance, there were wails. The beasts went at it again, quite unaware of the fact that she was eating the insides of one of their own. Poor things would suffer quite a lot if only they knew what her doings had amounted to. But by the time they ended, she had been done as well, both of them had been done. A strange sensation came to her immediately after. She had been affected by some vulgar feeling, one of which almost drove her rabid there, in a state of constant foaming while trying to get as far away from where the gut had been consumed. The sickness returned and immediately after, she heard a sharp noise in her ear go off. There was nothing to it but the dreadfully near paranoia which always crept inside. By and by, there were things she should've known, before anything could be taken or returned. Alas, there was another. Her speculation had been rewarded in the greatest measure known to a living creature. A great dome, but what was that around it? Had there been others who had tried the same? For some reason this one not only had a glow to it, but a bunch of corpses held aloft, with their hands stretched and in the most maddening way possible, they seemed to have died holding it. 'Do not get near it, I think this exploration of yours should end, if you value your life as much as I value mine.' The mouth spoke in a tone which made her turn. Was she even in control? She didn't feel like it any longer, at least not after it spoke. Now, there the woe, as lost as she had been, alone, there was little to her knowledge, less than it had been expected. She was deranged in a way for which there would be no explanation, nor prior woe for her to take. For her sake alone, the mouth started chewing its own insides or hers and spat patches of blood on the floor. There were worse things happening in her mind, as well as the distraction which entailed the fact that they were gone. From her standpoint, she had done a mistake but felt little compassion for them despite going the wrong way. It looked as if they had been busy while she had been inside, creating some kind of chaos, as, at least four of the cages were empty and judging from the long cords on the ground which lead to the way behind, they had already replaced their project. Without a shimmering sign of it, she had been rather aware of how wrong it was what she was doing, but couldn't control her actions alone. Her nails had fallen and despite the pain, there was this urge to go at it and start screwing with one of the cords as hard as she could. Shit started biting and scratching at one of the points, going through the textile and rubbery layers which stood between that and what she wanted out of it. As soon as there was some entry, her tongue pumped in for a prime taste. It was jittery and felt like blood oil, but somehow she had to keep sucking on it as hard as she could. Again, the beasts took silence in their cages as they watched the man woman drink from one of their own. There was no animosity between them, but a tension which would've gone to an extreme if only she had set them free. Visions came, of them being brought there. The cages had been shortly unlocked, or at least the ones which had been empty now, with only a few codes being as short as four ciphers pushed in. And they all started with zero and ended with zero, which made it even easier than she would've thought. For someone as advanced as them, they weren't great at making unbreakable locks. If only she could pull herself back, she would turn and set them free, at any point. But the taste had become sweeter all of the sudden, almost orgasmic for her in some sense. She had become wet from all the sweat which was expelled out of her body, unable to get up from that partially kneeling and predatory pose she had taken. As soon as I am done, I'll do something, I'll, stop. Her thoughts froze at the sight of the creature which stood in front of her. It was one of them, the caretakers, wearing their horns and masks, their suits which blended with the environment, covered in all that grey stuff which floated around. They would've been collectors if it weren't for the entire aspect of them enslaving and seemingly butchering the beasts. Would they do the same with my body now? I am defenceless, Nomq thought. With her blood-shut eyes and teary demeanour, she stood waiting for any kind of grim action which would've taken her or dragged her by the end of her hair and pushed her into the butchery. Yet there was none of that, at least not yet. She didn't understand why she was avoided in such a way, or why hadn't there been measures taken. But he left, without a word, without doing anything, or even caring that she was there. For him, she had been another customer or some kind. 'You may pull out, I think that would be enough.' Some of its teeth started sharpening again while cleaning themselves. For how long had it sucked on that fluid as well? There wasn't any way she could tell that, but seemed to have hinted at the fact that she wasn't pleased by what was going on. There was a clear certainty now, she was aware of the danger which flowed through her body. 'Hey, look, the opening I made, that just sealed itself, hasn't it?" "They're made to act that way, don't think you're the first one to do so. This would be a perfect time to leave them each to their own." "I see." She was still dully caught by the entire thing to realise what was going on. Some kind of fear-induced words and thoughts had made her act that way, though not anymore. Nomq though herself in control, she had to be. There would be no other certainty to it, at least not to the point of fear and sneer she would display. More so, there was a clear distinction of the other beasts, this one seemed passive, to the point where it wasn't chained any longer. It had no care, nor had it observed her as she passed it by, moving freely without any kind of repercussion for what she had done. Perhaps they hadn't been made aware, but one thing she knew, which was the fact that she would never return into the strange shop again. It was back out there, into the peculiar zone she had been forced into. At least, there wouldn't have been a single way to see whether or not she would understand a single word on the billboards outside. Many of them had different signs which had been written in their own style and manner, that it made it all the more confusing. Were they of the same tongue or different ones? Some similarities in form could be found here and there, but nothing concrete, not to the point of her understanding what was the intention behind the sign. But there were people, if so could they be called, coming out of them, in other words they weren't abandoned either. And she could at best, glance into it and try not to stare. There wasn't any option but to obey. "We shall enter that one." The mouth spoke, muffled underneath her clothes, though she heard it all the same. Clearly, something wrong had happened, for she obeyed again without delay and without a way for her to stop. It was almost as if some bigger hands grabbed her head and turned her towards where she had to be, afterwards, making it seem like there wasn't any other way around. The place was full, but not in the way she had expected it to be. At least more than half of the things that were in there made their way to the upper floor where they communicated with one another as well as the other parts. From what she could see from the distance, those parts, per say, were some kind of giant devices, or at least scrapped parts which had air-hole as well as insertion points. Things she wasn't even aware of laid attached to it, pushing forth and moving at command. Whatever they were guiding inside their small room, she wanted to be a part of it. At least, as well as it looked, there was some interest she had acquired regarding the machine and their practices. One in particular had taken her eyes. As she got there, she saw a pair of human-looking yet bizarre men, who were somewhat crossbreeds which took on some of the features which had been precisely noticeable in the others around. For example, their skulls were shaped in most atrocious ways, holding themselves farther behind, if not split in the middle. Others had the entire projection of their skull going forth, or not at all in the rest. Pieces where it should've been rounded were flattened and judging from their arms and legs, they out-bred their humanity a few generations before. Fingers were missing and in their place there was this common flaccid state in which some look-alike akin to them retracted inside some kind of shell which had become their hands. More so, on their chests, there were these devices, as black boxes, going through their backs and pumping something in the rest of their bodies. The soft part in the middle of the cube, which was surrounded by black, had something of a meat-like spot which flushed and expanded wildly every moment it could take. But that wasn't what interested her, as their dark features and shallow skin seemed to flail at it, she finally looked at the device they were messing with. It was something of a tall base or a miniature of something like that. She had little experience in those types of things, but somehow she saw a pattern there. From her previous experience at least, she had learned that the best way to understand how something worked was to closely observe, as she had done. In a sudden entry of a bunch of codes, at it worked again. Those codes or the lack of them drove her mad. Everyone there seemed to have either developed or acquired their own set of ciphers, which they kept to themselves. Not only that, but as soon as she took her time to look at it, she noticed that the base was attached to the table they stood at. Perhaps Nomq had stood way too much there on her own, for others started looking at her with their utmost uncertainty and warded out glances. It had prevailed at least, despite her not choosing a table to stand on. She looked and saw one opening from the base, from which there crawled a tube. The humanoid hadn't actually taken the tube in its mouth, but rather pulled out the back of its head which wasn't part of its skull at all. Cradle boarding, that's something she had thought off, maybe relating to one of her lessons when she had been a child. That's why it looked so familiar, in some way, she had only remembered the pictures she had started at as a child. It drew it out nonetheless and hid some sort of battery which went inside its own brain.

Obviously, there had been some pain there, with its wires being drawn back and what now, but the certainty remained the same. There was fear, there was pain. Nothing would remain. It pushed the tube inside one of the holes which popped open and suddenly pulled its fuel inside. The other one, with the projecting head and no pupils had. Had, either of them bore any pupils? It was the first time she had noticed. 'Sit down at an empty table.' Said one of the voices, that of which she had been aware, it was clear enough that there was some mockery involved, but rather, disdain in its voice. 'Worthless thing, you should've done it quicker. We'll be looked now even in the slightest shake.' 'But I've done everything I could, why are you making me do this?' 'It's all because of you accepted me and nothing more. Now, you belong to me and shall do what I say unless you want me to leave you for another host and not with this.' She looked back on the illusion. Her body was fat and like the parasite again, a fat larvae covered in coal, in some kind of almost empty place, a metal prison with some machines which had been stuck in the same motion. One moved its anchored metal arm then drew it back only to repeat. There were others at the table with it, being the exact same number. Nomq looked behind at the trail she had left while making her way towards the upper floor. Half of the damned metal prison or structure had been destroyed in an utmost immediate manner, under her very own eyes. Was it a fact that for a fraction of a moment, there had been some disconnect? Was her parasitic body decaying? Because it looked that way, she feared. It seemed that in all sense, she was being taken and decayed in an accelerated manner. Green and yellow puss-filled pouches had buried themselves inside her big blob of a body and the cause of it had been the mouth. With its dark grin, now, of all the times, it looked rather out of place. Those crooked teeth were breaking as well and in a way, it seemed as if it was decaying. 'Bring me back then, I don't wish to look upon this world any longer.' 'Will you listen, then?' 'I will obey.' It was then that her sight returned.

Seemingly unaware of how long she had been standing there, suddenly she received the small device every table inside the room seemed to have. Unaware of any of the numbers which were there, Nomq only supposed they were either easy to find or cosmetically in nature, henceforth any possible combination would result into her getting that liquid in. 'Press eight five eight.' She did as she was asked, again, without any reluctance or any shimmer or sign that she had the willpower to resist. Now, there came a tube, longer than it was usual for her to get and seemingly unaware of the things which made it so. On a quick notice, her hand hadn't guided to herself, but rather to the entry which was needed. It was the mouth, that had been the source or target which needed to be fed. Underneath all of that, something had grown inside of her. It was attached to her mouth as well, feeding from both sides and yet, it had been attached to her other organs as well. It was an unexplainable parasitical thing which held in no light's awe. The sickness which was this seduction wouldn't run out for as long as it was there. And the way it fit got dreadful to watch, never had she seen something as horrible as the way it fed itself. Some of its teeth were grained and miserable, but they draw inside themselves as much of that oil as they could. She wasn't a machine and neither was it, but somehow, it thought or judged that it would be helpful for her to be fed? It wasn't safe, she wasn't either and now it would be unsafe. Some of the patrons started staring. From below, she had made a mess. At least the chair and a quarter of a circle around her had been covered in the oil as it slipped either outside or on directly below here. The flow of the oil had stopped, which left a bitter taste in both of their mouths. It looked as if that wasn't intended but the patrons had taken the liberty of pushing it all behind, pulling it despite her being there. Not only that, but she was being taken or dragged towards the back. Apparently, someone had been displeased with what she meant or the reason behind her needing to be there. A storm was coming by and she would be defenceless for as long as she stood there. Behind her, a big armed bulky thing which had its entire torso in size of its head came to be her guardian, or the thing which stood between her and the exit behind. At least from her angle it looked like the, still humanoid thing, had been stretched to the point of growing into its own skull. It had been a peculiar thing to watch, not because of the thought that it used to be a man, but the deformity itself. That changed immediately, as if stopped in its tracks and emitted a powerful wail. From its insides busted something, once it was done changing and shifting in place. There came a pair of heads, and tongues, long beaked, welded together, but there. Its body was something of a plane spreading block which appeared to point in every direction while expanding and retracting in its ocean deep colour. If there was something wrong with it, that would've been it, or should've been in any case. But as it shed its skin and human form, from the inside, there could be seen the face of a man trying to shout and set himself free, as many more appeared. It wasn't a great view but she couldn't look away. The hairy blue thing was armless and legless but seemed to make up for it as it had turned out to be something akin to a portal which pushed men in front of him, as tormented slaves which walked. Will I become the same as they? Am I doomed to end up that way? She wondered often but dared not ask loud, for that thing was nothing to be looked up to, nor was there any kind of desire to be strapped in the same way as it had been. That way wasn't nor had it been an option in any case. This way at least, she stared, but anything else? She hadn't dared. Their heads suddenly became crisp and thin, like some kind of rotten, spoiled things. They shouldn't have been aware of it, but that was it, a decaying thing which immediately took place. Not even the universe itself could take the existence, or the agony of the creature and let it live in that way. From now on, she could only watch and prey for the men. They were the ones who seemingly suffered inside, as she could see their ribs exposed, starved by their prison, as the block which had been its body thinned. 'Stop looking at it. 'Said one of the patrons who lead the way. As for him, there wasn't anything to be called for. He wore a suit and bore a harsh voice underneath all the cover, leaving much out of what he had been, or what had been seen. It was strange, peculiar and out of place, he shouldn't have been there. The tunnel they were in shouldn't have been there. Are they taking me to some hidden place to off me? 'Silence and keep to them, get closer.' The mouth whispered, and for a moment then she thought she had been the only one who heard it. At least she thought it had been that way. There wasn't a clear way, nor would anything they did count for something. She was brought down a few levels through some sort of strange chain system which bore some pain as well as uncertainty when it boiled down to her safety. At least, as soon as Nomq was chained, she was lowered below like a sack of grain. They were by all means ruthless in the way they treated their guests or prisoners, at least after the way she had been put down and forced on her knees, watching out for her not to be caught around. It was clear then as it had been around that there wasn't anywhere safe where she could stand without being caught and forced into submission. 'Bring the chains closer to me. Do not wait for the lights to come and for them to see what you'll be doing?' 'And what exactly will I be doing then? I'm truly sick of following your lead, since you have lead us astray.' 'Do try to have some common sense, if you may will yourself to live farther than your own head.' She came to her feet, unable to look around, all towards a spot in the dark. And while she looked above her ears, she saw the light suddenly appear, as far away, followed by a trail of sparkling flashes, towards which she couldn't even look at. 'Bring the chains.' Nomq was shocked at the fact that, under the dimness of the dark, she could see well enough because of the distant lights. And what she saw wasn't exactly pleasant, as everything prior had been. It was in mere moments that she had seen it not chew through the rust encased metal, but a pair of teeth that stretched and somehow made themselves crooked enough to wrap around the chains and rub them like some sharpening belt. The area around it had become rubbery all of the sudden, as the oil which had been stored in the teeth got expelled and pushed forward. She slipped through and fell what felt like two or three feet down. Could it be that they felt or heard it there? Was this pain too much to bear? Little was said or spoken, as no voice left out the sound of pain. They were up there after all, listening and trying to get at her. Slowly, she came up on her feet despite feeling something broken in there and cringed at the sound of a crack. Another crack followed by two more consecutive ones. Despite the pain, she walked, and would have to walk as far as she was able to. 'Keep going, I shall keep you for as long as you may be able to walk.' This upside region had been a sham, something lost, which had been theirs. She had been unaware of what was going on but she walked in a filled out place, a black market, which appeared to have stretched for as far as there had been a city above of them. It was strange, looking at it, with their peculiar underground buildings and pillars which looked like metal mules with round and sharp metal beams which would've normally be used to break through the stone mass and ground. It was agonising to watch, worse than that to snatch something from there. 'Take that piece, the blanket, the robe, whatever it may be, just take it. That's right, pull it over yourself, this should do just well enough. We need you to keep a low profile in order to snick under the radar and for us to get away. Don't forget that they're on us, and there's no chance that they may stop.' What had been that thought? Either it had been the influences of the mouth suddenly coming into play or something worse which might've been what she thought of them. But it was there, the thought of murder. It had staid with her, and looking at the owner of a small battering ram, they had snuggled one of the beasts, akin to the ones she had tortured before eventually taking its breath away. She had felt sick to her stomach, just after seeing that it wore one of the same devices at its neck, to serve as a reminder of its slavery and pain. From the sides, it did seem like it was missing at least half of an arm. 'They do enjoy torturing them that way, wouldn't you agree with me?' He appeared out of nowhere, while seemingly others came as well from the above. What was there underneath that suit? It felt like he bore some kind of strangely covered suit of sheets, but they weren't merely welded together, but grinded into what she saw until they had become somehow crisp to the touch, but perfect as of the texture. Outside it there were some partial spheres that resembled the same domes she had broken before, but little recognition came in regards of him being one of them.

What had they looked like? Only time could answer and she had little interest in it. Strangely, it was not her who understood his words alone, but rather, it was the fact that, there wasn't any certainty over the pattern in which the stitched mouth moved. Undeniably called for, there was some kind of strangeness which bore neither kin nor anything close to it. There was a new way of looking back. There were others, in fact who seemed to dwell into organs and huts, old things that died. And in a notice, the roof above them suddenly collapsed an inch or two, getting closer to crushing them. 'What was that?' 'Oh, I see that you are new here, indeed you must be.' 'Not so loud, I don't want to get any attention near me, please, may we speak lightly?' 'Very well, then do follow me, if you wish to remain that way.' Nomq had expected danger, but was that worth? It looked like everyone down there had entered in a state of depravity and fright. Would they be crushed? When will it be over? 'That's the constant way we live in, for you, who has only arrived, this may seem like, like what?' 'Like madness, pure madness done by those who have nothing to do but risk their lives living down here, in dirty and misery.' But it had all been accounted for, every inch and millimetre below, to the precise distance and angle in which the ceiling was pushed towards. 'Look at those things and tell me, if, by any chance, those metal hinges look familiar to you in any way. Whether or not you've seen them before, there's little importance to it.' 'I assume it's so, but why do you think that's important?' 'Because those hinges, that part of the machine looks as if it's about to crush us at any time.' And there was nothing more to it other than that, as the clear cause of the distress was in the solidarity the device created for itself. No one appeared to have approached it by any means. There were a few words to be said aloud between the two of them, but she chose to occupy her gaze with that thing. Sparks came out of it as there seemed to be something wrong. It wasn't, by any means, a set device, but rather something experimental by the looks of it, or rather imperfect. Roughly, a few things appeared to have crept inside its crooked teeth. They rustled beneath her clothes, in the approach of destruction. Clearly the moisture down there wasn't anything to be liked, but she could see what was eventually coming. As she had thought of the fact that neither of the store owners moved their branches near the device, there came another certainty there. It would be the quickest death, at least if someone were to stand underneath the metal ramp which would form, the death machine at every corner, wouldn't they take it if there wasn't any other alternative to escape? Even the hole from which she had come was smoothly tight, enough that not many of them would be able to get to safety in time. Not only that but there was no guarantee that even if they made it through, they could climb to safety and be accepted in the outer reaches of the city. They were the outcasts after all. Nomq seemed to counter and weight some of the knowledge she had attained. A few more thoughts pressed on her mind, as the closest one being, who was the stranger and where was he taking her? Something kept brooding in her mind, enough that she didn't seem to lust for anything other than their separation. A cruelty made them aware of something else, which was to say, there were some eyes which peered on them for far too long. It was near one of the structures, the large cylinders which held the top of the ceiling in place per say. Multiple degenerates appeared to have caught on that they were watching. They were brutes that far had been shown by the way they were treating one of the smaller, almost child-like forms that kept trying to slip between their grips. It was something feminine in there, almost like some jelly, which was strange, at least for the fact that it bore skin, real skin, pink skin, the type that was bright enough to burn in the sun. She couldn't believe that no one dared approach and stop those filthy blunt-handed things with their strange tubes coming from their heads. Most of what they wore had stolen or rightfully appropriated from their corpses if the case came to question. But there wasn't enough to go on after that, at least not enough until the need for which they would've crept away. It was strange and they were near, this would end with them cowering in fear. 'Wait here and do not.' He hadn't had any chance, that's how it was down there. It looked like a pebble had been thrown and beheaded him before she even had the chance to turn. That blow hadn't come from anywhere, it couldn't have been. No marks, no attacker, only faces which had been just as confused as she were, staring at the distance, attending their small wooden or barely assembled market plains. 'We need to get, no, no, this isn't.' The mouth fell into silence. It knew that if it spoke, there would be an incentive for her to suffer the same fate as her host. While it was dreadful to stand there, facing the dirt, it beat being cut from end to end and losing itself in the process. Other parasites which had inhabited her body already made their way out or started moving from corpse to corpse and there were a few lying around. No one had even bothered to bury them in the time they had been there, and no one might even question or want to do otherwise. Another clear distinction came, as soon as there were a few words spoken again. 'What should we do with them?' The image, the illusion of the woods faded now, as it had been entirely tied to her fondest memories of exploration. As much as if had been made, there was nothing holding this city and its construction in place, as everything would be made into the pool which started forming at the bottom. 'Finally the corpses will be gotten rid off.' Said one of the stark ones down there, seemingly taking its time to push forth everything he had even collected. Out of everyone, he had been perfectly aware of what was coming, the destruction, the misery it would entail and the fact that there was no escape. 'What are you doing you damned one?' 'Look underneath you, miserable wretch!' And as it had done it, there would've been nothing clearer than the fact that there was no way out. Most of their feet had been welded, converted and seemingly assimilated by the gloop in which they writhed in. Nothing would save them, nothing but the destruction that came. As the moments passed, and more of them lost hope, it had been the time. A cosmic mockery had been thrown against them as the ceiling suddenly lowered itself and got ready to fall. Looking back at their own end wasn't something cruel or courageous but rather a fool's errand which crept inside their minds and nothing which they've ever managed to build had slowed the fall by any means. In their kind of errand, it appeared like there wasn't anything but anything which would prevent their destruction, especially since there was no return, no way of knowing whether or not this could be avoided by any means whatsoever. 'They won't stop me, my feet may have betrayed me but I am still a master of my own destiny.' One spoke as he revealed a second jaw he had stored in one of his ancient packs. It looked as if it could work almost as properly as a normal one when attached to one of his long sticks. And as it got tied with a small piece of leather, he managed to swing and completely obliterate a good part beneath his knees. It wasn't that much of a painful blow, for, underneath, there, he revealed, two coiling snake-like legs which seemed to almost float about the graining mud. 'I can escape, finally.' He thought he had the greatest chance of all, while everyone else had been caught off guard, instead of heading towards safety, apparently, he went ahead and managed to get away in time. A dreadful knowledge appeared to have remained. He was there, mostly in pain, another way of looking at it, he pillaged everyone as if they have meant nothing to him. All those years spent together, the looks they gave and everything else wasted away with each stroke in his bag. 'No one shall be able to stop me from this conquest nor will anyone be able to slow me down. My ascent into this fortune which belongs to me shall.' There were no words to carry on. His seven eyed face and cropped out squared teeth stopped as he revealed what he held inside his neck. It was another man, a human who started crawling away. He immediately spat him out on the counter as one of the so-called black marker keepers watched both in disgust and confusion.

Something about this image didn't leave much to be called for. No one knew what to say, both because they had been silent for too long while awaiting the end, and because curiosity came aloft. There was another level below of them, in which the heavier ones got pulled first. Underneath, they seemed to fall, those in armour, yet to call. 'Do not abandon us!' They yelled, speaking like some sort of faction, unable to take any action either way. Out of fear, they watched and grinned, while the one below, who seemingly held everything in a sort of leash over the true abyss which held below, waited and grinned. There were many mouths, too many to count, but neither of them were akin to maws in their true sense. Mostly it had been so because, instead of acting like them, the closer they fell towards them, the easier it had become to spot the differences. Those were cages, which opened and closed. The big and rounded thing from below grinned constantly as the ones behind its crooked metal prisons wailed in agony and begged for escape. This guardian of dread held not only the living but the dead as well. Initially, where the giant race of invaders had come and got stopped by the workers from barging in the city, they had been dealt with and got killed. From their pile of corpses, they have fallen below and got pulled inside. For each cage there were tongues, leashes and long organs which held the prisoners in place. No matter how hard the attempts had been, there was a strange thing to it, which couldn't be explained. It felt as if they wanted to be there and dreaded not a single second spent around. 'Do not come, fall into the abyss!' 'Leave, avoid, stop!' 'Do not dare come near the cages for as long as you can, there's nothing here for you but fear and death, eternal decay as well as agony for those whom approach!' 'Leave, leave, leave, leave, don't look at me, don't dare look at me!' The choir came as the armoured brutes had fallen in. They were caught inside their own prisons, held in the air as the insides were just as empty as the abyss. As it had been with everyone else, they were forced to look above at everyone who fell and wonder when might this stop? How many could the jailer take inside of him and why had it held them there? Despite how many chains and organs and other similar kind of holders there laid in place, there wasn't any certainty whether or not there'd be something to be made of. Somehow, something had been lost, clearly. There should've been walls there, somewhere, from which they held what else there laid there, but clearly there wasn't anything from which they could've been placed against. Fear came, as more laid there. Nomq found herself there as well, as if awakened from a bad dream, she looked above and some they come. Inside of her, beneath her brow, she saw no mouth, alas, the hound had gone away. She was free, she had been set free, and I can finally rest. But as if the spell had been broken and she had been awakened, so had the silence left. The wicked smile had gone and left her with nothing other than the misery and the sound of every vile creature which laid there. Unexplainably so, there were so many things she wanted to do, so much that she wanted then, to escape from the dark which laid below. To hear the silence of the woods, even the burning felt like something she desired, but alas, those times were over and she had nowhere to go, nowhere to leave, only pain remained now, and she had been left there to breed into nothingness. And the nothingness appeared to shout from below, to moan in the tremendous manner, which was even more distracting than the world above. From there, it came like a sudden whip, when the entirety of the city had been lowered down onto the underground layer, instantly crushing everyone down there, into a manner of an instant. Ferociously, it roared, as one slippery taint had managed to crawl its way to the one hole, with an empty sack and little to do but wait for the chain to be lowered. He shouted as hard as his lungs could work but there was little which could be done now. They had been alerted of the coming of the fall. Now there laid no one to help or see him suffer the wait. It was near-dark. Nomq stood below, trapped as well, now creeping below her own brow at the mouth which suddenly appeared. It would grind its teeth for as long as it could, without taking any break from it, nor giving it any chance to expel what had been lost. Indeed, there had been grand monuments above which had reigned and stood there, all with their undercover circuits which were revealed as they fell. The statues in particular had been used to spy and draw information from those who had been near. Everything was being crushed and destroyed in an utmost peculiar manner. Dread filled the rooms in the bars they frequented, the giant, the creeps, the taints and the old forgotten ones. For whom the vision had laid nothing but one of waste, which had been deserted. Nomq was still there, sitting in a chair, in a desolate place, after some destruction had taken place and there was no one left alive. Only their memories or remnants of cold machines were stuck around. One glance over her shoulder revealed the vastness towards which she stared. Empty fields of metal laid around, which streamed over miles and miles where the natural order of life had taken place. In the distance she saw a colossal body which had decayed. It had worn a wicked looking black armour and from as far as she was, she realised that it had been colossal enough for her to roam around in it. She would've stood there as well, if it weren't for the trail of smoke she had seen in the distance. That was surprising for her, for, never had she expected there to be any kind of survivor left alive. This alone made her want to check that out, to get away from what laid there, from the reminder or the lack of reminder that she hadn't any idea what had happened for this place to have come to this. It was moment ago that a voice spoke to her, before going mad at the mere thought of loneliness, but there it was. Underneath her shirt, under the coat, there wasn't anything, there wasn't any mouth, nor stitched, nothing of which she might've imagined herself seeing. 'What's that?' She heard a few rocks falling down. It was the wind, even though it had acted in a peculiar manner as of lately.

There were no signs whatsoever but she had noticed something written on the small object in-between them. Perhaps it could've been from a place above, from one of the standing suspended parts of the framework which held the bar she had laid in, well, in place. 'I never understood what these letters meant. Why the scribble, what of the pain I couldn't understand?' No answer. There had been a flash of light coming from the sign she held but that could barely be counted as any kind of interaction. At least it wasn't a solid one which counted for anything in particular. Two more nights passed and she had been through a hellish landscape to get through where she wanted. It wasn't that she even reached four quarters of her journey that she found herself hiding between grain of sands and long wheat arms which popped out of nowhere. Her blond hair and white skin helped her blend quite well with her surroundings. They were there, watching while trying to grin. Some mass of land had been conquered by some barbarians that managed to survive and roam over the land. But that wasn't an explanation for the reason of them looking so primitive. With their looks kept in mind, they looked wicked and blind, unable to find any of the bloody food scattered around after the destruction. They were a small group of hunters by the looks of it, who bore armoured riffs of the metal which had been scattered around. At least, she could vaguely remember that there was some kind of thing tied to it, the way she looked or the way they moved. Big brutes, now used as huts or decorations, from the looks of which, the tribe was great. What chance do I have alone, tired and without a weapon? Nomq had little mind put in the journey but she felt pulled to that giant body. Looking back, from the distance, in the safest manner she could think off revealed just how depraved the place had been, and how nature had finally started reclaiming what had been taken from them. Someone rang the alarm. A noise came from the distance, a bell or some sort of tingling kind of bell, which called all the savages back. It wasn't even clear whether or not they themselves were humanoid or intelligent whatsoever. Approaching them would be a mistake indeed but she needed something to help her get through. At least, a guide, someone who knew the way, someone who was far weaker than her so she could abuse him into some kind of submission until the journey was done with. Despite that though, she went forth and lost herself in the fields of wheat, by the morning's sun. It was clear enough that she hadn't seen it ever since there had been the time. The weather had been well enough for her to feel right. With that being the first time she had seen the sun in its fully glory without noticing the land while thinking of the past. It looked as if it had been so long then, that she almost wondered whether or not it had been all a distant piece of her memory which had been lost. Unaware of the falling and what had happened there, she still managed to get herself through. Many savages laid there around a fire, cooking some animal they had brought up from whoever knew where. It was one which dwelled there, that was certain. Its aesthetics made it seem like it was something closer to some aquatic animal rather than one which had dwelled there on the plains with them, hunted for sport or meat. But again, they had been primitive in their hunt, especially after looking at their clothes and their tools. Though the fire making procedure had been an exception since they had used an engine behind it, pushing forth some combustion as it started pumping in circular motions. It was out of place there, but then again, everything was. Even the way they had kept it in place had been peculiar, with the way they had chained it to some pole and had some of their own hold the engine at all times. Disgusting creatures, as she seemed to think of their facial features, long and pointy, teeth which had been somehow welded to the bottom of the jaw, round eyes that weren't symmetrical at all, the point where being too close or too far apart being the normal type which could be observed there. Not only that, but their outer layer, which covered most area around their bodies wasn't even skin, but some kind of imitation, red, which could be compared to cloth or something even solid akin to plastic or some type of cracked jar. It didn't bode well with her, seeing them eat that thing. For starters, the way they ate was vulgar, in the same way words came out of their mouths as they ate. It had been unclear whether or not they meant to say something and communicate with one another or if it wasn't beyond their control. No more would they see what was going on in there. A peculiar approach nonetheless. It was time for her to draw near. Unexpected, at least, with the way she looked, but not particularly so. They were shy during the first encounter, to the point where the food was dropped and something changed about them. Not only had they backed away, but apparently, they had somehow managed to dig holes underneath themselves, if they hadn't been made before her arrival and immediately retreated in them. Now what she had a closer look at them, they weren't just humanoid, they looked closer to mushrooms, big and somewhat human but somehow not. It was a shift between the two of them, which never truly met in any sense. The savage aspect of it suddenly made sense, but not the reason for which they ate meat. A second look somehow revealed the fact that there had been soil underneath the coarse sand which lay underneath the wheat. Her gaze had been caught and suddenly she realised she was there eating the spoil while scaring them away with sudden movements and peculiar sounds she made out of her mouth or her nose. 'Still holding onto that, I see, even in the hiding!' She was looking at the broad sky and didn't look out of place. There had been a signal of smoke, both from where she currently resided in and more closely, to the other settlements around in the distance. But she knew that there was something there, someone more civilised than these. These creatures, per say, who somehow managed to make this small, hold their own. It was something close to an infestation, which was kept clean after all. As clean as it could be in any case, for as long as she remained in there, but it was time to leave. Without remorse or any kind of guilt, she left once she had realised that they weren't as violent as they had seemed, even after looking back at it, they hadn't chased her nor had they tried doing anything about it. Tusks hadn't been thrown, no lightning in the hold, but the rain which had happened during the cold night.

Oh, how much she had wanted to have slept in one of their huts, but that had been too far away. What she had to settle down with was a half-dug hole in the ground she had messed in. There was a skeleton which had belonged to a man, that much she had been aware of. 'I bet you must've been handsome when you were alive.' With it, she started stroking each end of the skull, around the jaw and its raised cheekbones. Other features looked as if they would've done just well if there had been just enough meat on them. Peculiar, at least, what she had done with herself near the feast when it had happened. It had been months ago, how time passed. But she remembered being with the man she had been promised to, long before any of this happened. It wasn't that she wanted to remember anything of it, but rather the fact that she had been bored, caught off guard by the fact that there had been no one around. At least no one to quiet her, to hold her but the skull she held between her breasts. It reminded her of him, but not just to way she had been touched, but the way he drove her to feel alive. They would often get around the church, it was decrepit, and abandoned, in the place where no one came to be. Feeling rather nauseous, there was a clear view of the top hole she had lain in. Water still poured over her head in a most annoying manner. But she couldn't complain either way since there wasn't an alternative to it, especially with the moist fields and those that followed. Despite her best attempts to get through a few memories or at get some sleep in, she looked over her head. There was a clear distinction between dirt and what seemed to have poured over the span of a few minutes. It wasn't even clear whether or not there were any kind of obvious things there, at least, in the substance which fell but she clearly recognised it anyway. It was one of theirs, the soup of contingency which fell from one of the melting pots which wore their puffy hats over their heads. They had followed her all the way from their camp to this point where she hid but hadn't dared come into view yet. What were those scoundrels even waiting? What could they be up to? She wondered before making her wait to her knees and grabbing the skull with her, as she pleased. 'I'm not leaving you here soldier, you shall follow me indeed for this time, until I get a better companion for the road.' And as soon as she was up there, no one laid in sight. It looked like the rain had only washed a small trail of something which might resemble their leather texture and nothing more. Unsure on what to say, she wouldn't return to her hole in the ground but rather go ahead and get around. The rain hadn't been forgiving either and the more she looked back, the easier it had become for her to notice the possible consequences for her choice. Never had she thought that there was a risk of her drowning there, or lying in a cold pool which might've given her a terrible cold. She was there, on her way, to some place or under any grown thing to hide from it. But that terrible, terrible night, had followed in its wake a bolt of lightning which flew and dropped beneath the earth, just far away from her girth. It had been dangerous to lay outside, but there wasn't any hope for to stay alive. At least she had become aware of that, when the time for her dismissal came. Great agony followed as soon as there had been revealed, the one whom followed her, unable to be repelled by thoughts or anger alone. A greater smoke than it couldn't have shown up, in the middle of the night. From the size of it and the way it spread around, it looked like a viral gas that infested the very air it swam inside, with its lack of face or claws, it looked only like a patch would, for which it would follow her relentlessly through and through. She noticed the fact that she wasn't safe near it, but hadn't understood the reason behind it. 'What are you?' She hadn't been answered, nor had she been taken care. At least from some dreadful stone which laid on the floor, beneath the one she had walked for the few minutes. Had she been driven in it? When have I entered this deep abyss in the ground? Why were there stairs leading down there and why had the smoke suddenly appeared there? It had only been a moist hole before it turned back into a stone prison, one which necked itself the deeper she went inside. One couldn't help but abide the mistake another would have to bear. There was danger out there. Though before she could recover, the light came into place and as soon as the cloud released its water from its innards, the blood which shouldn't have been there as well, a few corpses fell from inside, revealing what she had thought off or suspected of being the ones whom had trailed her for that long. Many corpses laid below, the ones she had been forced to walk on had become, somehow, petrified, filled with some sort of putrescence nonetheless. A mad thought arrived, alas, when there wasn't any chance for her to get through the thought. As soon as she had thrown a glance, the cloud suddenly pushed towards the giant torches which lit the room. There was only a bridge for her to go on as she had been affected by the swoon she had been in. Clearly, the dark embrace had ended and now that she had been trapped, the cloud had ignited itself and became a tormentor of fire. Its brim and might had seemingly been thrown around until the point where they had shown themselves made of some disgusting, wretched thing. It looked as if, at every moment, a burning corpse would fall into the pile but not ignite. There were faces on the torches, a magnitude sculptured out of vileness and evil, though that matter little now. Nomq had noticed the fact that the pile hadn't ignite, on the contrary as well, she was able to tell that they swam in some sort of solution, or some kind of strange liquid which disturbed the fire. Would she be able to get through? Am I to drown or die by fire? So long had it passed, that it was her choice no longer. A peculiar thing, at least, she had looked into it, until they had been made aware, that there were others out there. Down the hatch she went, inside the piled, the bottomless pit of corpses. Too many had been driven there, but at least she would be safe. Unless that's what it wanted, when the fire ended and suddenly the water she had swam in had darkened in the most decrepit manner possible. Nomq's best attempt to scream had been banished, as her throat had been filled with it, and at the same time, the door opened. It looked like the smoke had opened her for a moment there, splitting her in half beneath the pile. It was there that she noticed that she was still whole. But the seconds passed and there was not enough time to spare if it were for her not to drown. She popped out of the water with a hand grasping around her shoulder. From below her waist, she was barely holding herself safely above the filth. 'Where are you? Show yourself, come on, where are you hiding?' There wasn't a sign of where it could've been, other than the partially open gate which had been left behind. It had looked like a dead giveaway she had somehow glossed over to the point of barely seeing the light which had emanated from it. A clear distinction came as soon as she pulled herself over the bridge and started walking towards the gate. Not a single drop of silence made itself known, whatever it had been, it had all been thrown away as soon as she had made it through. She had little to no idea about how she could express the beauty she felt being pushed past her. It was clean and she felt dirty in that light bathed room that laid there. Wherever the gas had gone, she had no clue, though that must've been somewhere lost through the eternity which lay above. The place had no end, no beginning any longer, the latter being thought and accepted. Nomq had suspected that the longer she remained in the room, the more it would've got closer to getting locked. But her fate wasn't there. She knew what that place must've been, the room she had entered in. Many bodies had to be taken for her to stay there, too many sacrifices to count, at least not something which she would manage on her own. The gate had to stay open, she thought. As soon as she noticed that there were patches of her disappearing, she stepped outside, unable to comprehend what had been happening to her. 'I'm not ready yet.' It was clear enough that once she started coming back on the bridge, the corpse pool had slightly gone down a few inches. I'm not going to ignore this small fact and I promise I shall return by the time the gate closes and shall enter it. Nomq thought before looking below. It seemed that she had already taken a blow to the point where she wasn't sure herself of what might've been. Clearly there was some kind of things which shouldn't have been spoken between them. But it was gone, the mouth was gone, it wasn't there any longer, so why had the open wound started bleeding again? How could she go on knowing that she was in such great pain, without any need to show others what was going on. A dreadful thing, which it had been, shown to it, as if seen by others in a blistering light. That tainted sun was out. Her journey hadn't been that far off and seemingly, this secret place had been hidden inside a hill, just around the valley. Clearly, there had been times in which she doubted it herself, about whom followed her or what might come out of this chase, but she was there. Inside the valley, straight down from the hill she went. It was a rough kind of fall or glaze, which pushed her down there almost rolling through the dirt. Something wasn't clear, at least not to the point where someone might've thought otherwise. Much clearer was the sun there and how advance the people were. Even from where she stood, she had taken a good deal of sight at the open giant corpse through which they had established. Many dunes lay, and some sort of sand vastness pushed out of the north, in which most of it had been buried apparently. But that was the least of what she focused on. Nomq hadn't been wearing the proper apparel for that kind of journey and it had shown itself that way. One camel rider was approaching from the distance. Could that truly be a camel or just another deviation? It wasn't clear any longer, but that headless thing bore the body of the majestic sand things with the hump as well. From what she could make out in the distance, over its top laid a flaccid stump, from which sprouted a small sensitive-looking yellowish leash which flailed around. Clearly that wasn't what she had been expecting, not even the least of it. But she hadn't complained. Apparently, whoever had been masked wore basic desert garb, not to mention that he bore another one as well inside his pack. The nasty thing threw it in front of her as if she was expected to put it on. While pointing at it, there was a clear voice coming from under its breath. 'De ba asha, hachi a me sha a maah arim.' Not only had he bore a tongue, but underneath that tiny mouth cover, he pulled it by the side to reveal some sort of open skull which was held by wires and other devices in that state. Most of the skin and muscles were absent, but one tube stood out, being pumping blue, red, green and purple substances towards the head. Every now and again, every colour would be momentarily replaced by a white, close to being colourless liquid that dissipated in the head before the normal flow continued. The metal wasn't normal in any sort of way, for it had looked at if it had been burned to some sort of crisp inside the forge. From the looks of which, one couldn't help but grieve at it. Sickish looking at it, she started down and began putting everything on her. It appeared that the stranger had been enraged by it. As soon as he laid down from the top of his camel anomaly, she came closer and pulled them out of her hand before throwing them on the ground. He was set on it, most likely, as he pointed at her current clothes. If she waited any longer, there was the chance he would strip her himself without waiting for a second thought or thinking about the decency it held. There was a problem there, but she complied. Slowly, in the desert and under the sun, she managed to slip them away. If it came down to any shame, there hadn't been one, that thing seemed to have run out ever since she had made contact with him. As soon as that was done, from the sight of which he didn't shy away, he pointed at the cameloid and then towards the structure. There was another party out there, waiting for them to return. As a matter of fact, they were riding on the same modified animals without fear of retaliation for what they've done. In the distance, the fools were throwing fire bombs around as if it were some kind of game to them. Sickened by it, she came to know from where they came. It was one of the reasons for which the camels looked as bloated as they seemed to be. Unevenly so, they would now and again shove their hands through one of the camel throats and pull a bile which would be thrown inside a metal bomb. It only made it worse for her to be standing on the hump, having the chance to succumb under the heat and burst into a flaming pile of guts and moving bones. She undoubtedly thought that they would somehow be able to bring her back to life in a most repulsing manner. But half-way near them, the cameloid stopped. There was something else she was needed in order to get through, something he had almost forgotten. From inside one of his many pouches, he took out a mask. It wasn't a sand mask alone but seemingly something which entered her ears as well, bearing a metal device which was most likely used for translation. Nomq trusted him, as much as the bleeding had stopped. 'You were bleeding. Now, you need someone to have it looked at.' 'I'm perfectly fine, I don't think there's a need for that, and I'll manage it.' Though she doubted herself she could have something as big as it had been heal itself, especially since the pain came and went, similarly to the bleeding. It felt like some kind of curse or mark to remind her of the mouth and its wicked voice. 'But you will have to be taken care off and checked before deemed safe to enter the crate.' It didn't sound like she had much of a choice and seeing it unfold itself, even less so. When they started walking again, she looked at the ones which had been waiting for her. They had lifted a flag above their ears, which bore a strange symbol which had nothing to do with the desert of anything she had even seen. Marks bore of red and yellow inside, but made to look like open wounds than the condition of fire. It was the texture of the flag and the metal object atop of it which had it in way which made it look as if there was something dangerous to it. A dreadful nature, which had been made way revealed the metal skull and the gauntlet which bore them through its ring. Underneath the wounds, there had been the seal and the watching eyes, which had been spread around, the wicked dyes, were there as well. She had seen those small black blotches, which must've symbolised vision in some peculiar manner, but couldn't point out where. 'Do not reveal anything of yourself if you want to make it through. The dark traders are untrustworthy and you may wake up with yourself being sold as a slave.' 'That's mad, there's no.' 'There's no protection to it, especially for what you are and what you look like.' He interrupted and underneath the cowl he bore, there was an unsure sight of him licking his lips at there mere thought. Some consideration had been made, at her own expense. It wasn't like anyone had actually cared of the things which bore them through but they were there. Those pitiful abominations which had been pure once now roamed together as the company met. Most had been silent after a given sight from the convoy or the emissary which they had sent to meet her and there was little to be said about them before they came to thought. Whichever had been brought to normal means, there was a reason, out of agony and disease, and they threw their fire bombs around the poor ones living in their huts. It was a horrible thing to do but that kept them at bay. From inside their small primitive huts, every now and again, it just so happened that a plagued man came out burning and dripping acid from its insides. More so, there was a clear distinction between those which were beyond saving and those who enjoyed it. That disease wasn't a disease at all for them, but it had been observed and documented as something of a natural occurrence to their species. Fire didn't kill them but made it so they delighted in their suffering. 'That's horrible, you can't harm living beings that way, and they didn't choose to be out there or look that way.' 'Oh, but you're an outsider with no knowledge of what's happening or our conflict, so how would you know the difference between what's right and what's wrong? Would you say the same if it happened for you to find out they were banished because they murdered our young? What about the reason behind the disease?' Something was unruly, off in a way which came to hide some strange meaning to it. A clearer way would've made it for them to have a chance to flee. There was nowhere else to go and be. Everywhere else had either been claimed by nature or was outnumbered by vagrants of these wretched ones. She had little understanding indeed of them but noticed why they had to be railed upon. From around the edge they grouped together, no longer entities but parts that were alive and formed monoliths out of their own bodies. Those things dwarfed everything underneath them, not only by sight but by the way she released a wicked gas outside their structural body. 'Would that be toxic?' 'It would burn through your lungs if you got near it. Have at them!' He pointed like some sort of commander and saw them prepare a pile of fire bombs at it. The monolith had been surrounded by them like a band of raiders would do if caught in front of the loot. A few arson episodes came at it, which prevented the monolith from forming entirely, but that was about it. What laid there now looked like a blazing effigy under the sun. Gazes were taken away, she had spotted it before everyone else and looked as if she would fit right in despite her previous remarks. 'Would that be the end of it?' 'There won't be an end until they gobbled up the world in a mass of meat just like them.' He took out a tiny bag of water and had it for himself. When it came to her, she declined, refusing to consume anything until she was there, inside their new home. They dispersed as soon as they reached the outer edges and from what she could tell, this was the new paradise. A dreadful thing indeed, filled with the remnants and the people who had been banished from their old prison and got here. Most of them had hidden themselves from their former apparel and bore something close to skin. It had been skin, she would recognise the eye patterns anywhere, and the mouth and even the teeth which had been bore as decoration. Worse than that, they had been human, what they wore, perhaps something which had made them hunted, worse than beasts, used for cover. 'Don't overreact, you wouldn't want the same thing to happen to you, would you?' 'That's a child, that's a young girl they're holding.' 'Raising, they're raising her, most likely to be a slave, nothing more. Not every human is used for that kind of thing, don't worry about it.' 'I'm surrounded by the skin of my people. Others are wearing people of my own, how do you expect me not to react?' She bit her lip immediately and looked away. In a way he had been right, they couldn't, she couldn't raise too much attention on them as that would do neither of them any good. It came as pitifully and she could think of it, but it was there nonetheless. Something soulless dragged at her, in the way those empty sheets looked back. There had been men underneath those, somewhere in the past, but now they hadn't. And the view, the dark visions came to pass again. She could see the sand underneath be made of metal coarse from the point she had entered. There wasn't any skin being worn there. At least not anymore, but sickish working slaves made out of metal. Something of a blue light reflected against them, before she had been realising that she was still herself. One key difference wasn't the fact that she was still there, riding on a machine, rather than a twisted camel, bearing a gaze over what appeared to be a blocky fellow. His face had been flatter and uncovered, with a bunch of visors being bore as its eyes. Perhaps that wasn't as much of a difference as the fact that it hadn't the ability to talk. No, they weren't sentient machines, but automatons. 'Where could I be going then?' Nomq asked in a kind of peculiar way, she was again lost without a way to remove her own disgrace. It just so happened that she was in a moving cart, going around the facility that she thought of what had been missed, or what could've been if only she had returned there. If she focused enough, in her mind, she could still see the place there, but it wasn't any less forgiving than the cold environment she was in. Shy as she was, she would've given everything to return to that calm chamber, even if it was inside her mind. But now, of all the places and any of the hours she had spent looking for, she found herself reminiscing of the room she had been through. The pool of corpses was starting to be consumed. Certainly, there would be time, but she couldn't recognise her way back, not through this. Everything looked similar, the cylindrical objects, the pumps and the long tubes atop the ceiling. There were chambers which opened to reveal the intrusive machinery which seemed to make more of the automatons for greater tasks and instead of being excited by it, she found herself there, at a clear end. One big hole lit and revealed the gutter. 'Don't touch me, I'm still alive, I can still feel.' All of the sudden she got defensive. It was clear why her mind made the connection between the skin clothes. The pit she had been brought to was filled with human corpses. Most of them had been stripped out of their clothes and got thrown in there, in the pile, the stench of which almost made her spill her guts, worse than that, she started bleeding out of her nose. Did the machine understand? It gave no sign of reluctance as it was trying to get into position. Would he? 'Stop, stop, please, don't.' Where the machine had failed, the one in front of her hadn't. His ruffian-like hands simply stopped as she had been shown too much. It looked as if she had been brought to one of the sand tombs below. 'It's a lot to take, I know, but you don't have to be scared of it.' 'Don't throw me in there, please.' 'I won't, you needn't fear. They're wrapped, look, look in there. As I said, they're wrapped down there.' Indeed they were, at least from what she could see, the bodies had been somewhat preserved or taken care off. And clearly, she had been reluctant to be touched, especially in their proximity and after being aware of their treatment with the corpses. Unaware of anything else going around, they had walked it off, towards the nearest exit from the burial grounds. This had been a place of worship as well, the least of which she noticed. Inside of it, or at the top, she came to see the few of them which made their way through and bore their garbs inside the burial chambers. Some bleak clothes tainted with the colour of greenish yellow and the symbol of an hourglass being engraved on them. Some of them had been in a hurry, too much to have observed who had passed. But underneath those robes, it was clear enough that there wasn't a man or a living being. Yet another walking pile of bones seemed to have a fragment of its humanity held by machines. Those which came behind him were much worse. 'Bow down, it's important.' She had little to understand of the custom but seemed to have trusted him, at least. From the edge of the eye, Nomq looked at the abomination which passed. It wasn't alive, but just as tainted, not entirely made out of corpses, but a blob, a fat creature which bore a fear heads at the top, most of which having kept their fat on and showing only cosmetic signs of their bone frame. In other words, those which demanded most respect seemed to have been the closes to being alive. Either that or this was a show for the abominations to show up. Wretched one who walked on four, he held apart three arms which looked rather sore. Most of their mass had been changed to show something of the metal wires which had been injected directly into its skin. For an outside, this type of accessory made little to no sense. For her, it looked disgusting, seeing layers of muscles turned into this in-between of meat and metal. It looked foul, especially in the robe it wore. Even the heads it held on top of its shoulders looked nothing like any of those she had seen before. They were welded, or had been welded together, only so that they may look like a unit of control or some kind of pseudo-looking ship which didn't belong there under any circumstance. It was strange, it felt strange and out of place. That dreadful thing had holes in its sides of the giant form, from which there pushed an array of smoke, as if tainted by the wait. As soon as there had been a chance, all of the sudden it opened all four of its mouths, if she hadn't been wrong and release the most damning and reverberating sound. Through, not only was there nothing, but a confusion was released for those who stood around it. Nomq felt herself get lifted by her arms, apparently unaware of what was going on. Not only was she being confused, but it looked as if everything else, other than the head on which she focused had gone in a sort of distortion, the waves of which almost appeared to have changed reality itself, only so there would be no distraction. Finally, she had the chance to take a look at the thing which laid there, from the eyeless start, the empty holes which went far away in the back, the skin having been there only as a kind of curtain which flashed on glimpses. It somewhat gave the impression that there were actually eyes somewhere in there, vaguely, there had to be. How else would it know where to grab? The noses they bore were long, crooked and pointy, and she could feel that those were not noses, but some kind of parasites which had been lodged inside. There was some kind of feeling she had previously thought off. With their eyes having been devoured, how off would it have been to guess that the same ones had eaten through their eyes and now only jumped holes. But the skull was a mess either way, even with those in place. Whatever outward appearance had been changed, those things had left the shape as it had been. It looked like an oval malformed and overgrown pair of skulls which had been attached only by a mere taint. It wasn't that pink or grayish skin that frightened her, but the way she had been held apart from the others. How she felt her will fade away after getting dizzy. There was a clear point where she had thought she wouldn't get through it alive. But she had been released once the silence kicked in. Not in any harmful way whatsoever, she seemed to have been placed below, still caught by that thing in her mind, trying to see whether or not she would die. There wasn't a way to express the fear and remorse she had felt then. But what had she done? It clicked in. In a few moments when the muscles weakened, she slipped with one of her hands and managed to touch its face there, ripping apart of the parasites by merely touching in, scratching the bottom lips and the lower parts of its face on its way down. A weakness had overtaken it as she turned back up and looked at it. There was something even more clearly to it. Fear had driven her to look away. She had little to nothing to say about what was going on but one thing was certain, that death-filled glare, the toxin in its body, it hadn't gone down there to lead a sermon, but to die. It had been the end of the road for it, the destruction, and the point of no return from which she managed to pull back. But why had it decided to approach her then? If it had been the end of its anomaly of form, the dreadful end with no return, why had there been a second chance? She could've joined him there if only had he squeezed the hands which had been wrapped around her throat and never pull back from it. It wasn't even certain whether or not he died or used the tunnels underneath to escape, as she remembers that being an option. It's strange how I can recall a memory of something I haven't even been part of, but he said that, she knew that her guide had said it. Who was he? It's time to go, if you don't mind.' They were walking through the crowd as if they were both blind. It felt as if something had been similar and she immediately became afraid, as the feeling became worse, coming off as a wicked warning of a kind. Don't follow him or you'll both die, that thought alone had made her want to leave her own and never return.

Others appeared to have mourned their own around but she knew better. When he wasn't paying attention, or the right amount, she suddenly pulled back and crawled underneath the many legs which passed. She could've been trampled and she was aware that it was some kind of risk she well enough had taken despite everything in her power being used for her survival. 'Look, another human.' Nomq had slipped and managed to get in front of a wooden floor. It had been raised and from the looks of it, this would be the typical kind of executions which had gone on in the medieval ages. Vaguely so, she could make a figure underneath those twisted fingers and big hands. A man, or a boy, perhaps early enough to be caught off guard, but they have done it. One hand just pinched too hard underneath the collar and seemed to have cracked his tiny skull apart. He bore a metal hand, from which his organs were attached and pulled underneath glass cases for display. From the pumps, at least, there was a clear view of the vigor that went into its barely worked on body. Regardless of what he looked like, that cruel one hairy and metal armed grunt had been the executioner. There wasn't one way or the other to think about it, other than to admire the line of prisoners behind the wooden stand, who stood chained in a death's row. And many of them were grinning, others were laughing at their own or the other's misfortune, only to be caught and be reminded where they were. One big belted runt as well, looked around so he wouldn't be able to tell whether or not one would try doing something rash and leap at the crowd. And in that row, she saw one of the wretches, from which the chain hadn't been tied to its hands but had somehow been pushed through its chest through one way and leaper through the other. The symbiosis stopped at least as it had been well seen that it couldn't grow on metal. Constant shocks from a blunt stick filled the creature with electro shocks, only so it would stop trying to grow on the other prisoners and somewhat spread it, growing another one of its kind as a parasitical thing on a man. For men, of the human race were the easiest to infest, at least from its tainted view. It hadn't helped either that the shocks were widespread through its body and the metal, but that had been a well known chance they had taken rather than to risk it. How would he die though?

Obviously not by normal means, whatever it had been or whatever could be said about it, there was a clear resilience to its body which couldn't be denied. Another one had been sent to the row, crushed beneath an arm and immediately carried away by two of the assistants. It looked like they had been carrying the bodies to a well-type of hole, the end of which she had a great idea where it led. It was a common thing for them to lead and abandon their bodies there, but never had she expected for them to execute as many. Many cowed things watched, most of them, as far as she could see, underneath the robes hid the loss of their humanity, or even their state of living if there hadn't been a human underneath. It hadn't changed the fact that she stood there and watched. Even though most of the ones which were executed had been living, that only gave her a greater satisfaction that she would've achieved if there was some kind of dead or partially animated thing executed. She had seen the poor and the strong die in the same manner, crushed, being drained out of their blood if they were deemed worthy, most of them in the same manner, until it came. Everyone in the crowd stepped back a few inches. 'Step away, make way if you don't want to be touched by it.' Strange, she had already learned that a mere touch wouldn't cause anything, after all, it had needed plenty of time for the parts which were attached to its body to get through and migrate on another being or surface.

Yet, everyone was afraid of it, that armless wretch, a poor imitation of life, which grasped and tried to spread before being inevitably slain. There had been heat underneath the hand, and as its shadow fell above the kneeling wretch, there came the awful smell of gas. It hadn't been toxic, as far as she had known, she was protected in a way by many layers of filters from inside the mask. Another thing she had found out without having any prior knowledge to it. But the purging flame came nonetheless, and it had taken everything with it underneath the mass of wretched meat. It felt like the crispness of it bore a strange reaction off the crowd, as there seemed to be some kind of bouncing between the many throngs and woes there had been. It was unevenly so that there'd be anything to it as the limp-like tenebrous thing that remained in the burned pile tried lifting itself up, only to be kept down by the chains and under the flame. Dangerous as it was to put the flame straight against the wood, Nomq looked and some something about it. Either it looked like there was some kind of oil for protection down there, or the wood had been dampened by water. Either way, it hadn't burst under the flame, leaving only the chain and a black spot which would dissipate sooner or later. The other prisoners were disgusted, as they had been dragged through the ashes of a dead parasite. It still felt slimy only to watch and look as if nothing had ever happened. A cruel thought came to her, as she grabbed a handful of sand and decidedly threw it in the prisoner's face. The guards didn't do anything else but frown as the stranger in the crowd who had decided it was well enough to mess with them, but came to their senses. It was another execution, which would come as quickly as it could. Poor sob, his ingrown wings had been ripped apart and from his back one could see the marks or the rough extraction. Not only had it been painful but there was some kind of breed of loneliness which crept inside from those who suddenly approached from the crowd. Whoever it was that had thrown the sand, now had been lost between the people. But the man in front of them was thoroughly bleeding from his eyes, trying to push away some kind of maddening thing which only worked so well. He had been taken as a fool, he laid his head as the cruel giant handed grunt came and crushed his head with a quick motion. Only a few moments passed between the lines continued. She felt as if she was in heaven either way, being let there to her own accord. Watching the dread in their eyes, looking at how everyone died. Sooner or later, she would be there, that much she had expected. It was time to leave as well and look around. The ground was safe to walk on, again, no one appeared to have guessed what or who she was. It made her think, often, as she entered or rather, was invited by families. They bred with one another, so it seemed, those things, even as children seemed to be affected by the same type of agony that the others had to endure through. Partially alive, while the other part seemed to have been dead, it looked like the children would only live through the decay never to recover. 'Eat this, stranger. I can tell you're not from around here, are you?' 'No, I am looking for something, that's all. I don't know what it is yet but my time here is limited.' Even now she thought at the pool of corpses. Had the stench truly dissipated from her? Could it be that she still reeked of the smell of yeast born out of a pool of decaying corpses? There could be no response or a reason for that, not in thought and definitely not in any kind of way. Which was to say that there could be no other there which might guide her back, Nomq was on her own. She ate at that, their strange cuisine. Their masks were weird and peculiar, but those were used to eat. A set of jaw with long pointy teeth picked off the food from the plate like some kind of insect. It didn't help that the teeth were more cylindrical in nature than what she would've expected. 'It isn't just for eating but for a tradition for the stranger to keep his privacy.' Indeed, she had been hidden underneath the mask. Now no longer to speak since she had lowered her speaking module, she ate the oval fruits which coloured themselves off in peculiar shades of gray as the transparent layers got peeled off. As soon as the fruits had been cleaned off well, they turned green and twisted, with her being the only one who saw that. There was a face on it, she had recognised it, vaguely. Not a face, but an armoured thing, hidden behind something, grinning underneath it laid a mouth. She turned the fruit on both sides only to notice a mockery as the small faces of children bore there, crying with no sound she could hear. 'You needn't be scared dear, whatever you may be witnessing there, there's nothing out of the ordinary happening.' Despite that, she had been taken off guard, unaware of what to beware. It was a cruel thing to behold, the suffering which would be inflicted on her was tantalising. Her head was blunt, her hair had frozen when she saw the numbers off but immediately shoved it through the mask. A few pieces of it had been immediately crushed and broken into pieces, cut while their liquor had decayed. A trail had fallen between the teeth and there was certainly something wrong going on in there. By her nose alone, the putrid fruit wasn't as spoiled as it seemed. But that was it for what she had, taken by the room she'd sleep in, the mask and the face cover stood there for as long as she would stay. 'I will spend the night with you if there's no bother.' 'Spend as many nights as there is a need for you to find what you're looking for.' The priest nodded before placing the top of his pointed cap on top of it, clearly distraught by something. He had been unaware of the wretch she had been, hiding underneath, from those around her whom were dead. She had been welcomed and felt content the way she had been placed. In her small hole it felt as if there'd be no harm to be had against her own hidden kind and for as long as she kept to herself no one would even notice what she was. A dreadful tone had made her feel afraid nonetheless during the night. It was a terrible thing which had come out of the top of the hole above her bed. A partially semi-erect come seemed to have popped from the bottom of the flat ground whilst it made an utmost peculiar set of noises. Nomq had decided it was a dark omen, indeed, as she had been partially asleep while she saw it. A dreadful nature of things as well, there wouldn't be one whom to be said. Evil in nature as it had been, there was a creeping thing in there, nesting inside of it as if it bore itself into some kind of egg. There were some things which were rather indistinguishable from others. A fairer thing, might've it been, she would've stood there with them. But her hosts were awake. How could it be that they were awake this late into the night? Despite the room being as dark as it were, there were a few things which weren't there. She had missed a key which made her mark the entry into the house. It was a dreadful thing which had made her unaware in disguise. A kind of interloper per say, it couldn't have been that they were preparing something for her, could it? Down there, the smell of something boiling and the sense of heat went over head. It would've been better if she were dead, she thought to herself, unafraid. Whatever she had done, this wasn't fair. It was a dreadful thought, alone, afraid. She wasn't there to stay, as she had specified that after the night, there'd be nothing for her to do as she would eventually lose the light. It was getting dark and time had meant for her to go. Afraid as she was, one step after she stumbled into the dark helped her notice what they were doing. All of them below, had blocked every door and every sign of entry, every exit, the windows or the openings were barred as well. There was no escape from this and she had thought only of the hole from which she watched the small burrowing above the ground. The fall of which would've broken her bones, spared her throngs and had her by the throat before she could get it on, a fate which would've killed her in an utmost peculiar manner. It was time, nonetheless, to go. She had been afraid, unable to glance past her thoughts, unable to look ahead, unable to decide whether or not she should be dead. It was clear now, that they watched through the dark. All of the sudden, they had stopped trying to twist inside and turn the maddening inside and out. She had been afraid there, starting at them and being started at, for the three of them looked like nothing they had looked before. It felt as if they had just found out she was human and had thoroughly decided she had to go and never be brought to life. It was madness at the terms of which she couldn't fight back. As she had been too afraid of that, it was clear by the way her bones had shaken how skin had dried, they watched her like they watched through the sky and the endless universe. Blank stares, dreadful teeth which had only showed then it came. As if from the dark, like mad bats they spread and let go of the big boiler in which she had no doubt she would be thrown. The water had been boiling for far too long and now yearned for a release. From the steam that came, it darkened even more. The mad, the wench, and the gore would follow if she hadn't taken a grip of herself. It was clear that she had been there for no reason whatsoever, other than be caught in by herself. Nomq ran way through the stairs and sprinted straight to her room. Some signs had been shown but nothing more. She had been the same as it had looked before, one who had been lost and lost no more. Inside the room she locked herself and waited. Something in her mask had malfunctioned because she could only hear fragments of the original language mixed with the words which came to her ear. She would fear, her heart beat at a level which had closed in to a stroke. They wanted her dead and they knew what she was. No, if they get to me, they'll eat me, they'll boil me alive, and I'll be in agony before I could even get to be rescued. But what other hope was there? Other than something she had seen, as soon as she would let go of the door, they would come through. After that, there'd be no way out, no chance for her to redeem herself from the pain they would inflict. It pushed her past the edge, to the point where she came to her senses and accepted her only fate. She laughed and danced, in her mind, safe, she jumped through the hole and winced. Her eyes had been closed and opened as soon as she had hit the ground. There had only been a few feet in, until the reality managed to sink in. The metal which had surrounded her, the coldness of the machine, apparently, she had been saved. From above, there had been a long arm with an injection piston going straight through her spine. It felt as impregnating as ever, going by the likes of which there couldn't have been a though. She wouldn't look nor say a thing that was it, without a doubt. Sick to her stomach as she had been, Nomq had noticed the high drop from which she fell. There was someone out there, above her, more than someone, there were living being there, glassy eyed but very much alive. As soon as they had noticed her staring, they had immediately backed away from sight and ran in whatever direction they could reach. Meanwhile, she was there, standing almost erect with that damned machine. What exactly was it pumping in her rear? Why was she there if not out of fear? Suddenly she had been released. Out of her spine, there it popped, pushing her as far away from the point where she had been originally removed from. A noise had come, someone was down there as well. Despite the fact that the metal pole which had saved her went away, there were things down there. Again, most of them were very much alive. They were hairy things which looked like dust beings, being coloured by the filth which laid around. Clearly something about them had been solid if they managed to bore their loincloth bands around their bodies. But other than that, their feet weren't normal, they had no ends and seemed to hover over. From their insides there could be noticed the outline of a giant eye. Their entire entities felt like giant eyes which hid themselves underneath bodies to make her be unaware and lost. It had worked very much, as she had followed them, always kept at a distance. 'I won't be able to keep up if you're going that way. There's no need for you to run. Where are you taking me?' Nothing was more pitiful to her than the way she acted and the way she spoke. Her words were pitiful and as it happened, there had been more than a few occasions where she fell. Plenty of the turns they lead her towards closed in to edges above another level. And this facility went deep. It felt as if it had no end, by the looks of which, she could almost know that there wasn't an end. There were too many widespread structures there, too many devices. And to top it all, there had been a rolling machine, far in the distance, chained to the ground but not held in place. It looked as if it had been used to descend far beyond the human limits, which begged for her to check it out. Plenty more of the strange tribe came near her but never touched. Am I being lured into a trap? She wondered as she went away, unable to be swayed out of it. Danger ran amongst the place, not only that of falling but what her imagination ran wild. It was deranged and she would go blind again as she went into the town again. Finding herself there after that near-death experience shocked her beyond relief. But strangely enough, everything there was even. There were no different levels and no depth beyond the earth through which she went. Something was definitely not the way she wanted it to be. 'What happened to my nails?' They had been ripped but only in halves, leaving her marked by a few coming signs of the infection. There was a clear way of handling things and this wasn't one of it. As soon as she saw it, she went to the nearest sand pile and showed them in. Nomq felt the pain get past beyond the point of being unbearable, only to push herself into the sand. Either her fingers would decay and fall off or she could prevent it somehow. But the help wouldn't be there, not with her device malfunctioning. A recurring thought was the fact that she needed to repair it. Under no circumstances could she avoid it, to say the least, until there was someone who might guide her around. No more trust into the strangers. But how else could she repair it? That had never occurred to her. 'If they knew what I was, I would immediately get betrayed or punished, slain and eaten.' Perhaps it would be worse than that, to the point of being beaten. It wasn't certain and neither woe could distract her from saying the things which had been said. Better yet, she went around and looked at a body which had been left to rot. It wore the same mask, which hadn't been removed from it, meaning that either it would be taken from there, or else there could be a reason for which there was a dreadful stare in his eyes. For some reason, it was set on his mask, with its old hand rubbed and left around its reaches and his eyes set on the device. The various holes in it were much bigger and from the looks and kind, it had been an old model. Not that she could complain after picking it up, but the corpse that suddenly lost its head, which rolled and turned into dust as soon as the mask had been taken away. 'Could I have been wrong about you?' She said before she looked around. There were some strangers in the distance, but they were going down the slope, never passing beyond the road. It was an interesting type of detail at least, as she thought about it. It was wrong. The mask had fit but this model had a mouth piece getting close to being shoved down her throat. Not only had it been uncomfortable but she started seeing things. Wrong things, worse than the nightmarish visions she had imagined herself near. As soon as she turned herself to the sky, the light had started pushing downward and as she started seeing things, the colours mixed with everything, leaving two blank dark spots and a long oval underneath. Yet another dark image haunted her, to the point where it had looked vaguely alive, the face that seemed to haunt her at every turn. From a vivid face, it turned and spread across the area where the sky laid. She had been thoroughly through it over and over again, being aware that she was being mocked by images happening in her own head. The wasn't the least of her problems, nor the mask, but the fact that she was in place she didn't belong to, surrounded by untrustworthy creatures that were anything but approachable. Had the split from the one who wanted to help her even granted her that well of an excuse to be out there alone? Being in the state she was

wasn't going to do her anything but drive her mad. Either that or she would plainly join the line of execution. 'There's no on there.' It was a sure thing, a slow day per say, the fact that not even the executioner had shown himself up there, only a few of the lackeys who were busy doing the cleaning and chewing in-between their lousy breaks. But for once, she had been disgusted by the fact that they were eating ears, actual ears, undoubtedly from the likes of the prisoners who had died there. It was unnerving to watch, yet she couldn't take her gaze away. Something in her had clearly been wrong. This couldn't be denied either, since the visions, the mockery and even the pleasure she took in looking at other people's suffering. It was something which calmed her down, just thinking that in some other plane, the prisoners were alive. And each bite which had been taken by one of them had been felt by the beings in their other planes of existence. The sting of the teeth biting into them, the acid burning what's left of their digested functions as well, it was dreadful to think about it. But she had, and pleased herself while doing so. Others passed by but no one had noticed, it was clear that underneath her cover, there stood a pair of deep, instead and blood-shut eyes. Nowhere near anything else could it have been clearer that her eyes froze and saw the dreadful extent of some near sighted animal in hiding. Nomq ran as soon as she seemed to have been pulled over by strangers who were sniffing around. Someone had been on alert, they might've been warned about her presence or something similar because she knew that there wasn't any way she could stand there and be looked for. In another corner she went, without looking back, whilst trying to stray away. Above her laid a prime example of the architecture inside the giant corpse. They had built giant blocks which lead to the ramps above. Apparently, they had busied themselves enough to colonise the insides of the creature. But that wasn't her thing, she wasn't ready to get there, not without something proper, not without something which would make her one of theirs. The holes through the rotting corpse were still there, and as she went farther inside the bulkier side of the back of it, she realised that there'd be far lesser light coming in. 'Anything would suffice if I were to escape your sight.' It was dark enough there and she was getting near what seemed to have been a pair of discarded lungs. They were filled, but not with those of which she would expect. 'Stop there, are you the one who claims to be one of ours?' There wasn't enough time to think this through, as she was taken far too sudden to use her thought. It was peculiar and strange, the way he dressed. A few arms laid beneath the pure-white robe it wore, right under the spiked and fading green, grayish mask, which seemed to have topped over a few levels. As sharp as they were, the spikes were rather long and thin, giving the false impression of having hairs all over. It was unsurprising, especially if judged after the fact that there were a few arms which didn't fall in the category at all. They were revealed to be long and pointy, with no fingers but conical blade like holders which seemed to be similar to pincers but not entirely so. From some point inside them, they widened and spread. Short puffs of air spread and the body revealed itself and some sort of open thing, from which the bones could've been seen. He had been the victim of some fatal event that much had been certain. Most of the meat inside had been gone, but that's not what he had intended for her to see. Merely, it was a matter of vision or perspective. 'This symbol, the metal insignia, do you see it? Do you dare bear it over yourself?' Words couldn't begin to describe what was going on there, but vaguely, a reaction of metal, bone and what had remained of its meat happened to mold together and disappear inside. From the harshness it provided, it molded itself into a mark which had been lodged inside but looked natural. Something akin to a birth mark or some ink splash left there to signal he was one of theirs. 'I don't think I can provide any of those over my body.' 'Then you are not one of ours, return when you may obtain one and we may talk.' Undoubtedly, the same thing applied to the other side, where the other lungs seemed to rest, connected by a fashioned tunnel which connected both of them at the top. It would've been uncomfortable nonetheless, as she had noticed and thought. From all that she could see, there was far more danger out there than anywhere else. It was even more peculiar, that she could think off that she looked and saw. Others, real ones, hiding in the same manner and she had been in. One deep desire had arisen, that she would want to approach and interact with them was a normal urge she had felt. It couldn't have been any other way, of that it was clear and she was aware of the risks, but they were there. She urged herself to remain calm there, at least to the point where she felt comfortable with herself and with the ones that stood watch. Some of them at least had decided to stand and look above the cut and fix themselves on her. And they weren't alone. Tall crooks stood on walls and looked with deep inset blue eyes, neither of them looking even remotely human but primitive in form and the way they acted. Something about their face didn't reveal much, other than a long scourging extraction which had left them lacking in a few quarters below their necks. Obviously, some kind of surgery had taken place, if that's how they turned to be. And most of them walked around their very own, keeping to their group or congregation. Their clothes were pitifully dulled by the dark which roamed from above. If there was one thing to be pointed at, it had been the fact that they bore some sort of long untouched stomach, or rather, a long and thing gut which interconnected and made an on-going system between one another. Four of them shared in their agony together and it seemed that whatever impression she had been given about being followed had faded away. Doused off in their thoughts, they had sunken inside their wretchedness and kept to themselves. A more damning thing was the fact that they were pulling at one another, going rather pale under their dark masks. Some euphoric feeling might've encompassed them, the thought off almost came to make her pity them. 'I cannot think of them yet, no, don't get near them.' Again, she thought aloud, unable to see whether or not there would be any friend or foe near-by. Strangely enough, there was certain emptiness there. The houses had been abandoned, yet she found food supplies in there. It could very be that she was stealing there, merely theft without a second thought about the owners who might've worked for those supplies. The beds as well, those had been left there. Dust laid over them, but she laid there nonetheless. Again, it had been a wicked night. She looked in every corner unable to define who was walking upstairs. There wasn't any way this could've become that much darker, not in a certain way, not unless she knew of anything of her own. Someone had followed her that was certain, she wasn't paranoid. Within a stroll, she made it for the stairs to confront whoever was up there, only to be stopped. It had been through the ceiling that she saw the other half. It had been the body of someone who bore fat around his waist, and the noise she heard as well was recognisable now. That had been a man, or someone who looked like a man and he had managed to get through the bottom of his floor as if from an illusion. With her sleep disturbed, she went below and ran out of her home. In the distance, the sky had darkened enough to leave everything near a pitch black. Many of them had managed to gather up on wall that they had become almost a living circuit of some kind. It was dangerous there but she hadn't a clue what she was up against. Underneath herself she saw a gray light, merely inches underneath. Nomq walked on some sort of flea-like disk, against which she pushed the darkness out of the way, only to be replaced immediately as her small area had been left. The way the dark looked there was unnatural, to the very point where it looked like a dark storm with long transparent wires and small dots appearing and bouncing against her view. Whatever this had been,

it had thoroughly displeased her in every sense of the word. They were out there, she knew it well enough. One close encounter had happened as well. As she had closed in to one of the buildings, she had met one lonely watcher. Upon a close notice, it had been decided that she was there on a note of dread. Many of its facial features had been lacking as they interconnected with the rest of the body. Even the gaps between its fingers were missing there, having become one with the rest of its wicked body. It shook there as her sight, especially as she moved her hands to see whether it would be afraid. There was nothing more dreadful than the way she felt. Under normal circumstances, she would've enjoyed the agony at this creature's expense, but otherwise, it hadn't happened. She was still feeling rather distant. It was a complex set of rabid turns that got her where she thought she needed to be. A small piece of the road had taken an unexpected turn and it looked as if the disk she was underneath had suddenly expanded. In every direction there laid a home, one of which turned. They were rotation, slowly, bearing various head signs on top and on every sides. The heads were bearing their eyes in different forms, not to mention that the other facial features were rather unnatural as well, but one thing had been rather consistent about them. As much as they were strange, they bore openings inside of them, which brought the sense of being lost. That had been the cause. She could see other worlds through the open doors that rotated. Many of them were different, as with each turn there was another reveal of where she may go. One of them bore hills in the distance, as well as a giant tentacle which had splayed the land with its destruction, others looked current, a city per say. It had the air of normality and the desire of a layman behind in. There was a rain and a long bridge lost itself in the purple mist, from which its toxin could be felt from afar. But she knew, she could see behind the mist. It had been that garden of deep reddish roses that almost had her step in. Deeply enamoured as she had been by the sight, it had been made clear that there were too many of them to choose from. Cold from one side, hot from another, a place that was bare and from which she had a clear view of space. A true image of it, unlike the sighting around for stars, that view alone made her think that there'd be no way out. From there, her lungs would be crushed in the truest sense and it would be likely that that she'd die out there in moments after stepping through. 'There are too many of them to choose from, what if I make the wrong choice?' There was clearly something she had her eyes on, as soon as she had seen the stones and the pools of sacrificial blood. Clearly, there had been a fight out there, as much as she'd enjoy it. It had been sweet to look but without being able to commit to one, she closed her eyes and walked through one. Her sight had faded into mist, as she had lain on the bridge. Both ways, as it had lain made it so there wasn't any way to return. What was there? If not for the single piece of stone, as she had noticed in the distance, clearly there had been a way to get there. Those weren't different planes after all, as she would recognise the blood anywhere. Its scent was strongly embedded in her mind and as she knew there'd be no other way that that, she came to her senses and walked over to the other side. There was the garden she had been promised. Or at least what had remained of it. Her smile had faded as soon as she had realised that there were things there which didn't belong. Too much of that boiling substance fell in the roses, something had dripped inside of them. Looking above she had noticed one of the inhabitants of the oak which lay above with its reddish leaves. It had been a bottom leaded, oblong faced, sharp eyed blue coloured tube which grinned. From its sides came the legs, which anchored around the branches. More of them lay around, seemingly spitting on the roses from time to time only to fill them to the brim with their repulsing liquids. As soon as she came into sight, they hissed and began the production of more of that ooze which dripped from their insides. Those jets or open valves weren't even directed at her, but seemed to have only improved the production as if they were following a quota and she had been their guardian there. It came as a shock, an actual shock, of static or pure electrical voltage which happened as quickly as her fingers made contact with one of the roses. Those were charged and in an instant, one of her fingernails had been cut off from that quick burst. Despite being relatively aware of what was going on, she saw herself rather afraid and caught off guard, unable to move or stray from the different waves of static which flew from rose to rose. Eyes were growing inside of them as well, as she vaguely remembered something similar. Those were parasites which had been grown there inside them. She got away but took another bridge. It was just in time that she managed to get herself as far as possible since they were getting closer to her than anything else. A quarter past the bridge made her turn her gaze underneath the roses. There were tiny feebly looking eyes which had their oozing black bodies tiny and barely moving. She had a feeling that sooner or later they would grow into something worse, much, much worse by the likes of it. Fewer people seemed to be into it, by the likes of which there was a dark sermon to be held. Nomq had been dragged closer to the sound of it, a muffled man standing on a sacrificial table. Closer and closer as she had approached, it came to no surprise that there were a few disturbing details about the man there. He wore no clothes, he had been gagged, unable to speak or reek of pain, unconscious but not dead. What else could she desire? But her face turned above and as she looked she noticed a head with a coiless body that seemed to expand and retract into space. It bore in its hands a mace and seemingly a cone, from its dark and flat face, from which only one horn came, there seemed to be a wreck as its animalistic prime bore down its red robe. The crimson suit seemed to be something of a red dwarf, and from its twisted skull, which turned below, he seemed to have had a face made out of some constellation, but coloured in her mind. It spoke nothing but observed. Suddenly, as she had thought it a test of her vileness, there had been a clear view of her hand and the knife she bore in her hand. This entity wanted her to sacrifice this man. All of the sudden, she noticed that underneath the table there had been tubes and holes through which the blood could be spilled from and absorbed. Even the pools around the place, from which the purplish-red mist came out from, seemed to reek of old. Nomq took her time to look at the man and know whether or not he'd suffer. Hadn't he done it enough on his own? His lips had been dry and he looked rather starved by the looks of his bones. She'd been started by the sound of a raven which suddenly appeared on top of one of the rocks. It was rather afraid and showed no sign of it. As soon as it flew awry with its croaking sounds, she knew she'd have to turn back to the man. And it was a huge curved blade she bore, or would have to bear through him. He wasn't awake, and would've been that way for as long as there seemed to be someone watching over him from above. As if her thoughts had been heard, he had been forced awake. Two white blotched eyes opened, almost emanating light out of them, as if to point out who was responsible for that act. Redness had popped out of them and seemingly, they had reached some kind of dread in-between. Fear came at a greater risk than whatever she had felt. For, as long as he had been awake, there hadn't been a single thing which pointed at him being alive. Not in the sense which might've been used for any other living being but rather, animated through some form or another. 'You're not truly alive, are you? You must've died a long time ago, most likely from all the bleeding I'm supposed to be seeing around here.' He had been bleeding even for the past few moments he had been awake, yet the clouds which lifted itself in the space had been thin and unrepressed. It needed some type of blood which was pure and butchered before anything could be done about it. Dreadful thing, as she had seen him not as a man or a human but a tool for her own act of morbid anger. Like a claw or an extension, it had come down on him and there it was. The first sign of an emotion, the trickery was over. What had been left there had been a barely animated corpse, but now, as soon as the blade had reached his abdomen, there he came. A man laid behind that pain and agony, a creature of flesh, through which she roamed, only to see that there were no common things inside of him. Something was wrong there, this was no man. 'What exactly are you? What are these things inside you?' There were open ended guts which bled and acted like nothing which should've been there. As soon as they were touched, they retracted into thick forms which protected themselves with the bulk of their outer shells. From its insides, there were also long veins which didn't belong in there, moving ribs which were held by pincers and much, much worse than that, there was an opening which lead below. Whoever had forged that hole inside of him had that in mind. It regrew parts of itself, even as she had worked on him. A few moments there signaled the closure of the big tear she had made. It almost came close to suturing itself entirely with her hand inside of him. Barely there, she managed to pull herself out before the incident had closed itself as it had been. There were so many thoughts that went inside her mind. Knowing the way it saw itself and acted, how it wanted to escape or look human, all of those details which almost distracted her from the fact that it wasn't so. So many things could've gone wrong there, as she herself had noted, and it wasn't even safe to tread anywhere else. It felt as if, if there wasn't a sacrifice made or something similar to it, she wouldn't be able to cross the bridge. Not a second step on it and it would be crashed below. Or the rest mist could be turned into a toxin which would liquefy her lungs. All those images had been set inside her mind by that lone one above, who still waited. 'There's only one way I can get away from this.' And she was not repelled by what she said or thought. Her carvings had become rather dragging, especially now that she felt repulsed by the dampness of her thoughts. A fear roamed but soon diminished. She had remembered the pleasure of being an observant of torture and wondered what it would've been like for her to feel it on her own. With one small cut, she cut herself around the top of the hand. 'Augh.' The first grunt had neared, as well as her tears. It wasn't what she had expected, or what she had wanted. Why have I done this? 'It's because of you, because of you, it's your fault, because, because of you.' Her tongue had been bitten once she realised how many time she had impaled him with that blade. The poor body had screamed as well as she had violently shoved and cut this sacrifice into pieces. As much as it had an ability to regrow, that didn't work for something like this. For as soon as the slashing and piercing had started, the red gems which seemed to have decorated the hilt of the blade had their colour flushed out. A toxin laid inside of them, which had been the thing which prevented the poor mutt from growing. Most of the features had been covered by coagulated bubbles which seemed to have been soon enough drawn inside by the table. 'Is this enough for you?' She shouted and looked at nothing but a clear sky above her. When had she done this? There was no way so much time had passed, that when she looked down, she noticed that there had been only a skeleton left behind. One which had been cut in pieces exactly the same way she had left it. Even the blade she had held inside her hand had become encompassed of rust and had to be thrown away. It bore cracks around as soon as there had been a way of entry. Fewer needs had been obscure, there were those which would've seen her reenacting a scene there, when she heard the applause. They were clapping for her and throwing flowers around her. It was an act of confusion which had left her spinning in circles wondering. 'Who's clapping their hands? Who's there? Where are you? Show yourselves! Who are you? Why are you doing this?' The claps didn't appear to end and she'd been stuck there as she tripped and fell on her back. No words came out of there, not from the mist, nor from whatever abyss they may have resided inside of. Some peculiar thing laid to it, having been caught in terms of not throwing a look inside. A few more words had to be spoken there by her, but she hadn't the time to say a word. Once there was no one above the sky, it had to be safe, she wagered. It couldn't have been that she would be caught into such a plane, but as she made her way on the other bridge, she realised that it was so. There was no ground below, only the open space which pushed itself as far as it went. That couldn't be but she felt gravity collapse there, and she had been aware that if she ever was to go out there, in the great beyond, she would either never return or worse. She could meet that one who stood above her and watched her perform that sacrificial ritual for it, with no remorse of any kind of feeling. A maw was underneath her. Made from the rock she stood on. It felt like a piece of an outworldly satellite stood beneath her, which refused to move from where it laid. From where she stood, she looked around and saw the other rocks. Somehow, the weather had not only been centralised in specific locations but it also stood out there, held by nothing. Looking down made her realise there was nothing waiting for her. That was all she saw and everything which laid around, even the oxygen, of which she felt as if it had been thoroughly dispersed around the rocks seemed to have crept around and spread to every side evenly. One more moment passed, and there had been dread, it wasn't said, but she wanted it played over and over again. It was that man, towards which she returned. Now the audience was silent, most likely they watched and grinned, thinking about what she could do this time. Once she closed her eyes and blinked, there he was, afraid, the man who'd sinned. She held the knife again, this time, but hadn't stroked him, instead she would free him from his bonds. 'Don't be afraid, I'll have you freed from this place, just follow me, she said, alas.' But the man hadn't understood a word, he was rabid, and he'd mourn no one. He immediately leaped on her and as soon as that happened, she dropped her knife and laid afraid. Nomq had slammed the back of her skull behind but hadn't dared go out like that. Not with him and his desperate eyes, what would he do? Was there a thing before she'd died? Much worse, she recognised what laid in those eyes. The primal needs, the lust, it woke her up in the nearest of light. It had been daylight then, if that could be called in her notice. Even then, she had been aware of her chance that every corpse would dissolve eventually, and yet she had not found what she was looking for. Fear laid in her eyes, one more second before the dies were cast. There, it was, waiting at the toad. He had been tall and dark, alive no more, as it was said before. One face seemed to have been caught behind, but her bore what seemed to be a big bulging pointed star inside his skull. The symbol of the dark sun stood inside of him and seemed to have its rays twisted and bulging in every creeping direction. There laid no affection between them, but some kind of slaughter. Danger reigned there, in the tall figure which stood creeping behind the light. He came closer and blocked the source. It was well enough that she hadn't seen enough of it yet for her eyes to get used. But that had been the dark part of the city. 'You've been relocated.' As he spoke, a bunch of crooked teeth which had been picked moved. Picked being called the fact that they have been thoroughly chosen and placed inside the mouth like some kind of envoy filled with fear, one would call them rather too sharp. Regardless of which, there was an unnatural appearance, even to him, even in that place and even on that face. Some of his many eyes looked mechanical, even if that couldn't be and the most bizarre thing was the fact that it spoke without a translator and somehow understood what she said. 'Where have I been taken?' 'You haven't been taken far, but it is early and your journey isn't over yet. Eat and gather your strength.' He had thrown and actual white chicken, tied by the legs and beak. It felt so natural and innocent in touch and she had noticed then that beneath his overall, everything had been covered in that bleak leather. It felt as if he could disappear in any second into the shadows and never return. Just who was he? And how did he expect to? 'Eat it? You shouldn't have any trouble eating it raw, it's been modified despite the way it looks. There shouldn't be any problem for you to devour it.' Though there had been only a few seconds between them, there he came, closer than he had ever been. He stood there, looking at her, as some sort of admirer who looked at her beauty, unable to take his eyes away. His heart had stood there and she could feel her hand rub against a cold chest. 'It's not beating.' 'No, it had stopped a long time ago, but that's no reason to be sad or distracted. As I said, your journey is far from over. You should eat.' One hand came closer and pulled a handful of feathers away. In his hands, they melted between his fingers and burst into some kind of liquid flames. They were transparent, colourless, almost invisible and worst of all, frightening to think that they existed. This mad embodiment of a sun suddenly made the flame disappear, she thought of it at least. It was hard to tell with the fact that it hadn't given any sign of being present there and other than the heat, she could swear she almost saw his entire body covered by flames at times. It wouldn't be advisable to say or do anything to him yet. Not as long as there was danger involved and flames would burn her skin to a crisp. I'm still human, I cannot give up yet. With that in mind she got up and started walking more confidently. 'Not yet, eat first, we're not going to make it through unless you're properly fed and got the needs to make it through. Trust me on this, this will be harder than anything you've encountered before.' 'How do you know what I've encountered before? Unless.' 'Unless I stalked you and watched your every move. Ever since you left that ancient place, where the machines still move in place, indeed I have followed you since that moment.' And from that moment alone he had seen her and watched over her in the darkest hours. Especially now, at her lowest, when she gorged on the chicken, eating what had looked like raw meat, swollen with blood, she still went on. What had been happening with that animal? It had looked rather pale and gruesome, the way it acted and the way it had made tried escaping, and it had been alive! There wasn't a low towards which she wouldn't stoop, that much had been curiously true enough. But she had done it, while the mad star approached and stroke her hair. In a way, he seemed to be gentle enough with her, that she would decide to trust him. He had been acting rather nice, and if it were true, that he had followed her, he would know what she was. A human, a woman, someone in disguise and worse, in hiding, there were others out there. Most of them wouldn't bat an eye and would mostly drag her on the streets for the desire of wanting to see human blood, human slaughter or worse, human enslavement. And the life of a slave would be much worse for her. 'That's enough, you needn't eat the feathers as well, and those won't do anything for you. And you've already clean picked everything on the bones. I believe you're ready yet. Pick this up and wipe your mouth.' He had thrown her a small cloth, which she would use to pull the blood off her mouth. It had been rather sticky and plastic, acidic in ways of which weren't expected. Some damned thing that was, filled with the slime-like substance that spread and seemed to attempt digging itself deeper into her face. Luckily for her, the cloth wasn't normal either, but it had been somehow drenched into some alcoholic substance which stank. Not only was the smell dreadful but there were some things inside of it which made it stink. Just what had he made her eat there? Below her teeth there was the remnant of some kindly cut bump that wasn't there before. It wasn't there before and it wasn't here now, somehow it had either retreated or had hidden itself from a second detection. What had the strange man fed her with? 'Are you going to come or not?' 'I am, wait, what, where are you going to take me?’ ‘Through some place you’ve never seen before. Worry not, for as long as you are near me, no one shall lay a finger on your body. For that, you have my word.’ She stank of uncertainty of sulphur, at least to the point where her theory stood. He had been burning himself, most likely being the reason why his clothes looked ashen. ‘You dress weird, is there a reason for you clothes looking as peculiar as they are?’ ‘Clothes, you mean? Oh, foolish girl, those aren’t normal clothes, but a light armour covering me from the soles of my feet to the neck.’ She would dare ask about the head but dared not. Even though he might’ve been able to hear thoughts, she would dare that neither. It would be dangerous to inquire, she knew, about those worm-like tendrils, what had they symbolised? They were too peculiar looking to be the rays coming out of the sun. At times, as they walked through the crowd, she thought it less of a sun, less of a star and more like some mad circle, or a disk of worship with a mad face engraved on it. But the features on it looked metallic and vile, sometimes, the star looked as if it had been alive and made out of something organic. But that couldn’t be. In itself, that had been a curious thing, before being dragged away, at least. Afterwards, she had no time to question whom that was, but to force herself into hiding. They had entered a sealed tomb and she was forced into one of the compact coffins. It looked like not everyone had been thrown into the same rotting hole like the rest of them. The coffin she had been forced into looked expensive. It had been tight as well, being forced near the corpse. Past any kind of decomposition, it looked awake. Most of the skin had fallen, but some of it had remained, same could be said about most other features, like the hair, the eyes, teeth and what not. All of which were still there, being rather well kept. To avoid anything which might’ve had her exposed, she moved a sleigh of hand over its face and cracked it with ease. A simple matter, at it had been, one of which had made her push and push until something cracked and smashed inside of itself. From its dreadful nature there came a maddening lack of words, for the likes of which there would be nothing worse going on for itself. Morbidly aware that there was nothing inside its skull but she knew she had made gave her one moment of relaxation. There wasn’t any need for her to go ahead and sweat in there. The smell would take over, either way, if she had tried going further than what had been permitted. A sorrowful look had come on its face. As soon as the top of the coffin had been removed, the star-figure pulled her out of her grave and placed her on her feet. His arms had been strong enough to not only drag her body out but to also bring her back to the world of the living. It felt like she had died a little in there. Even as she stood, she could see her corpse right next to the other body, which had its skull cracked and was leaking. ‘Is that me?’ ‘It could’ve been and it still could be unless you wake up from this death wish.’ What death wish had he been talking about? She had no desire to die yet. ‘To whom have you been speaking to?’ ‘I believe that’s none of your concern and you should focus on yourself than other people’s business. Let us go now, there are errands still to come.’ She had been dragged out, with no answers given, no response nor any explanation for what had been happening or where they went. Why had she been brought to see all that debauchery in the sacks? Below one of the greater tents, there had been the fights. A small arena, of some sort had been made. There were plenty of degenerates, both in body and in mind who formed walls out of themselves, only to watch animals be forced against one another. Vile hounds, headless or four headed fought against each other, biting, scraping or battering with the end of a throat at whatever they could leap against. It was a harsh thing, the conditions of which made it so there wasn’t any escape for either of the contenders. The floor below them had been crisp and seemed to drag at their nails and the skin below their paws. A certainty was there, which was that every now and then, small nails came out of the floor, but they weren't natural in any case. From beneath, a floor board, square revealed that the nails had come from a small but compact head. One of the degenerate fiends had apparently taken the task on itself to gouge as the animals as many times as it could. From the looks of the body, it rooted itself quite deep. The lack of body around the floor had been disturbing enough, especially since the two beasts had bloodied themselves enough. Still, it was calling, the dread and the corpse pool was near, as she had felt it. 'You needn't stall, there's enough time for us to meet everyone here before I take you back to the place you need to be.' 'What are we doing here then? I don't understand.' 'Oh? Haven't I told you? We are supposed to meet someone, a friend of mine who shall accompany us as well. Where is he? I wonder.' There was a strange inflation between them, and the strange machines which had been lodged into their mouths produced a grim smoke which raised through one hole above the tent and came out. It was a toxin, for the likes of which she had never seen, disguised as the means of fire. Her mask had been the only one which hadn't produced it, and the one who bore the sign of the star as well since he bore no mask whatsoever. 'Here, I have found you.' Nomq followed as soon as she had heard him speak. His voice stood out in the noise produced by those who were playing with their wild animals and trying to cut streaks of pain. Their morbid features were distorted and for a second there, it looked like their bodies were the same. Each and every single one inside the tent had their parts of the bodies pushed back and forth in order to fit the gaps left in by their predecessors. They formed some sort of set which only made it worse. Most lacked eyes, had she noticed it earlier, she would've found them deaf as well, with no plugs going in their smoke holes. Somehow they still observed and reacted and the beasts when they went at one another, but so far, the only being active in there had been the nail bearer. 'Are you coming?' She looked at the tallest figure, which still bore his star high. Next to him laid some sort of inverted pair of limbs which came from the top of a big skull. In its gaps laid two eyes which were almost a third of its body, but which had no pupils or features other than their deep orange cover. Over the top of the skull laid an almost starved face and some features which didn't belong there. Not a nose or mouth, but slits instead, from the inside of which laid a hole, as if for a mouth, as she had tried thinking about. But she would be wrong. It bore something strange, which had been revealed as a ball of many tendrils or giant worms wrapped together. Many of them were either alive, or had been its organs wrapped together. Had it been either or one of the choices? There wasn't any way of telling. It still occupied its insides, strangely enough. Something had been produced, as well, some type of oil, filled with agony and deceit. No end lay on either side, or she could see its feet barely reach the ground. And it bore many, four or five, which came from either end. Some fatness laid on them and she had been aware that this looked like a corpse muncher. 'Who is she?' Spoke the thing from a bunch of holes in the back, at least, that's where she supposed the speech came out of. It had looked like a curious thing if anything, with the way it moved and spoke how it crawled closer and seemed to become gray. An empty colourless appeal seemed to lay about the creature, in the way it spoke and seemed to be stroked by every flavour in the air. Somehow she knew that it was there to look at the deformed rather than the fight. She had done the same thing and seemed to have been struck by the fact that there were those which laid around trapped, unable to control themselves or much worse, for this seemed to be a creeping virus of some sort. Why had she thought of it? It was mainly because she looked at her arms and noticed some changes in her anatomy which shouldn't have been there. No woman or a human should've been made that way, or forced into it. Her misery would deform her the more she stood there, henceforth the retreat. 'Shall we go then? I do not feel like I could stay in this place for much longer!' It had been fair enough, for they went away and hurried from that agony-induced deranged place, from which there was no escape. Though they had barely left it, she had managed to see how mad they had become. As the nail carrier advanced, she had managed to see plenty of them get their feet pierced fully. Despite that, there had been no protest, nor any kind of resistance. Not a single change had occurred to the beings, rather meaningless in nature in trap, as they had remained. 'What happened there? How come they are trapped in there?' 'Oh, it's because their pleasure in their own, that's why. There are tents out there which sap the life out of their victims. Do not worry too much about them now, as they actually died a long time ago and now started the process of decomposition, unless they're to be picked up.' 'What do you mean by being picked up?' Nomq had entirely turned her attention to the small rounded buffoon. It was chewing on something rather hard for its size and the size of its incisors, but regardless of that, there was a deep desire to carry on. Effectively, there was a thing which didn't mean a lot. 'Well, there's this deal, between the ones which own the tents and some folk around which has been going on.' 'Eclipse, do not worry the woman, we are close enough to make a difference now and lead her back to the gate.' 'Worry her? She merely showed her interest and curiosity in the matter. No harm done, there's no need to hide away from what creeps around. There's no need to hide the inner doings happening there, just look at them, in the distance.' Both the star and Nomq looked somewhere, vaguely towards the direction which had been hinted at. Some forms could be seen from the distance, but nothing had been or had looked that normal or by any means native to the land. What had he been talking about? 'Farther above, just look, try taking it in.' That had been hard enough but there seemed to be quite a difference out there. Something far more dreadful laid, at a rather still stop. It had been hanging in a hidden corner but it was there. Like some thick but winder, pushing downward. From below one of its lower abdomens, and it bore a few of them, came a long white strip which ran down to a point where it stopped. From there, plenty of corpses or shells seemed to have been sickened onto it and dragged in its reach. So that's what it was choking, the nail bearer, who was checking to see whether or not they had their blood in them still kept fresh. Whatever there had been on the nails themselves so the corpses wouldn't bleed out wasn't important. But that thing was pushing forth its crimson string and began draining them as they went on. 'It's huge, for how much had it been standing there, being fed?' 'Do you mean how much have they been standing there? Look around you, look above, they had grown there over a few decades. There's not escape from those disturbing freeloaders, they are widespread over the corpse. On one side they're attached to its bone marrow, devouring and weakening the ceiling, while on the other side, they are constantly being fed blood so they would slow down on ruining the corpse.' 'It's quite a deal, if you think about it, for as long as they receive some sort of sacrifice, everyone may leave in peace. The weak ones die off while the rest of us survive.' Nomq felt herself weaken, as it had been spoken by the star. It felt like every now and then, he, not his companion looked at her as if she was to be eaten and dealt with. There it was, a few sets of thoughts which didn't reign on her. It had dawned early on that she would either die in the wilderness or somehow get herself killed. Was it the latter? She couldn't tell, nor could she focus on the two of them any longer. It was them, the thought of being bloodied and drained of her and what made her that way. 'Do not worry about little things. You have a much grander task to carry.' 'Are we finally going to it then? Can we go towards the gate?' A company of bright thoughts calmed her down then, it was clear enough that she would feel the brightness of its glory. For every thought beyond and away from it was sick and repulsing. It was damning in the most bitter of ways. Something couldn't have been much worse than that. 'We need to go there. I think I need to talk to it, do you agree with me? I can't explain why but we're both in need of it.' That had been inconsiderate and properly unwanted, but neither of them had a choice in the matter now. Nomq was the one supposed to make those choices, not them, and if she had decided to do something irrational and mad, the blame would've fallen on her than anyone else. A feeling of solidarity passed over her as she distanced herself from both of them on the road. Certainly, they followed, but they kept distance as they approached. It wasn't going to be that far in the distance as one of the closest ones had to be chosen, but it wasn't as going to go as easily as she thought. To be more precise about it, they had to enter a building in order to get into contact with its string. That thickness was hard to look at, as it appeared like it could break her body entirely if it lowered itself between her and the ground. 'Look at it, they have lowered it inside already. If you want to get a chance to stick on it, you must reach it now.' They had to hurry, that was right enough. Regardless of their speed and the time which had been spent there, she had learned nothing of the people who lived there. There wasn't any idea or clue to her which might've helped her deal with those who would show up to her face. A dreadful thing, through and through, that she went and saw to it, inside, as if to a cue, that she fell on her knees and stood there. Just behind a curtain there had been a few tiny spiked beads which had almost pierced her face and body. She had lowered herself just in time. 'This is dangerous, you should've left us deal with this before you entered.' 'I'm well, there's nothing, see?' Nomq turned and showed off her body, which held not only no mark on her but seemingly there had been no bruise or scraping from her knees. Somehow she had managed to avoid the roughest of mistakes and get through. 'Someone's not welcoming you here. Is this really what you need to do? We could return later after.' 'No, mad star, this isn't what I want to do, this is what I need to go on with. It's hard to explain but this is something which has to be done. And I have to go on with it alone.' 'It's going to be a long way there.' Said the eyeless, the dreadful companion, and the dwarf in meat-suit, the one who watched and get her the entry. 'Wouldn't there be more out there? Towards the spot you have to reach?' 'I don't know but I think I'll handle myself for now. Make sure no one follows me, right?' Both nodded and watched her leave. The stairs had been cracked and it seemed like they lead below an abyss. That had been just one of the sourced towards which the strange or the tongue, or whatever it had been, regardless of the fact that it had been attached to its body, went towards. It lead down towards a pit filled with corpses. Most of the base had been covered in them, man and beast alike. Those who were both and what not and even the ones which had been infected laid there. Alive, she added in her mind, though unable to grow and spread. There was a bad feeling about that, yet she climbed. The higher she reached, the easier it got for her to look at the whole extent of the city though the holes and the windows barged. It looked delightfully morbid there, unlike anything she had expected. In a way, they looked less human from the distance and more like corpses. Small devices attached to their backs, lights which were artificial in nature, glowing with their yellow fluorescence there. It was not something she hadn't seen nor had she experienced there. The nature of which was frail and lost in sand. The image she had seen in front of her eyes almost made her sad. Most of them had been dead, or decaying, but she had a bad feeling coming out of the recognition. It was close to them losing their souls but having fought to retain what had been their own. Why were they so familiar? Where had she seen them? It was something neither could signal there, as she went on. Carrying to the very last floor, where they rested. Those must've been the slaves, who wore clothes which were anything but dignified. Something mad had occurred to them, something prone to being mad and not being left alone. They had been taken care off, she had known. Even though they had been its servants, a bunch of her children, by her of alleged composition of observation and thoughts have shown themselves for what they were. A handful of parasites came out of the long extension or the corpse devourer and started gouging into them. Such a peculiar view, that she had ignored and crawled away. There wasn't any hope that she would ignore it and try moving away too fast. If anything, this had been a perfect execution performed by her. As she made her way, she had no time to say a thing before getting to the roof and sat. A grim view almost fell on her from above.

Something peculiar had happened in her mind, that she would rather jump out of the plane she stood on than be chewed alive. No plan laid in her mind, just the feeling that she had to be there. Though she had been wrong in the past, never had she been met by such a life-threatening question. 'Would I survive if I were to join you?' What were the repercussions and did she even care any longer? She knew or must've known that by now, the gate had closed. There was no way that amount of corpses remained in the pool that it would warrant her return. It had to be, she had chosen this one by chance but she knew this had to be it. Without a doubt, there was a safe less thing which bred out of her sub-consciousness which would make her bleed unless she went on. This had to carry on or end there, there was no in between. A leap of faith ensured she wouldn't get off the coil and as soon as she had done it, as if she had been waited for, the coil started being dragged towards the one. Through its large mandibles it ate at the very top, going through the corpses, not only as fast as it would but also trying to push in it some sort of strange rubbing woes which pushed inside. They drained the very coils out of the blood which had been drained over the years. Am I being drained as well? As she thought, she had felt tiny stings around her body, and as she had become weakened, having her life drained, her blood gained. Pushed deeper into the coil, she could see her torso being forced inside, being lodged as far as if to feel the blood freely flowing like a river inside of it. That feeling should've made her sick to her very core, but somehow, she had felt as if that was the right thing to feel. As much as she had been afraid before, she was getting closer. And it was a long way below if she wanted to return. By the time the coil had run as far as to lay where she stood, she had been suddenly awoken to it. The fiend had stopped and stood there, observing the creature which had been alive, in the dark. Despite the size and the strangeness of it, she noticed how weak and prudish it looked there, as if it had nothing to itself but the benefit of being barely kept alive. It had been a peculiar thing that was, being forced to live in the state of near-death, which lead to this point. Where Nomq stood, there came the long legs, tall and wide, which brought to her only the one thing which had been needed there. From its insides, there seemed to be some passage which had opened to reveal a piece of its own brain. Most of it had decayed if not eaten itself all over, but the healthy part remained. It had been small in terms of size, close, if not to a human's brain in size, but far more crunched and pushed in itself. The exchange would've happened if it weren't for the fact that it was being fed to her rather than a close to skull extraction. Something had happened with each bite she had received. Images of its previous life had flashed in front of her eyes in the most peculiar manner. Nomq felt as if she had become the creature and looked at it as she had crawled its way, from the time it had been still alive. When the great corpse had been alive and from the time it had begun as merely a parasite like the others. They had been the cause of death, the destroyers of him, and the ones who had brought the end of destruction itself. Most of their births had been merely a set of bad events from which their wicked eggs which had infested another dead living thing had been ingested by the corpse. But why had she only remembered it as a corpse? It had been living once, but no more. From what she could tell, it had been affected by the same disease of decay and un-living which tormented so many. Even looking back at the pit of corpses, she could hear their screams, at the very bottom, and near the top. Neither of them had died but was unable to prevent the further decay from stopping them from living. 'Why do I have to see this?' Why were the corpses inside her as well? She couldn't digest them either, rather, they had been held there until their turn came to fill up the bones inside the great corpse. But how did the parasites grow then? Another piece of its brain had been taken and fed to her. This one had been forced towards the far view, to the plains from which she had laid. Her journey had been witnessed, apparently not only by the sun but by them. With their long distance view of putrefaction, these creatures had formed a system of shared view interconnected by long invisible wires which connected their minds into unexpected things. If one got hurt, so were the others. They could not feel her as well, as from inside her ears, there were those long-awaited invisible brain slimes which fell through the air and floated like cobwebs. Akin to her view, she had been shown the pool in its true side. Most of them had died there, it had been the only place one could truly die unless she knew of another. Otherwise, that had been the only place she could either face her salvation or true death. It boiled her blood, being taunted by them there, but why had she been shown that? From below the pool, they have searched through her mind and saw one of them below. The one which had been lost and realised what they were hinting at. With him being one of their own, they had to return, Nomq and the two that jointed her and bring the corpse of their dead one so they may not be tormented by the view of death in a place where they couldn't die. Even the headless laughed around the city as she had been taken down. It felt as if she had become more aware of what was going down around the city and she had hated it with her very own being. A thing had occurred that she had been wrapped around by those tiny speckles as she had been lowered down. She had been displeased by what had happened there, at least by way alone she had been lost. It was a strange thing to be connected to a far sided onlooker, and this felt like it could get out of hand unless she found a way to remove this disease. They were there, waiting for her, estranged and afraid. Something had happened and both of them could tell, despite not having followed her to the rooftop and below. Nomq had no recollection of how she managed to get down there, but only the fact that she was with them now. A thing disturbed her, with the certainty with which she said. 'Let us make way, we have a long walk ahead of us.' 'Towards then!' At which she nodded and seemed to understand that they were expecting it one way or the other. Both of them seemed just as unprepared as she had been, if not much worse. There was a clear thing which made this loss apparent. The fact that they managed to get out of the city during the night without being spotted had been one of them. It was dangerous as ever, more so that they had to steal two of their desert beasts in order to make way. But what had that devil made of him? He had rolled like a curled ball, which only added to its peculiar appearance, which had only been that way because it ate or held its own arms in its mouth. 'This night, there might be another raid. Be weary now.' They said, as they looked, but she hadn't understood. They were just a few of them out there scattered and from what she had seen, they were merely a genetic pest than anything else. 'Do not be deceived by their appearance or by the ones that came here to plague the sand. It's part of their malevolent vile plan. We mustn't fall for it, as well as we should know that others won't. They're just as unforgiving and there they are.' The star pointed at the top of the hill, just at the extreme, where the edge was almost cut and fell in with the rest of their small encampments.

Apparently, they had prepared for a full-scale war, through which there would be nothing but some weird and peculiar thing abroad. Fewer things seemed to bear through and through, which only made it so they would know fear. It was a disease, a battering ram and a launcher which had been covered in that vile form which made their bodies. There were faces sprawls, hands and arms, tentacles, all of which had either browned or had become purple in sight. Something had been inflicted against them, for, even their giant beasts were covered in the same goop. Some mammoth came from behind them, almost brought to life by their kind. 'How have they managed to survive for this long?' 'It's easy, they're rooted to the ground and grown. Their small ones act like biological seeds which spread and grow through the earth and through anything which is of the biological world. 'Then why do they attack them? Why are they trying to attack us in that case? Why can't they grow elsewhere and leave the city alone?' 'It's because they won't have that appearance or sentience otherwise. Generation after generation of breeding will turn them into bodiless roots which will die off. They need the code, they need the bodies to keep their growth.' A horn had been sounded, and lights had come. A bloat of smoke had apparently come from inside the colossal corpse and for once it seemed as if they were getting ready. Images from inside it came into her mind. How many of them had been awakened and how many of them were already dressed in their suits of armour. Strange, she had felt in some way molested as she had been forced to appeal to their vile needs. A creeping node seemed to be strangely going through his head and stop. Something wasn't right, the animals were light on their feet as they fled. 'We're not going to aid them?' 'I'm afraid that the night is long and there's nothing we may be able to do. Don't forget that this is what you were meant to do. We shall return, perhaps, but we won't do anything if we get infested.' There had been a nod and a note of guilt. Was it guilt or the desire to see the ends of a battle? Either way, they fled from sight, while the armies were preparing. The infested ones had already amassed from their dark corners and holes, from inside their strange damaged trunks. In sight the ones that came were rather pale, some were darker, and others had the appearance of bark to them. So many generations had already become far too affected for anything to be said about the case. It felt strange and out of place, no one would dare say anything about them to their face. Peculiar to say the least, they were getting ready for the feast. It felt like, the closer they had gotten to one another, their skin darkened and became some sort of metallic clay than skin. Those faces had been more alive, their teeth were sharper, and their symbiosis almost gave them life. Red eyes and pure blue came from deep inset skulls which had been fashioned into skulls. Long cords stretched from one another but seemed to have fallen below their feet as they were dragged. Without a way to see this would be the most protected they could say, as small legs gave them the ability to move and avoid anyone who might trample onto them. For this was their strength. As they began hardening, a semi-pair of dark wings came from the blotching mammoth-like monolithic-being, the mad survivor which bore the faces of its slayer. They all grinned, very much alive, as they faces had been surrounded by black worm circles. It had been a huge mistake to underestimate them that way and refuse to tackle them before they spread. Now this had gotten out of hand to the point where there was doubt whether or not there would be survivors. This had been a huge scale gathering, for them to have brought not only so many of their kind but to reveal that under their swollen huts and under the spots where they had been torched, some of them laid in hiding. Underneath the sand dunes, there popped the ones covered in ash and sand, far stranger than their counterparts. They had been changed by the extreme condition in which they laid and hardened at the constant threat of fire. From their moist shell, as if cracked, there pulled something which had been formed. No longer would they be sluggish and trying to spread but those which had lain below had taken in the appearance of a beetleish crevice type of form, horned with their long eyes being a remnant of the disgusting growths which had once lain on their bodies. These troops, the ones below seemed to have gathered in a line and waited, while the others prepared. A fine amount of warriors had come out of the giant corpse as well, all of which had been everyone which would be spared to fight. If the battle would've reached the city, there wouldn't be any doubt about the amount of people who might be forced into the fight. Many lives would either be converted or tormented by those which would devour. Many were powerless but grabbed what they could, be it a small club or their long ranged weapon. Ah, those would do, for their long laser rifles might've been rare enough those days but this was a special occasion. As for the placement of which, they were kept in the past, as to be called to action as soon as it was to be. Fear ran as from behind, there was the dreadful ray. It floated like some sea-creature in the air, casting a shadow upon every degenerate being below it. From its insides there came a bunch of spirals which contoured and penetrated each one of the cancerous beings below it. It had become a part of the unity and for a second there, those being almost looked as if they had the ability of flight. Not only that, but they had been dragged above the edge of the cliff and into the battlefield with the rest of the waiting degenerates. They were akin to some which had been set into flight. Something wasn't right with them either, as some of the infested ones started grabbing the bulk of their upper bodies and run in circles like some mad men. It wasn't a fine sight, but that had been part of the threat. Somehow, the unison had been dropped or removed, a link which had left them stumbling like mad things which cowered and ran, which banged their heads from the danger. They had felt the anger of the stranger and would try to crush their own rather than to be distracted from the sight which laid in the field. One giant monolithically beast, came with its eight legs, crushing and sliding through the cliff until it reached two or three of the man craving things there. It crushed them under its decaying flat feet and went on to do the rest with the other failures. For some had failed to get up from their sand holes and had become nothing but experimental flaws. Only a pair of heads came out of the ground in some cases, which weren't even right to begin with. 'Look, they have started gathering up in lines. What must we do now? How is it that we cannot fight yet?' 'Patience, patience, you wouldn't happen to see what they have, would you?' More battalions come from behind. This would be an entire invasion there, by the looks of it. Tall ones, actual monoliths would suddenly show themselves from behind, carrying some wicked looking flag, which bore the mark of the tainted. Embroidered in the image of a bubonic-looking humanoid, they sighed. So many things which had been hidden from them lead to this. They had thought of them as only a pest and lowered their guard only to have thought of the many times in which they tortured and almost crushed some of their own, only that a piece of their bodies would escape. And those pieces would amass, grown and snick away, bringing only more information of their defence. It left them weak, this was unexpected, but the entire hill had been over merged with them and those which had been too weak to fight. They had formed a pair of stairs going from the top of the hill below, made by an amalgamation of terror which had been made out of their own grown bodies. Fear ran through them at the sight and smell. Neither man nor woman could tell whether or not they would manage to strive for a fair fight and make it out whole. Those things had looked as if they had been more alive than anything, but that wasn't everything they had prepared for. 'What do you?' 'I was thinking about something.' Said one of the generals, as he stroked his gray beard. His eyes had been nothing more but a pair of coal stones, dark and gray. 'With that much mass, if they manage to end us, they might manage to take over the corpse and bring destruction to the land at a level which hadn't been seen.' And he had been right in some way. Their ambition and their mold had made a way for the others to come. More were on their way on both sides and seemingly more rays had flown from somewhere as well. From the giant corpse, they brought the ancient tools of war which had been gathered, being long-ranged artillery to say the least. They had bred them with the other machinery which had been stored inside their secret spots around the city. Inside of which laid a modified armoury which seemed to have their engineers put to good use as they ran around, carrying their bolts and their self rebuilding drones. Small oval metallic compartments flew over, with their long strings attached both below and above their pieces. They were doing guess work for them and seemingly, they have gone on rather indistinguishably from the black spots which lay in the sky. That had been as much as a strange event as any other, as something was happening out there and neither of them had any expectation of what was going to happen. Nonetheless, Nomq had looked back and she saw the agony of sight, both through her eyes and theirs. Most of her view of the sky and in the field had been messed with, as she was seething that giant, coloured face which laughed at her and kept growing. It was a sight which couldn't do anything other but make her suffer. In a few moments there were a few things which had displayed her evenly through the field. She was there, she felt there as well, not only with the company of the other two. But she felt as if those metal drones had been an extension of her as well, coming straight from those storing broods inside the corpse. A huge battle was on the way and they were bringing their people from inside the holes underneath the earth. From the bottom it had become rather clear towards where they were getting at. Most likely, their plan had been to stall for this invasion, through which they would flood the corpse from every side. Inside the corpse it had begun. As it happened for crawlers to come from underneath the earth, bearing some sort of timorous spinning hardened pieces of their bodies which had been welded together internally. With them, they managed to dig holes and invade. Those who lay inside the city started shouting. 'They are here, they are near. Bring the tar, the fire, at the rear!' Some had been left behind and charged with their strange artifacts. Long shafts of spear-like lances that blew peculiar liquids and gasses from their edges seemed to cauterise the pests. Inside of them, mad reactions happened which tainted them and pushed most of their corruptions and growths into centralised points around their bodies. All too clear, at it had become, their heads had absorbed most of their mass, including the one which had went through their limbs, making them limbless blocks inside their sun dug holes. Like plants, as much as bulbs, they were growing and expanding, blooming in front of their eyes. Those vicious things had spread and become vile, with pieces of light gray, yellow and desiderated green glowing around their overgrowths. It felt strange, mesmerising, and psychedelic to lie around them now, especially since it started spreading. This reaction had started an unnecessary growth which pushed downwards with its long rooted system. Some strange thing happened there, as it dropped below any normal level, penetrating through the other invaders and growing through them. 'What's happening?' 'I don't know but that seems likely to stop them. Carry on with it!' As they did, the sounds of the horns sounded again. As the blooming ones started covering the sand into a crystalline type of pus, the armies had finally united. Most of the old machines of war had been brought. Their mad spears and blades had been kept around but plenty of igniting pistols had been distributed along the others. Fire bombs were ready and now that they had arranged, what were they waiting? Why were they there? It felt like they were laughing just now, as they were united, with their long cords beneath their crowds. The soldiers laughed and even the rays, those flying pests. Now they marched as if invincible. The given moment had arrived. 'Charge, for the giant corpse!' One yelled and as they went through, the fields had turned from sand to some sort of glassy pair of sea-exposure, pushing from the gun and aiming at the monolithical beast. Three of its legs had been blown away immediately as the artillery began blowing and shredding away everything in sight. Blows were given yet they wouldn't retreat. Their cords pumped from one to another until the monolith beast regrew its lost legs. Those who had charged in the front lines had been immediately smashed by a charging blast of pure mass. Most of the others which had lain around hadn't stopped either, as they continued jumping with their long twisted legs. Their legs had become fleshy and seemed to have extended from inside their bodies. Each time they would do it, with each leap that went on, parts of their torsos and arms had been emptied and pushed away. Some sort of dignity had been taken as those decaying men had been slashed and broken, pushed away by a bunch of flying meat-suits which were supposed to be mindless but for some reason thought for themselves. As much as it had been desired, there was fire. All around the field, for the best and the worst, kept aside, it spread through them and seemed to be barely affecting their newly molded skin. But they still had no weapons and had been taken by surprise. Those short lances cut through their heated armors unlike anything that ever touched them. One head suddenly exploded in an area surrounding its total diameter, blowing away the lower torso and two remaining thirds of its legs. As much as its shell had been heated, one spear had managed to cut deep enough to get all the air pressure inside of it, enough that it would spread and lead the fire inside. They're gaseous, inside, they're gaseous! 'Do you hear that? They're gaseous inside, their insides bear!' Before he could search anyone though, he had been leapt upon and eaten alive, down to his bones before anyone could hear what the man had been yelling. As he had been stricken down by them, there wasn't any entry point through which the cavalry could break through because the wall of tinder had been blown there. Some strange gases lay around and seemed to move at unruly phases through which neither man nor woe could guess at. There had been a few others who hinted at trying their luck, those who went alone, like mad fighters who would die in their way to glory. 'They won't stop us now, we've gone too far, and they shall be ours. Don't interfere with me, scum!' One lone corpse soldier seemed to have been lost on the battle field. He wasn't what he had appeared to be, his eyes were bloodshot and as they had become beads, as beetles, they crawled away from his face. He had no need for those, now that he would charge alone in the utmost terrible manners from which he had been raised into. There were soles on the ground, he knelt and felt them. One cry of skin and flesh, the smell was distinct than that of his men. He came near and began to fire. He couldn't see right, but he knew he had crushed him by the cord. A short pair of moments came. He was there, in truth and mind, but also blind. But he felt the pressure, he heard it like a tube or a pipe or a valve being taken over and crushed. From that he felt the gluttony moving, trying to crawl. Somehow it had been lost from the others and got to lay in some permanent disgusting movement for certainty that it would live. It hadn't succeeded in its flight as the man, the corpse, ripped a fire device and enflamed the ground around him, burning everything in sight as a result. There were others like him with no personal regard for their lives. Something dreadful had happened and most of them had been afraid. Paranoid at that and unable to cope with the vaguest traps, circles being on the ground were spreading. Were those their own or the machines they had placed behind? This was chaos in its true form, they were men amongst them fight as well. Strangely, as the corpses had noticed, they weren't as weak and frail as the claims had been and they fought virtuously to bring down the monolith, even though it had been merely a temporary break rather than it being destroyed. They had clustered around him and caught his legs with long spike web-like net and started pulling. Those things acted like masks of the kind which would rub them and keep cutting with their knife-life edges, slowly disemboweling its legs and most importantly, tripping it down. 'That's the chance, go for it, and bring it down before it grows again.' Somehow the fall had broken something in its head. Either its brain had been displaced or something inside, which still bore bones or some poor imitation which didn't act like them at all. A few more minutes passed. There had been some questioning whether or not he would act that way or not. Something had happened to that small group which had moved in to cut the cord, but what? It suddenly darkened around the field.

That array of coldness had finally spread and distracted most. And here they were, in front of the pulping fleshy barnacle, the cord, the tube which fed and kept it alive and immortal. It looked like a fleshy worm from where they stood, the gang, armed with their pistols and with fire. Somehow this looked way too weak to be immune to the fiery death this awaited it. But some mad desire took one over. One of the men inside the group suddenly turned towards the others and began shooting. It had been too fast and unexpected that three shots immediately went through their head, immediately ending them. The last one standing alive, other than the man seemed to have his back turned, despite knowing what happened. His arms were shaking and he knew there'd be only one chance to do this before being caught from behind and shot. 'Walk and keep walking until I tell you to stop.' Said the man. Ironically enough, it had been a human and a corpse. The man hadn't forgotten what had happened to his brethren and knew there was still a score to settle. Immediately, he jumped over the cord, came from behind and took his weapon as well. 'Listen, this will be your only warning. You either start running or I'll start glazing through your legs. You'll only have a tiny bit of wit and the sharp knife we're given to fend your way out there.' 'Mad one, mad human, I'll die out there without a weapon.' He stopped for a moment had had a piece of his knee fly off into the distance. 'What did I say about stopping? Keep walking or keep crawling.' The dust had entered his eyes, he had muttered something but afterwards he had lost himself out there. It was unfair and he had been afraid. Something had to be spoken and said. But it hadn't and looking back at it, this was a mistake. He hadn't any other plan but what he was about to do there. With his gun, he had glazed the thick skin of the worm, enough to open a wound. From there, he shoved his mouth and saw itself be cauterised inside instantly, as the blood flew inside him, changing him as his limbs. It knew what he had been doing and changed his body into something which would protect it now. He felt deformed, having his entire body and bones wrap around the cord and granting it the protection of his spine, his long and sharp limbs which now stretched and acted like sharp barnacles which pounced on the nearest signs of threats. It was something to look out for, a dread unlike any other. Something had been dangling in his mind. Was it the worm that had taken over or had it been entirely crushed? There was no way of knowing but one thing had remained the same. One glance over his shoulder revealed the monolithic beast and how it had been pumped back up to its full height. It charged immediately and as soon as it had a chance to come through and crush everyone in its path. The demolition had begun as soon as they had brought their own artillery from behind. They brought squares of solid stone, surrounded by lashes and other plant-like formations, which were unlike them, as they had shown themselves only as creatures of meat and skin. These constructions bore flaws in them, not to mention that the gap from where the shot bile would be launched was too high and too widespread. Some of the substance they spread were harmful for both sides. Clearly, their desperation had achieved a level which couldn't be denied but accepted. Mere burns appeared on their skin, those who had been more exposed had suffered more, but the new carapace did a great deal to block it. But the second effect came to view, the confusion and the numbness of the brain. Some were walking, others stopped to be forced into talking there. Both camps had their members standing in front of one another, caught and affected by the pores which had entered in contact with them. Their tongues moved, despite having decayed, but they were poisoned as well, with little to their minds. Behind their eyes, something had aroused them past their window blinds. A few more sprouted there, as soon as the blocks of solid stone had been removed, they revealed the giant plants and the process through which they grew. Some substance which started affecting those who stood still for too long began taking over. They had been pulled towards it and eaten alive. Vines stretched out from its insides and started covering like succulent buns as they devoured the living and the dead. Nomq saw that as well, as she rushed. It was hard to find it, especially on that long and wide of an area, with vagueness to her memory, while she had little idea where it had been hidden. But there it was and they had found it, the same hole through which she descended, through which she found their key. It was there that she would hope ending and in a moment's notice, she had found the door still open. The first steps had been the harder, but immediately a hand came over her shoulder. It was the star, the pointed creature who looked simply as confused and the one below him. 'You weren't planning on leaving us yet, were you?' 'It had crossed my mind a few times, as a matter of fact, it still is. What's stopping me from going through that gate and never come back?' 'There's nothing but your will at play.' 'Was that all? After so much time, she had given up on the idea that her will dictated anything over her own actions and those of others. She feared looking back at them but saw it all so clear. There was the body down there and it had to be brought back. Some guilt laid in her mind but she could do nothing about it. At least nothing without jeopardising her whole mission there, which would make her fear for her own dear life, for which, words could do little to describe what went on as she went on diving. That pool had been as sickening to be in as the first time she had leaped in it. This time it had been more disturbing whilst knowing what had lain below. One head which saw through her as she saw through it as well. Both of them were looking forth, trying to find one another until there. She grabbed it and began pulling its corpse. It had been light weight, even lighter than what she had expected but there it was, in its full glory. A bit of its corpse had been pruned to the point where its skin had turned into a maze and most of the round features had grown and puckered inside of itself, but it had been indistinguishably the same being as the one which had confronted her. As she gasped for air, with the rube underneath her, the two companions gave her a hand or a tentacle, as she had been risen up on the stone bridge. The body had been indeed heavy outside the water and it looked as if what was going on outside wouldn't last forever. If it was any kind of consolation, she wasn't aware who was going to succeed in the conflict. Her fate as well as theirs was obsolete. Nomq could turn and get through the portal in hopes that they would prolong the war enough for the gates to close. Little aware was she of how things worked on the other side, where her spirit was free and the light was pure. What would happen in corruption would drag it there? As the smoke faded, it had been revealed that there were a few words which couldn't describe what was going on. Damned as they had been corrupted, far in-between those who had been crying in pain, the battlefield were a mess. Mesmerised no longer, one of the fire cannons had been aimed at the giant plant. It blew it an array of fire, which had spread around. The second fire came and penetrated one of the stone forts which surrounded the other growing mess, igniting it from inside. It shrieked as if it had been alive, being burnt from inside out with no chance to escape the madness there. Some had tried climbing in hopes that they could enter and burn themselves inside with it, oh vile thing, what have you meant to them? Why had they looked so alive? Why were they worshipped by them? In the heat of the moment, they took the fronts from underneath them and started dragging the electrical battery from behind. Attached to it was some kind of shrouded device which produced tiny invisible volts of energy which passed around in some kind of strange awe. They jumped through the humidity of the air and seemingly avoided the decay, jumping directly to organic matter. This kind of thing seemed to almost grab them to a halt, despite how widespread they had have started mobilising. It was that tube on the ground which had connected all of them and seemed to have been their biggest sign of dismay. Now that they were vulnerable, it was time to move in. Sharp knives and long spears with no handles seemed to dodge from their way and jump inside from one side to another. Not only had they been sharpened, but they had been heated in some long lasting fire liquid, amorphised inside. Those weren't enough to cut deepest but scathe as far as a few inches inside. 'Don't do that, it's time to retreat now! Our weapons are ineffective against them.' But without a doubt, as soon as the volts had been dispersed, there had been a clear release from their stunned vision, from their numbness, which resulted in them being freed. They lunged at one another to gather and eat the wounds which would infect. They had to avoid it at any cost and it had been clear that sooner or later, they could be affected by the same disease which had transformed them into decaying matter. Afterwards they leaped and started picking ground troops, eating their heads entirely, and grabbing hold of one or two in pairs while dragging them behind. They had been bashed and smashed, crisp to the touch and ripped apart. It wasn't clear where their main land had been placed at, or whether or not there'd be some dread to be foiled. But the spoils of war would land there or in another place. Regardless of which, the infection spread inside the city. Inside of it, the pus had started shifting in the sand. Now that troops retreated from the battlefield in order to regain access to more units, they have notice what had happened, the dread and the corruption which had spread beyond their sight and mind. Never had they thought about the risk of this infection spreading while they had been busy in-fighting inside. Some of the denizens had been turned. They couldn't move but stand there like pulps, long, rounded, attached to the ground. Something laid there, white, almost crystalline but looking as if they had become cocoons, trapped, with nothing inside. At least, there was some suspicion that they had been eaten from inside as the mass of it had turned from seemingly solid to a drifting sea of spores which had spread from its inside and got blown by the coming winds. The top of the corpse had blackened a solution, or a way of fighting it from spreading. Those who watched or tried looking knew that the cause of those dark spots above, which had spread all over, the ceiling, had been the cause of those bone magisters, who had flung their long nets and had stopped the intake of bodies until it had been over. For the time being, those spores hadn't reached them, nor would they reach them any time soon. But paranoia ran adrift as they reached the top of the houses. 'Use the purifying fire then, let us see how they fare against it.' A flame had been unleashed through the most dreadful of ways. There came a wave of gas which had been lit and thrown, the heat had grown but to no avail. Most of the sports flew away and had been blown through the curtain of fire unharmed. It was impossible, there was no way, no reason to it, but that's what happened. Neither of them could believe their eyes, for they were losing the battle from inside. While the troops had been outside, there came the rays from behind. Throwing shadows and bringing cold from their insides. It was relieved that they had brought something from far away, a type of ice and cold which almost froze the ground. The fire had been blown by the ice and snow, the snow storm which had fallen from its insides. Cold, frozen corpses fell as well. Those were its insides after all. But it hadn't eaten nor had it stolen the bodies of men, these were different, stranger, and weaker in the eyes of watchers. Some haven't even been seen as things which had evolved, but they weren't meant to be there. At least a good part of them had shattered upon their fall, and their forms had been lost to the eyes of watchers. One floating ray had imploded in a burst of blue dust from its insides as the artillery began again. A massive cold hole laid in the middle, inches behind where the tube had been filling it. Something unnerving happened there as well, as it fell beyond. It crawled, as one last manner of in-fight, it was still large enough to chew a head or two. Most stayed back and waited for it to stop. 'But look, look at what they're doing to their own. What kind of an enemy are we fighting?' After all, they had leaped and started eating one of their own kind. They were strangers, wicked and blind, those who had no mind to them started eating and grew in bulks. From their insides there came bursts which hadn't been witnessed and remained unseen. Their bodies froze there, again, caught by the surprise. But it wasn't the cold that had done but the shock of seeing them bring more. How many were there and how many of their troops had been picked up one by one? It was the right thing but they had thought it a lost war, having looked at their beloved giant corpse with remorse. But that had been it, those were the chances. It wasn't unlike anything which had happened before, this time the threat had been ignored and they had been overrun by the forces. It was getting worse for the small group knowing that they had to drag the body of their beloved being as well. For what exactly? Nomq couldn't tell, especially after she saw the outcome of the battle. They were planning something, since everything so far had gone their way. 'Are you certain the way back is safe?' A tiny mouth opened on the globular surface of the taint which rolled near them. Its grin revealed a pair of broken black teeth and a red tongue that was almost bloody. It gnawed a little but seemed to have known what was best for them. 'Believe me, this may be the only way we could get through with a body of this size.' It had looked that way, at least, by the way the sky darkened and after the rain, all the muddy sand would start pushing on itself and making it much harder than it had to be. What laid out there in Nomq's mind was a vision of the marsh which surrounded the corpse. It had become bog, by the looks of which, corpses struggled, and the sand had been replaced and drowned in the mud and in a liquid made out of their blood. There had been many losses and neither side seemed to give in. 'This is preposterous!' Said the star-shaped one, who bored his will upon the others and tried throwing them out of his tracks, there were a few instances through which one would have to ignore everything which had happened so far to get a chance to understand. 'It would take us too long to get around the corpse and look for a hole through him. Have you even seen its sheer size? That alone would have us searching for hours or days at best.' 'Like it or not, we have no chance other than that. This body had to end up inside the corpse and take a look out there. Do you see anything going either way?' They came to the edge of the hill and looked down. The entire thing had become a mess. What would rise up from below the marsh would be some large construct of corpses which crawled and tried converting itself through the cord only to fall back down there. Despite their sheer numbers, this impediment did them harm. It had become hard to breathe down there as well, though luckily for the masks, most of the rotting soldiers could breathe just well. Some rose up while others fell. It was evenly spread across the field, evenly that there were blue holes which pumped some cold into the pool before fading back into the depths. Another flying morbid ray had been taken down, from which came pieces of it which started swimming very much alive. They had been good at that, giving themselves mindless unordinary life-forms which had only one goal, which laid in devouring and killing as many as they would. But they failed at one thing, which seemed to have been preplanned. The artillery had been dragged farther and farther behind as if to be protected from the pool and what would go on out there. More than that, there was something clear there. The corpse had been awakened. They all saw it raise its head. That big blocky thing, the mouth which still laid close but seemed to have something lodged inside of it. Either it had been a dumb titan or something had been going on in there. For, in its insides, the way above darkened even more. Below, everything started being filled with the pus. A familiar thing, for which sight seemed to have awakened memories for some, while nothing for others. But the journey wasn't over as the body of that thing seemed to have been brought to life. The company paused. Nomq looked at its head and saw some twitching of the eyes, the body was being fed there but how? She thought and remembered the things which had come into her head. The inter-link she had with the others, which had somehow carried onto it as, feeding it in an utmost peculiar manner. Was she feeding it herself? That would be close to self cannibalism in some twisted way since she felt it there, inside of her. Blown by the insides and taken by surprised. There were some creeping staring things below. The hallucination started yet again, but at least this time, there had been no sky, just a large iron box covering the world. The way the rounding creature dragged them through was shallow and vile. It looked like it had been an old creeping construction bridge, for which time had been unkind. Something shallow seemed to lay about it, some scent, no, something about how most of it had been obscured and how low it went. There wasn't even any sort of way to see if there had been ground down there. 'Towards what are you taking us now? Are you certain we're getting through some sort of shortcut or.' What exactly had been thinking there? The two bickered for a few moments while never dropping their reach out of the body. Its glance towards her had never stopped, at least not for as long as she had been there. On a few occasions, it almost seemed like it could grow onto itself and eat the three of them, having enough energy to reach her brood by itself. The thought scared her, as he had become weaker with each step, or rather, how close she had gotten to the dreadful place. Where it lay, the things which grinned and spoke their mad languages had bodies made of spines and long noodle-like flaccid appendages. Only two strong arms held one of the specimens together, attached to a torso and a flat head which looked like a board with no other feature than its mouth. They were strange in the way they acted, not only had they shared too many physical features, but something dreadful laid to them as well. It was in their mind, something which had flattened their brains and altered their minds. Even as they looked and pushed forward their strange faces, they made some strange words out of the spots. Some were recognisable at best, but had been broken. They waited as if for some answer to a question that was senseless and when it hadn't happened, all of the sudden they jumped on the platform they were on. Too many of them laying there had an ill effect on the surroundings. At least, there was some kind of feast, for the lack of senses, which crept inside their mind. One more moment before the grind began, in the most peculiar manner, through which they started chewing their own teeth and the insides of their mouths. At least the decency had been declared a long time ago as being dead, for they had no way of fighting, which gave them only this annoyance to be dealt with. Some of them if not most spat jets of blood, with the occasional tooth coming off and hitting either of them, having had little to no effect. This attack, per say had only been vile. As soon as they approached, most leapt into the nothingness from which they came. In a sudden groan, from the insides of the mist, one ripped its so called face open, only to reveal the fact that it had only been a mask. A puckered prolapsed end lay where its neck had been. And it had appeared that a tube laid out of it as well, from which came the sprays of blood. Disgust couldn't force them enough to wonder. Neither of them had been afraid that they would be getting stronger, but what had happened there? Were they numbed from the sight? Some of them stared at it for a moment, most likely Nomq and the star. The other one had been busy holding and its sight was dim either way. There was nothing it would say for it had been the only one who hadn't been sprayed with the blood. Perhaps this attention, the misdirection or avoidance had been obligatorily done one purpose than on anything else. Dread came to mind nonetheless. As much as they had stared, the corpse had to be carried away. Where had it laid? Where had it been? Hours passed and they were still there, on the system of bridges, the ledges, the extended arms of metal which seemed to have carried them in the wrong direction. Out there, it had been getting worse, at least, from the likes on which, there wasn't any way to return. Everyone died in this reality. An almost disemboweled mechanical, close to being electrical voice said. For, there were men who gave up on their humanity rather than be infected by the disease. As their weakness had been shown and exploited, there were those who had been punctured and forced to burst into guts and fire, small living devices which had crept aside. Those who had crept towards the monolithical beast had found out that it had still dragged on. It had been their main asset for a good reason as well. Something dreadful, something which had made them afraid crept by their thoughts. Others did no, at least to the point where they had messed with their own. Several cannons had attempted to get through some pieces but failed. A toll had been taken nonetheless as they had started bringing blobs and tall pandemonium-inducing modified spores which would carry fragments of their own guts to grown on any living biological matter tied to the enemy. But it had been seen through and it had been time. Most had ripped off their living organs, living only those important ones that kept them alive. With them no longer being as rotting as they were before, what had been left of many of the soldiers or the people on the battlefield, were metallic frames carrying their brains in sealed cases. This change had immediately taken full effect as they had started dividing and pushing from both flanks. It was pointless since they were getting overrun. At the rear, they had already taken care to enter the city with as many of them making sure to diver the route of the mass they were bringing towards the corpse rather than the field. Even they knew this had been a pointless battle. The colossal corpse had been moaning there, at least to the point where it had known there'd be no way for it to save itself. It had been earned, the beast was fading. As soon as they snicked in, some earned the first strike at the artillery canons, filling it with its strange oily body. 'No, they're taking our only arms of fire, stop them, stop!' Another voice had been lost there as many more snicking agents crawled and gnawed at his batteries. The voice module ended, as it just happened for the fire to stop. They understood that as well and seemed to have crept aside. Some dreadful through which, there carried on with no meaningless thought, as some of the taint had sprung of the field. This battle had been theirs and those who remained alive either retreated and had been hunted down or had tried for the city. Not that it had been safe there, but as the other part of the plan continued, the forms had turned and gathered everything they had. From their insides came every bone which had been collected, held together by substances made out of their own bodies, cripplingly pushing and holding them in place. Now that they knew that the fight was over, it had been the time to start the construction and the repair procedure of the colossal body, through which no good could come out of. They had a hold of their own breed of engineers and body manipulators. Something of them had to say off being constant and push away the change in order for consistency to take full effect. It was wrong, at least, in every possible way through which either of them looked into. A closer look seemed to calm either of them down, with the least being able to notice and to see what was going on there. Most of the insides had been contaminated, past the edges of the city where what had remained of those rotting corpses were flying balls of pus. White reigned there, while the darkened above seemed to be grabbed to a halt. It was something not even those made out of their wicked meat dared grow towards. Even the plants they had started carrying in shunned away from growing into the ceiling, close to the roof where life itself couldn't be. They brooded in there, for the first time awakened and it was then, that through invisible strings they pulled at their own. It was close enough that they would feel it there. Out in the mist, the strange blood spurting beasts had been scared off by the flying corpse which suddenly raised itself in the air. The rolling fiend and the star looked just as surprised as Nomq had been at the turn of events, even to the point where they couldn't even figure out what was going on. Something worse than that and better, a few words could describe the madness which had been there. Chance, that had been it, they had been at the right moment and at the right place. 'Look, there's a hole, there. Should we enter it? Are we to follow the body?' 'Do we have any other alternative?' Asked Nomq as she seemed to have finally taken into account the conundrum she was in. Her fate wasn't her own any longer, henceforth she followed. The pipe they went in broke down the line and revealed a secret tunnel, a chamber-worth of place through which they went, wide and tubular in nature. Slowly, it had squared off and became something close to an under turned building through which the task of having to carry the corpse hadn't been relieved at all. It suddenly dropped but had been pulled. Nomq was aware and had been aware of the outcome of the battle but had said little to no word out of the fear that they might retaliate and leave her to her doings. She had been shown that they were citizens and they had belonged there, at least for a while. Both of them could be affected and show a great deal lot of pain if they were to be told of it. 'Do you think they're done fighting out there?' Asked the man of star, with his expression being indistinguishable as per usual. There wasn't a single way to call it off. She only shrugged and had shown indifference to it. The leaking off the top of the walls had been a great enough show for them to listen to and be disgusted by the fact that it had started being brought back to life. In that cold and moist environment where light had been dim, there was room to grow. The matter of the fact was that there were plenty of its own strange tubes which had been carried over and had grown, drawing in the dust and whatever dead matter had lain around in the tunnel. Perhaps, if anything, the fact that they had been dragged through there was a sign. 'I think they lost it. Think for a moment now, how could they have won an uphill battle like that with not enough men? I think we're returning for nothing and nothing might await us. What of you?' The rolling teeth seemed to have crawled away and fallen off inside the upper region they had traversed. The air had become thick, like a blanket, which had to be cut off by their hands in order for them to stay there and walk slowly through the mist. It felt awful, it made them dizzy, especially after a few threats but there, it had managed to come back to life. Despite how sickly they looked as beings which had been alive, this one hadn't. It walked on its own for starters. 'Am I the only one seeing this?' The question reverberated in the utmost solid manner through which only the moisture could tell. A few inches came closer to them looking aside. One great row of eight long pus-filled containers rubbed with blood covered metal seemed to have flown towards them. It had stopped just in time, though the speed of it would've been enough to batter all of them to a clear death. Some tiny spikes came out of them, but those had been too small and not widespread enough to signal them being used for battering. 'Decorative? Why would someone place them there? Wouldn't it be enough to have the thought of it having killed intruders?' 'Then why aren't we dead then?' Both the star and the one rolling below them questioned it and seemed to have lost track of what was important. 'Look out.' Another set of long metal pointers came from above, almost beheading the star and Nomq in a motion which would've relentlessly have thrown their headless bodies off the stairs. It seemed like following this one was hard and eventful in an utmost horrible manner. Few words came close to what it had been like, what they were capable of, the way they moved and shoved each other aside. They were up to it, to feign and take themselves by the side. Now it seemed like they weren't the one carrying it, but those whom were carried. As it seemed that the mist they had somehow cut through had been some sort of net, which had managed to draw in and wrap around them. They were being forcefully dragged now. Neither of them had any clue on what it had been about, or from where it had gotten all that strength. Its muscle mass suddenly laid no longer stern but floppy and seemingly its inside started pumping in every direction. This creature worked like some kind of living machine, in terms of having spared them while dragging them over the sharp locks and long blades which went around the passage. 'Where do you think we're to be taken?' 'I don't suppose you've realise it by now, but we're there and we have lost.' As soon as they had gotten out, there came the mid-day, after dark, where the night would still remain and light was nowhere to be found. It was an anomaly of day-light, the lack of which distracted those around the plane. Obvious to the first glance there, it had come clear for them to see that there wasn't anything out there, only the one mass which was almost done with building a functional ribcage for the colossal corpse. Some poor imitations of organs lay aside, but those would be assimilated either way, but most importantly, they had no care for them. As a matter of fact, they had been insignificant, for this part of the world had been tainted. Even its insides had the buildings which had laid there crushed and broken, slowly pulled away and thrown by the pus. Those agents alone were enough to clean what had been of it and for now, it looked as if the only safe place was at the top, where the three of them had been brought. A pause immediately came there, as they had been dragged through the inner walls after the entry had come. One more near-side came as soon as they had come into contact with the skin the giant bore. They had to go around and rummage, in order to avoid going by the entrance in the front. Such a disgusting thing below, how everything got broken into pus. Horrible and anxious, especially as she looked down and saw forms that had to be those of men before. 'At least you managed to avoid that.' 'For how long, though? Can't you see that we're still here? Don't you understand that there won't be a way out as soon as they will seal us in?' A sharp sort of instinct broke in her hear and out of her ear. She had known what that meant, especially since it had been awaited. But this didn't come as a malignant surprise, on the contrary, as she saw a blood-induced invisible cord coming out of her ear, she smiled, knowing that she would no longer be linked to those dreadful things. Such freedom had lain undeserved, to say the least, whereas, there would be no utter way of knowing or sparing themselves from it. But this freedom had been undeserved for the wrong reasons and she knew it well, for there wasn't any escape any longer, as far as she knew. 'Let me get off now, let me off!' A drop from that height alone would kill her, not to mention that the chances of survival, at least with severe injury had been low. There couldn't have been anything to it, at least to the point where they feared one another. Nomq was there as some kind of mad insurance, as if being alive mattered anymore there. But as soon as they neared the perimeter of the insides of the corpse, the pus had formed like wire-like tendons as they stacked on one another. Most of them tried getting at her, because she was alive. No, it wasn't only her, but at them, the two of which had been just as alive as she was, and she hadn't even realised that until it had been late. Clearly, something crept inside her mind, she had seen where she was going, following blindly. In her head, the gates had closed a long time ago, right after they had left the portal, and seemingly, now, she had lost the hope. As soon as something hard had been reached in the dark, it had become obvious enough that it had happened. They had been forced inside and locked in the marrow, with every other single body which laid there. But they had been pushed through, deep enough that there had been space in there. A way had been shown for them to stay and walk in, after pushing just as far as they could, clearly, it had been near-wise to look at the many corpses which held together, tied and made the walls. Just as that had looked familiar, she knew of it, she remembered and winced. They had been similar in the way they had acted and down the way, the three of them encountered some of the vile workers, the ones which had been the subjects of having made and having taken care of the walls they had built. Their faces were nastier than usual, more deformed, but that had been guessed as being an adaptation to the environment rather than a defect they had been bred with. 'Don't disturb them, I think they'll leave us as long as they see that we're not dead yet.' 'Are you certain of it?' The star asked Nomq, rather unsure himself. She seemed to know what she was talking about, even more after they came into contact with many of them. Some seemed to have spared themselves the need for conversation, if they even had a speech pattern, by having their mouths sewn shut. Another hit and everything around clattered by the noise. Even the big eyes from which light came from, as lodged in the walls as they had been blinked there, for one second, in which dark came again. Something had begun and it was obvious at least by the way it had been felt. With everything in its insides, the rib-cage attached itself, the organs had been spared and now, a forced surgery had taken place. A few more puncture holes had managed to snick in its full control. But it had been there, they had placed themselves inside and seemed to have fully connected their inner bodies to the giant. And it rose, then and there, after so much a wait, it rose on its feet and walked. It had waited for so long now and the wait had been over. There was only this walk, which made him rise there, with its thin legs and arms but giant belly, it strode through the sand slope and crushed the hills in its path. Despite having been decayed and old, there was a refurbished kind of power and strength it could never have dreamed off which had shown itself there. Mere words couldn't describe the fact that it had been alive, the madness it felt for standing still for so long in its own silence and its seemingly far lost grave. But that had been it, fully in control, it pushed forth towards as much destruction as it could draw in. Nothing had been safe any longer, regardless of what it had been. Be it mountain or survivor, this dark colossus had no pity upon his arrival. As he came, he broke the shell that would keep the world in which ever way it had been away. Through his stride, the illusion broke and the sky had been crushed forth. In a strange motion, the faces came, and their bodies stretched in the sky again. Walls were pitiful and dark, and even though it had been a giant, it was trapped there. Looking in a reflection, there seemed to be nothing of him but a giant mechanical construct that looked below of itself. It had been used to carry on the heavy weight and entire blocks around the plane they were in. It had been worse than that had been the fact that his guts had been rebuilt by a pair of semi-sentient wires and cables which flung themselves together before coming in. Such a dreadful realisation had little impact, for it lacked a heart and the right chemicals which would've made a human into what it had been. Worse than that, the head had come, far in the back, the light had made it lost its track. It had been the furnace which started burning and melting the small parts, the tiny bits of the machines in the back, going as far as to melt the living ones to pieces. Their screams had almost been alive. Nomq woke up as well in a hall inside the giant machine. 'What just happened?' But as she turned she saw no standing near star but a standing seat with a star at the top of it. That had been it? But what of the other one? She wondered as she looked around, there wasn't any sound but the best guess was the fact that it had been the single half of spherical object there which had laid cut off. That was it, she had the explanation. The workers were there, but merely standing like automatons, with no emotions whatsoever or any clue about her plea for help. As much as they had functions, neither of them contained any kind which would've made her feel any better. That had been a travesty, to say the least, something which shouldn't have happened in any case, but she ripped a sharp and long sticking part and shoved in her gut. It had been painful, excruciating, but there could be no other end to it. Looking down, as she had fallen on her knees, she finally realised what vision she was seeing. It was her, down the line, below, caught inside a mouth, held together, forced to see herself weeping at the sight of torture. But who felt pain and who felt agony? Between the two of them, she thought she had no desire to join here, even though the barrier between had grown weaker by the minute. Nomq could see herself bleeding through the portal, striding for some kind of madness which had lain again. The piece of metal which had been lodged inside her gut was immediately ripped away, and as she looked again, there had been one robot who had prepared for her suture. The procedure had been painful and cold as she had been placed on the metal board right there. Her skin was pale and the discomfort only came nearer when she started hallucinating again. They were there and they had looked rather disappointed at her. 'You don't look that well, Nomq, was that it? It doesn't look like you're about to make it in any other possible way.' Something sad had happened there. Both were quite aware, though the sight of it was too much to bear. How far they dug up, what they had dumped inside the guts to prevent the in-bleeding and the lights which kept flashing, all of which had added to her fainting from the pain. And she had been alone after, in a place she had woken up. It looked like now, unlike the mask she had bore, and this box had been permanent. Her guts, eight thirds of her stomach had been replaced. If that hadn't been some kind of torture and permanent kind of stricken solid mass, she couldn't tell what it was. Not likely that it had been the only think which lay by her, for a small entry point inside her mouth seemed to have crept in another sort of manner. Her oral appliances, of which she spoke of, seemed to creep out. They had taken care of that as well, that she wouldn't talk, at least not in any way they wouldn't understand. What had happened outside? The walls seemed to lead too far above for her to see now. It was hard but she had managed to pull herself above the floor and look through the tight sort of wide view she had been forced into. A bright light lay at the end of this path, too bright for her to see. She had been plenty unaware of what was going on not to be caught by her own. Something dreadful made her be afraid by them, by the likes of which none would dare creep. It was silent there, for only a few moments until the wind finally caught on. The push had been there and it was nothing unlike she had ever felt. An entry had been opened and there it was, nothing seemed to creep at the time. It felt vile and as she had been unaware, something chilling came by her spine. Neither woe would dare do move aside, the walls had almost come down crashing on her. 'What do you want of me? It's not like you ever cared about everything, either me or them. Let me go.' She said, speaking to no one in particular, and as if whispering to the walls themselves, something stopped right there. No longer would she be in danger. But there it was nonetheless, waiting for her to walk on by. Her feet did tremble but she was lost no longer, in the light. It had been peaceful there, for her, a single soul. Outside, the giant had been breaking apart, without the least of a way for it to survive the onslaught and the decay. There wasn't any certain way for it to guard itself from the dreadful experience of supreme destruction. Neither man could propel himself past the dread he had felt, or any other watcher as it finally fell. This revival had been short-lived, for the ones which had been diseased had no way of having known that they would be infested and abused in such a manner. A creeping sensation went over her, to the point where dread would be short-lived. It was cruel to watch them try skimming away, past their own and into the utmost dreadful holes inside the ground. But that had been it, there had been no escape, and sooner or later they would all fall the same. It was only a matter of time, and as the giant fell on its side, he finally broke and got ripped apart. From his arms sprouted things which couldn't even be held, those which couldn't be comprehended. There had been many beings residing inside it, rotting it, devouring, forcing it to a weakened stake which would make it easier to control. Those have damned it to a supreme point of no return. Worse than what had been said, of what they were told, there wasn't anyone who had been old. Not past the thing which reigned, not beyond the grim way they would pass away. But they escaped and as they had spread their malignant blood over the pastures and the green hills upon which the giant fell. While from the other side there came those who would reign over woe. Some were cruel, others weren't, and some had been laid by the side, while others wouldn't enjoy the show of cruelties which had been displayed. They looked like fat ticks now, grown to be wormish in appearance. Not that merely, but they flew from its insides, revealing that most of the mass inside the colossal body had been theirs. As they left it, there was only a blanket of skin which had a raised mound of those cruel things which reign there. Some growths had given up and waited for the decay, while those that had escape those filth balls of fat from which dripped mounds of black blood laid there, hovering or in full flight. Neither of which may have gotten out of sight. There had been better sights of the world. But that had been taken, grabbed and was held for as long as it had taken. Now they would have to find another host and start anew, that's when it had been time and they just flew. Some nights did follow, but they were tainted by the likes of which, neither man could've looked at him. One who had flown close to the ground, where they had lived inside their huts and mounds. Again, it came, and took no blows, for its thickness made it so anything would just slip away and fall. No man would be wickedly aware, but he would either be slim or tall. One had stricken the man down and immediately entered a pose of succulent blood draw. That had alarmed the others who had started running, but a bunch of other long wormish ticks came and started bloodsucking the others. The small village of huts had been flayed off the man, the world had been nothing but a place of decay afterwards, with the chances of living slim, humanity or what had been left out of it had been driven towards the insides of the ground. The depths awaited and seemed to have been rather strange. Danger lay aside, as they would hear the cry of woe, no man would look at it through any other way than the way which lay. 'And another corpse consumed.' Its voice had been consumed by the static. A discharge which had been, for which there could be no one who may looked the way it had. Eeriness had been a good way to describe what the base had looked like. There had been no scientists, no engineers, no men, nor anyone who may have laid there. The base of operations looked deserted. But many of the living bodies had been preserved and held there while its growth continued. One man had been taken from inside of the many holes which lay around there. There had been something weird about it, to the point where no one may have seen it by the time it had been done. The military soldier had been taken to the point where he had looked aware of what was going on. In one mere moment he had been wakened to look and feel what was going on around him, to the point where he almost shouted. Sound, sound, sound, there could be none of it down there. And even if it were, there was no one awake to listen to it, or rather, to him shouting. There were a few openings where one might've been able to partially become aware of his surroundings and almost form a pseudo-look around, but again, those types of moments had been short-lived at best. Degrading as it had been, there were the general tubes which had entered his body and made sure he would go to sleep. Something of the vessel had revealed itself from underneath the hole it had dug itself into while dragging the man into the warm spot it had stood in. Fewer minutes couldn't have been enough, as it just happened for it to go ahead and start it. The process went underway, there wasn't any chance for him to fight his way out of it any longer. He was there, and it wasn't what one would've normally expected now. Not any longer at least. Since the chance in power, something had happened, that the men who entered wouldn't be sent to peaceful places or those of refuge. It had become worst than that, to the point where those would suffer none, and neither man could look away. They were painful at least, the beads, the pieces which had entered his arm. Someone had thrown a grenade over and somehow he had survived. 'Hugh, what's happening, buddy? Why aren't you moving? Come on, the war isn't over yet, we have to be on the run before they barge in. Hugh?' 'Off your hands soldier, he's dead, your brother in arms is dead and if you don't want to follow him to the grave, you'll have to carry your own weight and run.' 'Desertion? Was that it? Everything turned to something which shouldn't have been, it had been wrong. Before the barge, that wasn't a normal field. There was no sky, as it looked like they had been caught in some sort of flat top or some prison. It had been a prison which had been reinforced and caught in it through the point of no return, with no way of escape. An only reason, as one towards which he could've pointed at was the fact that they were there, many of his men. Those he had got to know and fight with, those who had been there when some died. It was disgrace but he had little knowledge of what was going on there, henceforth he followed. It was cruel, in fact, there had been many ways and openings where he thought of turning back in order to try finding out what was going out there. 'Who are we fighting?' 'What?' He had to ask the man who looked as if he had been in charge again. 'I asked whom are we fighting, sir?' 'I heard you the first time, trench maggot, and I think you may have gotten a little too much force from the impact the grenade had.' 'I suppose so as well sir, but whom?' 'Them.' He pointed towards what seemed to be men, but they weren't men. Small metal cables went through their heads, coming from above the ceiling. They moved like puppets and as for their uniforms, they were their own men. Cruelty wasn't theirs, but that had to be it. The reason why they were at the top of their heads, those strange things which almost made them unstoppable was the reason for which this war started. 'I don't think I understand.' 'Soldier, you're either here to fight, or to die. Neither of us understands why we have been brought here, but that's no reason to wait for us to fall off to our graves.' 'But there needs to be an escape, sir.' 'I told you, maggot, that there is none, look around, the place is sealed. This is probably some secret governmental experiment we've been forced into and you and I are the lab rat-maggots.' Another shot over the top of the barricade and over gravel. There wasn't any clue from where the shot had come, or whether or not it had been simulated somehow through some strange way. But there it had been, they weren't going to leave and abandon it as easily as it had seemed. There was a drop on the way, that's where all the smoke was coming from. Something sparked from a trail which had been on the top of the ceiling, as it seemed to have been guided towards where they laid. Moments passed, maybe seconds of breathing, through which the spray of bullets ended and they had to be reloaded. The guns had stopped just in time, their morbid look was clear even from afar. Even the symbols on them appeared to have crept inside. There wasn't a clue whether or not there would be another chance for them to survive such an attack as this one if it were for them to be met again by the same force. But the explosive had been dropped and it had blown in the air. From its point of blot, there had been a strong dark light which had thrown pieces of itself in every other direction possible. Many things exploded and seemed to have crushed and smashed and destroyed everything in sight. Under a brighter light, there would've been marks on the floor for every soldier who had managed to crawl away, be it on his knees and hands, or only rolling out of the way just so they wouldn't force the entire strength of the device. 'That's it soldier, you're still breathing, that's good news indeed. We have to make our way through, we cannot escape any other way and we shall know how to make the worst of it.' 'Don't you mean the best of it?' 'I think I may have gotten a few too many blows as well maggots, but excuse me if I'm wrong, when I say this.' He shouted, 'But I'm still in charge maggot, and you'll be a good maggot and do as I say!' There had been a dispute over the land. Against which there wasn't any chance for either of them to fight back or return from what was going on. Others had been lacking in the fact that there were others like them in hiding. Something had forced them into that peculiar lifestyle, through which neither could even dare subscribe to a normal kind of life in the least. The war hadn't been over and not only that but there hadn't been any signs that either would want to stop. Two moments had come. One of them had been the cauterization of the lost units of the ground. It was a procedure which had been firmly observed in order to be learned from and well documented. One small flying packed cylinder seemed to have approached with a tiny welding machine and a pair of tiny metal arms. Tiny was a term which couldn't have entirely encompassed either of them. But that had been it. Slowly it had begun sewing and mixing, fixing, cutting and adding the parts which should've been there to begin with. Nothing couldn't be more discreet than the pair of actions which had driven it to what it had been doing. Neither woe nor anger laid to the soldier that watched, only the curiosity. The second moment was the lift up, per say. The way through which the corpse, or relatively speaking, what had been the corpse had risen up and stood there. It was mindless but at the same time it wasn't. What had the drone or what small machine done to its head? He saw that, a small needle-like, flat pointer had been shoved inside that rotten brain. It could've been preserved though, those soldiers could've been alive. In the hole inside his head, he didn't see anything rotten but a high pink, the matter of which changed. Their brains had been well conditioned and kept alive, seemingly so, but at what level? How far could he go, and what could he say about them? It wasn't even as evenly said, that he would dare question what was going on. Those were notes which had been written on the paper and left there where he had been. With a tiny bit of hope, someone else might come and read and understand more about whom they were dealing with. Only then would they have a chance to fight against them. A barrel broke, a sound which didn't belong there either. It wasn't as clear as it had been, nowhere near, towards which either man would've seen it eye-to-eye. A clever thing, coming from another soldier on board, but he couldn't understand what he was trying to say. Farther away on the field, there had been repairs which had been going worse. At least from the standpoint of looking away, there were a few clearer pictures to lay eyes on. That had been the way to escape. A single elevator kept highly guarded not by men but by pure machines.

Some of them bore their prized human skulls around and turned mockery into disgust. One or two victims laid there with them, which had been dragged, tied and held around one of the poles. They had been mocked, at least to the point where the least of thoughts mattered. It was evenly said that there was something wrong in the air. The men stood there tied, with their faces bloodied. Something was wrong about them. For so-called machines, their arms moved free of notice, without a doubt, unable to be kept away in their malignant state. It was a serious thing which hadn't seemed to be there, but mostly they had been caught by surprise in the swamp like gouge. Regardless of which, their empty heads revealed, domed but flat, sharpened with their features looking less of metal and more like some kind of scale-covered skin that was metallic in nature. 'Look, they're eating.' And what kind of machine would start on eating? There wasn't any given answer, it wasn't even clear to begin with but that had been it. Such a strange pair they were, all eight of the guards, such slick and almost thin. Their bodies had almost been starved. 'Have you seen the bones lying around? Those look to me like human bones, don't they look like real bones to you Johnsie?' 'They do, chiefs, they certainly do. What do you suppose they'll do with us first? Do you think they'll jump straight at our throats and eat us alive or rather start slowly and go on to eat us alive?' 'Come on.' There was something serious there, at least from what it seemed. As they faces stretched in those domes, it looked like their teeth had had become something which resembled long knives. Such things shouldn't have been spoken off, nor looked at. Clearly they had been starved off, to the point where something was about to happen. Something terrible which would've taken care of them as well, perhaps an execution, perhaps they would be eaten alive. Whatever it was to be, they had at least gotten this far. And it was more than anything anyone else could've said from their tiny division. More so, there it came, from the elevator, one unspoken form. Their eyes immediately drew in the fiend, the wideness it had, closer to its organic arms and the one small face it bore inside a tube. It had been covered by vines, but they weren't made of plants but rather something moving and turning. They were something close to fingers, latched on together, which moved and crawled in it in the most disturbing way. It had been hard, it had been worse. They were there, it crawled as if it had no legs, only some kind of snake's body, but opened to reveal its gigantic open ribcage. Of course that wasn't its own, as it served as a mere decoration, while most of its weight had been distributed through its weird lashing body. As its mere walk seemed to have caused some weird marks left the way he walked, that had left them some sort of clue in regards to just what its weight had been. To look upon it with less of a charade, it seemed that there had only been a few things there, which haunted them. Some had been the images of the days back in the war. The big one, the one which defined their lives, they were veterans. But in the same way, so were they. Looking at how many of them perished in that manner was disturbing, but there wasn't a chance to make anything out of it. There came more of the flying drones from above, all of which surrounded the big one and as they started welding it together, they finally got the first clue of it being some sort of being rather than a machine. It clearly had shown signs of pain, it bled as well, which meant that it could, or had to be killed in some way or manner. Regardless of how it had been looked at, there had been a way to take it down. Either they had been clueless or they would manage to take it down one way or the other. There hadn't been a way around, no beating around the bush. As it was done, it went on to crawl at its pace, looking forth at the bunkers and the man-made fortifications which couldn't be there. They were interfering with the construction blocks coming from above. All of that dirt had to be relocated as fast as possible if the cleaning could be done. It was ever so serious to look at, more over, in some sort of way. A clear view had lain there, through which it had become clear that there was no soldier around. With its gigantic arm in reach, which looked like some sort of rolled device with an empty hole at the end of it, there seemed to be nothing going forth. It began pushing inside and drawing in as much of the substance as it could. The liquids inside its organs made it not only moist but had given him some sort of bulkier build. This wasn't supposed to end up this way. No, he wasn't supposed to grow. And in return, he had become a bigger target to be aimed at as well, but that would only come later. As soon as the space had been cleared up, in a four by four, there came a metal block from above, which seemed to have immediately blocked itself as well as it occupied the empty space. It was only a fraction of the work which had to be completed there, first line of business being the extermination of living life there. Anything else could've been avoided and looked forth in a different manner. There were clear signs, some which made him feel either worse or paranoid. The soldier, he looked at his name tag. It had been a while since someone called his name, Gunter. It had ringed in his head, with some sort of accent there, despite speaking like a foreigner with them. What else had he on him? An older rifle by the looks of which, he wasn't like the other members in the company. They had been widespread but in the short time they had stayed together, he had noticed the clear difference between them which couldn't have been avoided. In his locked laid a photo, an old one which couldn't have belonged to anyone else. It had a picture of his wife and daughter, both sun haired and sea eyed, the likes of which he hadn't had. His hair was dirty coloured and it seemed like his eyes had greyed. There was some roughness for his cheeks as well, but that had been the war. Another two or four marching forth, who had no way to become aware of his position. It was almost as if he had been invisible to them, unnervingly so. There came two shots to the backs of their heads, where the tubes met and took the road towards the head. It didn't feel like he was killing men, but rather ending some sort of inbred fighters. Why was it that they raised even then? Despite being as broken and destroyed, they weren't even human any longer. Something hadn't been satiated by the least of thoughts. 'Another one down.' A highly electrical voice came down and laid the message. Blood started erupting from the corpse and it looked like a few spikes had come out of its body. In an immediate dash, it went berserk. Blood was spilling at an alarming rate, while the metal wire which had been attached to it laid there dangling flaccidly with small sparks coming out of it. Such a terrible fate had come to pass. There were others like him, in hands and thoughts. But it had exceeded its expectations as soon as it started on its rampage. It came to attack and see its own troops in the form they had been there. And as they fell down at its hands, alarmed and rather caught by surprise, the artificial part of the wall suddenly flashed. The edges which had lain of the ceiling seemed to have been encompassed in some kind of surge of energy unlike any other. It moved slowly and didn't have the quality of electricity, but rather, some kind of shocking, almost invisible power which dangled, only contoured by its electrical power as it had been suddenly thrown at the berserker. Its body turned into some kind of taken agony, which made it twitch and lash, in some kind of way through which it couldn't be snatched at unawares. Would anyone dare look at them in some kind of peculiar manner? Was sanity required any longer? So quickly had its bloody body been blown that there was no way to bounce back to awareness again. That lash of lightning, that stroke of energy had been at least dreadful for the eyes and dangerous to look at. Even a mere sight of it served as a distraction from its real power and the way it acted after the corpse had been destroyed. There wasn't any sign of it as if vanished from the air. But the soldier knew it was still there, part of the circuit, a controlled out shortage per say, which attacked and strove through the mass of metal and the bodies which lay around. Something, moreover gave it away. It was the fear, it had been seen. Some tried getting away, trying to escape from their own dangerous ways only to be caught and strapped against their own. A kind of strident sound came from an amplifier above. It was only momentarily set to show its dominion over this dark box filled with dirt and barbed wire. The sounds had been sharp at first but then took on the voices of men throughout time who had spoken on the radio to their troops or rather worse. It wasn't even clear on which side it were or even the people to whom they were talking, but if one thing reigned as simple as it had been, there was the deal which had crept aside. Some more of them seemed to have swollen inside. Large numbered maggots laid in the dorms of dirt. They crawled and moved but lay passively as they dug up the trenches and seemed to be rather unappealing to the sight of men. 'We're being invaded again, sir.' 'Calm down, don't touch and it will leave you alone, soldier. They're in with us just as much as we're trapped here. I would say that the fellows have it worse.' He came closer and started rubbing the maggot around its many concave slabs of body it wore. It made either of them paranoid to the touch, but both of them reluctantly made way with the motions. They had to prove that they weren't on bad terms, that they couldn't be seen as enemies. The maggot turned its wicked thick of a head, shapeless with its features hidden under layers and waited. It seemed to have been set on the man who was rubbing it with slight indifference, to the point where it bore and crept. Those things threw another look and seemed to have wept. In a strange manner, it seemed like an even trade. Neither man looked away now as it crawled back inside the long-ago dug grave. 'This is just another part of the war. The task of burying our dead comes back to us, without any kind of exception or manner of speaks. We have to take care of our own.' Silence came immediately as the sounds of smashing and crushing came to be known. There was something clear there, if one could just as well tell, something big was making a lot of noise. To themselves or to others, it had been made clear. It arrived. That damned one, who bore as many bullets on its side as to signal the fact that it had already gone through some and managed to get them before anything could be done about it. Moreover, the clear thing was the fact that, when everyone had been going mad, there were other things that had to be said. One being that it had changed its physiognomy in some way that would make its spine and weak points hard to be called by eye sight. Something had bulked it too much for it to look like nothing less but an abomination. It was a walking terror, moreover, unable to be killed for the time being, as the few warning shots seemed to have shown. To look upon it in some different manner, there was something even viler to it, the way it walked and tried strangling itself when moving. While the shots met only the hard armoured or the many layers of bulk hardened moisture which prevented the bullets, it charged through the barricade. 'Damn those, those poor bastards didn't have a chance!' 'Off the charts, soldier, you'll get nothing out of it if you give us away.' But their sight had been clear. It had been fast, despite its size, hard to get at, impossible to witness in the way it moved and sparked its attention or the strange scent which came from its insides. Something happened there. As it looked over the mound of dirt it had created, there seemed to be a short motion, a vile one, through which it started regurgitating some kind of acidic substance which melted and seemed to mix with everything below it. Such a thing had been unspoken for, through the way it had been clear. Something moreover, clears, unnerving and mad had come out of it. The area around the bile had been infested, in the most dreadful manner, of which nothing could come to pass. The madness had to end there, but it continued. Despite of its retreat from the area, it was clear in some rather strange way that nothing was right. Everything with it had been wrong, in the way it had grown, the back of which had been thrown back and forth. The gore shouldn't have been laid there, but the worms emerged. Tiny white speckles in the yellowish green pool which mixed with the brown of dirt, made the colours turn in dreadful poles of malignancy. Nothing could've been worse than that, seeing the bones of the soldiers, the name tags slowly dissolving. Those men would get no graves, no stones, not even their names would be known and for that? For that straggling thing which seemed to have reigned away? It wasn't as clear as that, it wasn't fair, but that's what it had been. Clearly, something was wrong, but their will was far stronger than that, in an utmost clear way, through which only dread was needed. A few tendrils along the way had been more than enough to signal the presence of something much greater below. Though on the second inspection, the men who had already aimed from inside their hidden spots seemed to have drawn back from their pursuit. It was clear enough to them that those were no tendrils, but rather, something which had been vaguely forgotten over the face that they were still there. The maggots, at least in their long and thin forms, resembled some vile tendrils which only added to the confusion. If all, they merely wanted to balance themselves on their feet and make sure nothing was out of order. Something could've been wrong, something would be wrong, at least if need be. Clearly, they retreated again in the depths, never to be seen in this ferocious manner, before entering their complicated underworld as raw as they had been. A greater one reined there, who oversaw his every worker and make sure they wouldn't be caught by the underground drones. Those small boxes were prick with head detection devices, a drill and a small explosive inside. With that said, the only problem was the fact that the maggots were cold, too much for any kind of detection to be had. Every now and then, one drone would drill through one of the tunnels while being surrounded by a small group. Everyone would immediately freeze, having adapted and forced to learn of the destructive capabilities these small devices had. Everything was working just as it had been planned. With everyone else in sight, and while standing close, there came their ruling monarch below. It was a grub who bore no sting on its sides but tiny heads which drew in as much gas as they could produce. It was right enough that many of them were there drilling through the dirt, making sure the gas which had been caught below had been release. This was neat enough, for it had no way of blowing, rather, it was a form of feeding agent, which only worked against them, as it continued its rapid growth into monarchy below. Above, though, there wasn't any moment to spare. Something above them had leaded the entire frame to take massive damage. 'Get into hiding and do not fire, I repeat, do not fire!' Under no circumstance whatsoever, there wasn't any firepower to be had. More of the giant terrors had been brought through the life, at least counting to three more that joined. Each of them spent no second and started charging through, leaving nothing behind but the dreadful manner through which they looked at the world. Clearly something had happened, for, instead of getting at the annihilation, an alarm had been given. The framework which had lain above contoured itself with the help of some red light which spread around into large squares. Each of the titans had gotten into position and stretched at the very edges of the rooms. They were there holding in. 'This had been an example of what would happen if we got in their way. I must warn the others.' The ditty gauged soldier said. He had overhauled a lot of the notes he had left behind, but at the same time he had recognised what was going on. Something about the framework had jeopardised its structural integrity. Clearly there wouldn't be any way to return to some previous state before this destruction, but that had been it. Less than twenty minutes left. That was the timer on his clock. 'Lt. Caporal Sarge Yorkshire was the name.' Short for York, as it had been known across the troupes there. Sarge wasn't aware of how many men had been alive, but had looked at the reinforced doors. Those were actual reinforced doors which stemmed from no place whatsoever. It wasn't clear whether or not his tactical position had been given in. He had an itch, his eyes were red, and he had almost been woken by a choking sensation in his throat. There wasn't any way he would survive this any longer, at least not in the condition he was in. Eight packs of dirty cigs laid by his side, all of which had been rolled by his very own self. Their thickness was the same diameter as his very meaty fingers had been. And there he lay, hour after hour, waiting and looking at the stars. Or rather what he thought about the glowing things which kind of looked like stars. In reality they weren't, but the thought of an indoor constellation seemed almost too calm and pure to be left aside. Earlier this night, if that had been, he had taken a few shots from what he had thought to be his own man. Despite his best attempt to sleep it off, there wasn't any way to stop the bleeding. Regardless of how much of the rum he poured on them and on himself, there wasn't any way of stopping the process. It had been dreadful, and without a way out, that had been it. He would die soon enough, with his ears ringing, while watching the giant man come. He had been big, a bigger one, the biggest one he'd ever seen. If it weren't for the fog which hid him away, he would've said something about the fellow's looks. 'They sent it the big guy to take me, I take it? Piss off now, I still have a few bottles and cigs to use.' The thing was that in that moment. The giant stopped there for a moment, turned, afterwards it took a long look at him. This was a man who had his uniform off, left with a jacket which covered only a part of him, revealing a chest full of hair which hadn't been shaved in who knows how long and a bald head which bore a scar which arched around him. It was him all right, the man he had been waiting for, ready for the end. One big arm came in, heading through the ruffled portion of the broken walls. There was a moment where little could be felt because of the numbness in his chest but it appeared as if the hand had managed to start poking inside the chest. Multiple bones appeared null, to the point where the insides felt like a ribcage of plastic, which covered a few cogs. This was not a real man, he had not been. The real sight wasn't even a machine but a small bed of tiny cogs which were turning and twisting, slowly at any rate because of some unforeseen malfunction. Dread came near and there was little which could've made him look in any other way. But that had been it. Inside the mind, back to the side, he was left there to suffer the fate of a dying man. It looked like death would come another day. By the time his vision could go ahead and return, the giant figure had already left, leaving no mark near wise to the point where he had been. Not only that, but it was an encounter which could've ended poorly if he wasn't as safe as he had been. There were marks left outside but those hadn't been seen. 'What now?' York asked himself, while carefully watching for the scoundrel of the ground. From the insides of the dirt which lay around him came that, a strange concoction of vulgar things, which were left as if there weren't anything but some remnant of some greater beings. But they were there to help nonetheless and they had. From their insides came small sacks filled with strange concoctions of moist dirt, their saliva and a yellow kind of sticky glue. It went inside his chest and started spreading over the wounds, eating and pushing the foreign object that shouldn't have been there. He looked above his chest only to see that every bullet he had taken, which had been lodged inside his vital organs had finally got pushed back. It was a sudden surge which made him walk again, not in any solid form, unknown to him, in the form of a hologram. They were there though. Those deathless staring soldiers who had guilt and shame for what they've done. Most of all, they had been evil, something of them made them want to carve for something which wasn't theirs. No substance could alter their perception of the cruelty they had displayed, but for one moment there was light in their eyes. As soon as they raised their weapons, they were dropped down. That was strange, he had gotten up and simply walked past those grubs and made his way unaccosted towards them. 'What are you doing here? Aren't you supposed to be part of the opposition? Are you not here to harm and murder me?' Their eyes were staring eerily, towards the ghost of a man who came from there. 'What, what are you staring at? You couldn't possibly be still set on.' That had been the place from which he came, the bed of dirt from which he raised himself and walked from. It wasn't safe there, but he couldn't complain about either side of things, as it had become clear that they were rather indifferent in stance. He wasn't though, and the shock only showed itself there, as he saw his corpse being left behind. That's my body, that's my bloody body, York thought. There were some minor adjustments which appeared to have expressed themselves in the form of some strange mirrored pinched chips inside his chest but that had been it. Despite their best efforts to drag him away from that spot, it looked as if he wouldn't budge. He was stuck there, alone, sooner or later to be buried. And the foot grunts? Both of them seemed to have forgotten all about him, as they made their way away, at which command could only mean that they were sent out there to kill. 'Don't touch my body, I think you've done quite enough already, that's just well and dandy. Do not release anything against me, or I'll make sure neither of you grubs makes it back home. He had dignified itself for not even the slight of hand. When he got there, he saw his body wrapped in a bed of some sticky thickly layered yellow mass, which was both solid but seemed to be moving. York couldn't touch it, as his hands just came through. What he saw, beyond the realms of men, was some kind of purgatory. Self-sufficient to say, they were appearing in his gaze and didn't like the looks of it. Forms, bodies, those of which had died there. Worse than that, they were taller, much taller than him, the likes of which had no heads but long crooked sharp harpoon-like organic blades which moved and rested flaccidly in the dark. From their insides poured something of the dark mist which encompassed the floor. 'Oh, I don't think I like this place that much any longer. I don't think I do at all. Either way, I think I shall make myself comfortable in the end.' His eyes had been hazy, but he had been aware that he would be pulled. It came, his eyes turned and clearly, he could see nothing near the way he had been taken. As soon as he stared, there was a distinction between the way they looked, the way ahead, something being clear, that the one who was dragging him had been dead. Something about him shook him off. He was dry, the air around him was similarly dry, to the point where he started choking. Inside his throat, there had been clear ways through which he would've signaled those who were alive, watch out, help me, beyond the veil. This was the appeal of the deformed. His arms had been wide enough to stretch and wrap itself around the nearest kind of senses which would run. The visions he had witnessed had been altered in the most demeaning manner. For one, he couldn't look away regardless of how hard he tried. But they were there, waving with their shadowy hands, trying to grasp at him and drag him farther in this vision, from which there wasn't any sort of escape he could see. On a sudden shake, the one dragging him hadn't noticed that he had freed himself and walked away. It was a long shot there, but he searched around his waist for something, right before the kidnapper noticed that he was pulling on nothing but a poor imitation of a neck. Not even the skin had darkened or left his side that he noticed what was going on. York pulled a firearm, a slugger, which was fully loaded by the likes of it. Something like that shouldn't have worked the way it did there, but that was it. He shot him, or it. And it fell immediately on the ground bleeding. 'This is no realm of the dead I'm in, it cannot be. You're all still alive here, I can see it by the way you bleed.' Others had been alarmed by the sound of his voice as well as the echo of the gun which had been fired from their rear. Neither dared approach, as there had been no murder there. They are frightened of me now, good, let them know that I am armed and that I represent a danger against which there can be no escape. Certainly he would be sure on himself, rather than being frightened himself that they would stalk and try getting shots at him like the dirty people they were. 'Savages, walk away.' He made sure to put an emphasis on the words, enough that he would get ignored by the likes of which there was no one to look at him beyond the corners of his eyes. Apparently they had a society there, electricity as well. Lamps laid there, illuminating the road. Was it there before? Had it been there all the time? Was he even in the realm where his brothers fought and died in any longer? Despite his questions, he had that certainty, that they feared his gun. One of their own was on the ground. His body now wasn't as dark or as featureless, but rather, it looked like he had killed a young man. Perhaps in his twenties, early twenties, gray suit, five feet nine, as well as modestly dressed. But why had this kid picked him by the scruff of the neck? There couldn't have been any explanation, nor would he wait for them to arrive. As the sound of sirens came, he made his off the fence and hid into the nearest field. Hay, too much of it had yellowed and reddened in the worst possible manner. The colours in the field were not only awful, but the way they behaved was almost as dreadful as they looked. It seemed like they shied away from him, physically avoiding contact. Either there had been an aura around him which repelled everything, or it had been something wrong there. From the looks of the soil, it looked like it was too swampy to belong there, much less for them to grow inside off. He saw hairs of each stack of standing hay wire, spread as far away as he would see. Why would anyone plant them to begin with? Unless it wasn't hay, that of which it had been planted. He could be wrong about it, mistaken, worse than that. He had been wrong before. 'Damn you, bloody thing.' York mustered himself not to shout. The sirens had stopped but their shallow lights were still there, just beyond the gap of the wall and the many walls of hay which stood between them. One shout and he'd be found out as the murderer, which he doubted in all honesty that they could take such an out of the ordinary understanding as he had. A story like his had no place in the real world. He winced as he dragged his leg off the bear trap. Not that it had been a normal one either, as it only had two teeth and seemingly to it, there had been a pump attached which was slowly sucking on his blood. That tap towards which there connected the long tube from which came his blood seemed to feed the hay with it. Just what was going on there? How weakened could he be from it? At least that was plausible enough to have him unload a shell. Not now, they're near. Look at the lights you old fool, look at those lights and you'll notice that they're still here. Not a word. At least then he dropped to his knees and with care, and as much strength as he had, he started pulling. The pain was excruciating, coming as far enough as to have him gag himself before trying a second time. Upon his first attempt, he had noticed that the trap, with its two metal teeth had come as deep enough to enter his bone. They had crushed his inner side and seemed to have destroyed what had been of it. Silence now, someone's coming. It was huge, that same huge and dark form which seemed to have come out for him. He knelt and waited, somehow the blood tap had slowed down, leaving him in a state of dizziness from which he couldn't get up from. That was it for him, it had been the way he wanted it to be. Clearly something had been wrong. He waited there and moved much closer. Poor eye sight, by the looks of it, but he wasn't blind. He had those big fish eyes and the unnatural build of a giant, no to mention the bulging of his arms, which shouldn't have laid there by any means. Now, it had been a strange thing that he looked down over him. Clearly, both of their eyes met. He couldn't take the chance and move yet. York had to remind himself that it was only someone with poor eyesight, not in the least completely blind. But that thing had been there, nonetheless, in its peculiar form, with its weird teeth and strange facets. From what he could tell, those fish eyes were dripping and looking at him like some patient who had just awakened from anesthesia. Dreadful thing, as it had been, it would be cruel to look at it any other way. But it had left immediately as the sound of a shot in the barn came. This isn't right. It charged back, placing him as far away from him as he could be. If that wasn't right enough, he knew that something would happen if the officers heard what was going on beyond the fence. It could be that they were already on their way. Strangely enough, the flashing lights stopped and there were no sirens there. A womanly voice though which could've been interpreted as being a siren came from there. Far, inside the same barn that giant went the same from which there came the shot. York followed, mesmerised by the likes of her. It was just perfect as he managed to set himself free from the trap while avoiding the others. The wound had somewhat remained and he was bleeding. 'Augh, I need to rub you off, dirt scum.' He had taken a bit of the moist substance from below and applied it to where the trap had bitten off him. It was mostly above his ankle, but that had been enough to hurt. The first instinct was to rip a piece of his shirt and wrap it around his open wound as strong as he could. Not only would it hold enough for it to heal, if that were the case, but it managed to calm or toll down the pain a little. The barn had been there, just at his reach. He could see a giant hole from the top of it, above of which rested the moon. Most of its light reigned below, straight through the circle and lit the image of what had been a fight. It seemed like there was a man there, below her, lying in a pool of blood. One foot away from him laid the weapon, a rifle from the likes of it. He shot himself at close range, and there couldn't have been a chance for him to survive that. A dreadful unnerving feeling made him want to turn and attempt to flee through the field again, but she was there, in her beauty, feeling the giant around the chin and chest. So that had been her servant, it would seem. It made him more ecstatic than ever to think about her, in the longest wait he had to face. He moved slowly now. Much of the feeling in his leg seemed to have stopped running which left only something close to some numbness in the general area. Clearly, there had been some peculiar round pockets which were on display, which had been attached and anchored to her tail. Her skin had been pale, and she wore a transparent dress which extended as far as two or three feet in front of her and seemed to have been made out of living transparent sea urchins. They were part of her, and he understood. As she lay there nakedly, gray haired, maiden, he felt something overcome him. He wanted to lay there in her arms and rest on her chest and just bellow her bosoms. She could see that he had been unarmed and if that giant fish fellow even thought of something, that scale riddled bastard, he would smash his head with his wide hands. It was a cruel thing to say or do, but it had been that way, there wasn't a response for it, but the simple recluse. It became clear that it hadn't been that way since they had seemed to be cruel, he had no way to appear to fuel his own desire to flee any longer. York stood there, over her, resting. Her hand swam around his head and as she began slowly caressing, he felt at peace there. Blood moistened in hours and it looked like the old man below had become somewhat of a husk. One of her many long sharp white tendrils had sucked most of him off, including what had been his clothes, bone marrow and everything of his being. Such was it that the old man had turned into a bed of dust which had been blown away. Peculiarly said, there was a reason for which there could be something to it, but that had been it. York never woke up from that sleep either. He looked back at his rear, and the giant seemed to be on the walk. Again, he would have to bring someone near for her mistress, again, he would have to set the traps. But sooner or later someone had to scoop around. It was midnight, two nights over. Some kinds from around the walls seemed to have acquired the needed interest to carry over. Not long after, there had been some kind of expulsion, which had made them inquire whether or not. 'Is anyone there?' 'Shhh, can't you see it's abandoned? Come of Thornpike.' 'Charol, stop that, you'll get us in trouble if someone finds that on you.' 'It's all right, look, there's no adult around, there's nothing wrong if we have one sip of dad's bottle. What wrong can come out of it?' Came Jules, the kid who somehow managed to borrow one of his father's bottles of gin. It wasn't something he had been proud of, but his two friends looked almost hypnotised by the likes of it. And it was such a dark night of exploration that it would be a waste to let it go after he had gotten into so much trouble in order to get it. Another sound came a few minutes in. Still, it had been fairly away, inside of the same general direction, which lay hidden behind the tall wall around there. 'You said it was supposed to be abandoned.' Said Charol, looking at Thornpike as he sharpened himself a small wooden stick, after all, if something were to happen, how else would he protect his girl? 'Don't worry Char, I know what I'm doing, you don't think I would've brought you here if I was unprepared, would I? Plus, look at my backpack, it's full of provisions and a small tent.' 'So we're doing it after all, right? I mean spending the night here.' Jules was ready for some kind of strange inquisition, or any kind of excuse just to stay away. There was someone here. That was right. 'Someone had died here, haven't they? Was it a few nights ago? I remember my dad reading out of some newspaper that someone died near the old abandoned barn.' There was some suspicion between the three of them, but neither of them could see any mark on the ground. Either there had been something mistaken, which they couldn't remember off, or the poor old sap died on the other side of the wall. 'It's not important, either way, if something or someone tried something on us, I can always just use this and poke a hole straight through them. Like this, or this and that.' As much as he was messing around, those weak stabs at the air seemed to have acquired both of their wills. It was clear that he had some skill to the way he was taking care of his stance and the strength which had been involved. But would he fare in a real fight? That would make the difference between the living and the dead and neither of them would be able to answer that by any means. At least not without jeopardising themselves in, but they chose to jump the wall and make way on the other side. What had stood off there was the fact that there lay a scorched patch of mass behind the barn. Too perfectly burnt to be anything other than deliberate, but what had been the point of it? 'Are you sure it's safe to be here any longer? I'm starting to think that this wasn't that great of an idea.' 'Relax, what happened here ended here a long time ago. Come on Jules, help me set up the tent.' Both of them were set of placing the metal feet and pulling the big tent off. It was as good a place as any other, until the difficulty arrived. 'It looks like there's a rain coming. See the clouds?' 'Hey, why don't we sleep inside the barn?' Asked Charol, startling both of the boys. It was something that neither of them thought about, or if they did, it seemed like they kept it away from her for obvious reasons. As she said it, both of them looked rather, out of place, sick per say. It was strange. They all knew what had happened there. It was the old story where an old man, an ancient one who shouldn't have been alive by any feasible means came one night, dragged the owners outside and locked them in their own basement like they were some criminals or animals locked in a cage. The family had been, by the sounds of it, used for some kind of sacrifice there, which made them even more reluctant to get inside of the barn and light up the fight. Above of them, the hole wasn't even that shallowly wide. But while Charol had been busy going in through the legends and the myths of the happenings around the barn, there had been something else happening. Thornpike had left both of them behind, talking about the barn, while he went exploring. He was still inside, for he hadn't dared go out there without company, and seemed to have found, behind a few stacks of squared hay, rather, a pool of water, deep enough for him to reach arms deep. It figured that it had been the place from where they got their water from, but why wasn't there a well around it? That eeriness made him feel out of sorts. He realised that it wasn't any sort of pool he would've known off since there were small visible sea-life in the distance. They were bare, at the sight, but still seemed to be quite there. More of eeriness came to mind when he realised that he was being watched from there. Someone with big bulbous, almost human eyes looked back.

Those were rather disturbing. As soon as he came back to his sense, he realised that he had forgot to breathe and almost passed out. He stumbled through the hay and ended up on the other side of the barn, tripping over and rolled over like a stump. 'What are you doing Pike?' 'I'm doing, I, nothing, and nothing. I was just looking around, that was all. And somehow, I lost my. I lost my feet I guess.' He was nervous, and seemed embarrassed, with the red around his cheeks, looked at by her with her cheerful expression. Jules knew better than what he was doing, and he seemed rather disappointed. There were some clear ways through which it could've gone better. First, the tent had been sent.

After all, it had been way too cold for them to sleep in. But the wind poked through and it looked as it wouldn't last. 'This won't do for the night.' 'Then why we don't sleep upstairs, I mean there.' Charol pointed at a ladder and seemed to have been mesmerised by the looks of it. Clearly, she had been there for less than a few minutes and got overtaken by her instincts. 'You don't think I'm able to do that by myself, do you?' 'Right, Jules, give me a hand here, we'll try to make it quick.' Both seemed to have been set on the act of lunging at the edge of the ladder. Both of its sides were thoroughly angled so that it would be rather hard to get through to it and drag it down. There were a few attempts which went miserably unwell until something could come out of it. 'There, it fell, are you happy now?' Both Jules and Thorn came out of the way, just in time that they wouldn't get him by the bouncing metal ladder. Only a few of the pieces of railing which had been fashioned in a ladder anchored had been broken. 'We won't be able to place it there any longer, if we manage to get it up again. Do you think there's any other way up there?' 'I don't know Thorn, but I think it's worth a shot if it means we're sleeping on a real bed and not in the cold.' 'Are you two done yet?' It was Charol again, still as stuffy as she had been the previous few times she decided to turn and look at what they were doing. Clearly she wasn't helping at all, so what was stopping her from moving on and sleep in a bed of hay? 'Hay, that's it. We'll just have to improvise. We'll place the stacks of hay on top of one another and hold the ladder against it.' 'Can't we just place it against one of the walls? This way we're only going to overcomplicate things.' 'Whatever it is, can we just try something already? It's getting cold.' And it was getting worse, for neither of them could pick up the ladder. The shudder and the way it bounced should've been a dead giveaway for the fact that it could be moved. Plus, they had only noticed then, at a mere glance, that someone was sleeping. The snores and the size of that thing back there gave it away. Not likely in hiding, but they wouldn't have gotten to look for it otherwise. 'What do you think it is?' 'Charol, lower your voice, what if it hears you and wakes up?' 'Listen Jules, if he heard, wouldn't he have been here already? Haven't you heard the ladder fall a few moments ago?' 'I think that's more than enough, come to say, he would've been here.' But he wasn't. Not to think of it as being less disturbing than what it actually was, for it had been a form which laid on the size of a great beast. Even so, Thorn had been preoccupied with his eyes always wandering at that basin, the sea, the water which had been in that uncovered well. What had been in it? He wondered even less at that and didn't care for a thing, regardless of what she had been like. A dreadful cause of wonder seemed to have been there. It wasn't likely that either of them cared of what was going on in there, but more so, they relentlessly agreed. 'We'll sleep surrounded by the hay then.' 'With that thing right there, above us? Girl, are you insane?' 'Come on Jules, we'll be fine, It's probably not even what you think it is. And if it is, we'll just outsmart it some way, come.' She seemed to point at the spot right beneath it. Where the rooms above had been, there laid an old pliers, which clearly had its backside burn and broken, and even more than that, the hay. They took their tent and provisions and made way there, behind a small castle made out of hay. Their castle had been surrounded and rather dark. No one would be able to see them from where they stood, thing which wasn't even near the fact. 'See? We can barely see one another here, let alone should we worry about being caught. We'll be fine, you'll see. And in the morning we'll do some more exploring.' 'What had gotten into you Charol? It seems like you really came down into it all of a sudden.' 'Are you going to complain about it?' 'No, no, I didn't mean anything by it, it's just that.' Saved by the crack in the floor, or, in their case, the ceiling. There was some movement above of them, which didn't make anything right. How was it that they were out of danger and out of sight just in time? 'What about the ladder Charol?' Jules seemed to not only be the only one concerned but also the only one who seemed to have noticed that one important detail which didn't belong there. How come they forgot about the one dead giveaway of their presence? That thing stumbled and fell. The crash had been sudden, which made all of them become aware of the giant who stood there. It was an overblown man, with a bit of oil on his head. From the twist, his head had twisted into an unrepeatable position, though, despite that, his eyes were still blinking. They were directed straight to their spot. 'What are we going to do? It sees right through us.' 'You don't know what, that could only be the direction it was set it and nothing less.' 'Shh, I see something.' The twist suddenly started rotating, to the point where it pulled itself and dragged over to the edge of the steep neck. Clearly there had been a gap of air which pushed it away. A much lesser and deformed sea creature had been its body, shedding that face of a man and revealing some urchin in a shell, bearing long legs and a few herds coming out of its armour. Some long grim symbols laid written on it, but they had been harsh for the eye. 'Where is it going?' Both Charol and Jules wondered, despite being unaware of what Thornpike had found out there in the back. But if it got there and there were more like them, what could happen to their party of three? They were all afraid to head back there and check for what had happened, for the likes of which there would be none who'd look at them either strangely or afraid. Paranoid, to say the least, there were other things which didn't fit the narrative, the sight, the light for which there could be nothing but the fear and the danger which laid closely to the stranger. He came from somewhere, and managed to snick right around the body. It was a man, tall but not someone you'd expect to be there. 'Don't make any noise.' As Jules muttered, there seemed to have been a lousy long break as the man dragged over the body. It was a neat thing, at least, likely to be told that way, there wasn't any reason no to look in either direction. But he did, and for a moment they lived with the impression that they had been spotted, a thing which would've given them away. But that had been merely a passing thought. He had paused in order to light one of his cigars, before proceeding to drag over the body outside. 'We need to get out, somehow. No, don't grab anything, we'll leave these things behind if it means we get to keep our lives. I've got a bad feeling about that man, I think he's no.' 'I found you, little devils in hiding.' The top of hay had been blown off, and the man wearing his coat dragged both Jules and Thornpike by their ears and threw them on the floor. Charol follow with much reluctance, despite having feared the man just as much as they had. It was clear enough that there was something wrong with them, the boys had stood there way too much. Either that of he had done something to them, as there had been marks around their ears. Something had crawled inside, which was or had to be the reason they were shaking so badly and were being too quiet. It was clear enough that there was no one else around. Either they would stand there or lay around, making no sound. 'What have you done to them?' 'Oy, good reminder, girl, come here.' He grabbed her by the head and tried pushing a small crawler inside her ear as well. There had been some attempts here and there, but somehow they were hardly reaching for a spot to enter. It would be likely that there was something to her that disgusted them. 'Enough of this, you've entered a place you didn't belong to. For that you shall be punished for what you've done.' He took out the butt of his cigar and pushed her down her ear. It scorched the insides and seemed to have left a few burning marks. Now they made their ways, those crawling insects, they only needed the path to be made for them. She immediately fell flaccidly on the floor with the others. Just in time as she had arrived. There were two or four servants which had dragged here there. It was a nice way to look above and see the light suddenly push forth. It was pleasant and cruel. They were only children but her hunger wouldn't rule them out. 'They are at fault, it would seem like, the devils managed to pull the ladder.' Her bulbous spherical transparent and completely sealish eyes seemed to show nothing. They looked like some sort of floating sea bubbles in the lost of depths, below the means of survival underneath the sea. They darkened as she started stroking the children's heads. It would seem like she was implying he was to leave and return to his work, the body had to be repaired, if the busy body was to be there. The little ones wouldn't do and their hungry eyes were rather, unpleasant to look at. They weren't like her either, by the looks of the bloody eyes and the remnants of blood thirst which laid embarrassed on their teeth and down their throats. It had been, most likely some kind of early meal they had on their way. It didn't look like it would be, by any means right to intrude there, as they had brought a piece of what they had with them. They shared in what looked like a brain, a human brain, in size, colour and shape. He left immediately, trying to no scorn or say a word. 'Blasted whore and her sea wretch, you'll see what happens to you if you threaten me like that.' But he remembered their deals and stopped talking to himself, in fear of being listened to. There were dangerous times there, even worse for him. Another economic failure of the state, he had to do what a man had to do in those kinds of traps. Work until the end. In his packet laid another set of pearls, real globed, white pearls, the authentic stuff, not the likely imitations you'd find in pawnshops. These things had been worth a fortune so far, with the likes of which he could only go forth and open it. There was another shed not far from the first one, not as big as that one, but it bore a second basement a few patches away from the other. Inside of it, there was a lat a few feet down below, with a light installed, the right tools lying around, the globular liquids and the likes of bringing a headless body back to light. 'I had locked the door upstairs and the basement floor, there's not way someone could've snuck behind me.' Dreadful thing had managed to cut in time and stood by the stairs. Couldn't it understand that what he was doing there was in the service of her mistress? Wouldn't it quit it? But it had that blood thirst in its eyes. It didn't care if he was useful or not. It leaps close to his eyes before he could reach something close to some weapon and that's when he died. Then came the motion for which he could devour not a second later without risking being caught. There were some ways through which he could bear the need to hide itself from the others but it seemed like they followed there. Many of his brothers seemed to have been caught in the same conundrum of being forced to eat the poor man alive. For that's what it had looked like. As a dead man, as he had been pronounced to be, he moved far too much in ways which would've been considered disturbing at best. He fought or tried fighting, entering the fight and flight behaviour through which his body seemingly activated out of nowhere and started walking in the utmost dreadful narrative a man could walk through. His feet echoed the pain he felt, for the few which had crawled in his hiding hole seemed to have corrected his spine just enough to have him twisted in the back. Another one yanked it off and started eating through the marrow and sipping on the remains. They knew what they were there for and after being done with the body, they jumped themselves and brought the spare parts they have saved from the man. It was a cruel thing to do, at least for the likes of which, the man wouldn't be able to know. But pieces of him joined the giant and in moments, the process had begun. Something in it had started pumping, the body almost came to jolts. But as the energy bars startled with the metal brass started pushing electricity directly into its body, this gorilla-like monstrosity woke up, heedlessly on a rampage. They jumped out of the way but it had been too late for the laboratory. Before it could calm down, it managed to trash everything in its sight. Nothing had been safe, the likes of which couldn't have been diverted from the darkness which arrived at the time he broke one of the light bulbs. There was pain there, clearly, despite the lack of a brain to promote that relationship, it broke free. Up the stairs it went, followed by the small army of urchin sea creatures. They had been able to breathe through the air as if it didn't matter in the least where they were. A cruel thing to think about, for now they suffered their own demise, if their mistress would see what they had done, there'd be nothing to them, alas. There was naught outside, it looked as if, in the barn there had been nothing there. The mistress was done. 'The mistress is done.' The mistress was done. 'The mistress done.' Chanted the creatures in their wickedly broken language. Their echoes were quite neatly tacked and trapped in reverb. It was evenly so, though that they would get some sort of open window to catch and take control over the beast before it would destroy itself. As they leaped and seemed to creep on the edge of the walls, it looked as if the destruction stopped. It had tired itself out by the looks of it and even more than that, it had looked likely to be afraid of what was going on. The powder and the works of woe, he was there but wasn't. It couldn't have been any other way, but they seized the moment to leap and take control. The possession was and would madly go on despite what was turning out to be a dreadful end to this poor creature. But two and three had leaped upon one another as the great body rested against the wall. They would fight for dominance over it, for the winner was known to hold bitterness and hatred towards the losing party. It could be deadly, it could be much worse than what had been thought of it. Worse than that, they drew in nearer and started biting one another's chopsticks-like lips and began pulling each other's scales. In that distraction, there had been one true ruler, one who managed to get there first, unannounced before the others. That had been dangerous, to say the least, but it had been done, the fear had run out and one stood victor. As he settled into the body, the others had noticed and started scurrying away. They each had a desire to make their way back into the water entry and escape this rampage, this hatred, this need to crush its own kin despite what had happened between them. All that companionship had been through out of the window as he had picked that human face which had been left on the ground. Despite how uncomfortable it had made him feel, this was the mask he would wear for as long as he had laid in the body. It dropped low and seemingly, it couldn't fool anyone with half a mind and who wasn't madly blind, but orders were orders. And not to disobey, it reluctantly matched its lips, the nose, the eyes, even the colouring and the hair dyes. The suit it bore, as black as it had been, bore a small tie which had to be pulled, just in time, for he did charge. They ran and spread but couldn't be afraid or show a sign of weakness there. Anything of the like would get them killed. But there she was, the mistress had returned. As if awakened from a spell, they stopped and looked in the utmost bizarre manner at the one who stood before her. The small urchins took this opportunity to make way and be as far as possible from her and whatever wretch she would throw upon them. It was already as dangerous and it could get for them to be around. Sooner or later they would lie underneath the ground if it didn't go the way they needed it to be. Alas, she had raised a hand, pleased of what she had been seeing. It was nothing like what she had thought but it would please her nonetheless. Though it had not only been short-lived, but she was also in need of some short-kind of handle through which she could eat and drag her ears around. Her eyes followed it as he went along the edges of the wall and into the hay. Someone had passed out there, a middle-aged man, by the looks of it. No wounds or marks of any kind lay around his ankles, signaling the fact that there had been another reason for which he had passed out. Clearly, something wrong had happened with him, for no man would approach this place, else they knew the stories and the legends of the place. It hadn't even looked like a barn, which was the strangest thing of all. Dreadfully unaware as they had been, there was no colour on the walls, but a sick, dullish gray, perhaps, either that or the remnants of a long diluted crimson of the purest kind. It had been close but long forgotten, they neither loved it there nor have they looked for another place. No, not while the food threw itself over the edge. Not while the victims just came to her for no reason whatsoever. And the mistress weaved another transparent living layer, through which she would hold the man and look upon his numbness as he was slowly disintegrating underneath the weave. It was cruel, for her kind alone was not fond of this kind of behaviour. Even less, of the subjugation, but that had been it. She came down and started using her mouth, revealing an open mouth which drew in several long strands of teeth which were long and puffy, which entered the skin and started drawing in the blood and skin like puncturing needles. It came close to him awakening but he had been too weak. The last sight he'd have of the maiden who had eaten him was the horrible disfigured face she displayed. It had been late then and she still hungered. The last meal had been thin and weak and she had been growing to the point where the barn wouldn't suit her any longer. Nor had her features been as neat as before, but now, she had changed, far too much for there to be a way back. What had been much worse was the fact that most of them, the people who wound up there wore their uniforms of war, the medals being too harsh for her to melt with her various acids while they were there. Reluctantly said, she watched as she dragged herself towards the hole, her arms having grown so wide that she could simply swipe away those maddening stacks of hay. Broken by the spirit, she tried going inside the hole, only to find out that there wasn't any return. 'Mistress, there are others on their way. Should we?' The servant watched and only now had he noticed what had changed to her. She was bigger now, tainted by the colours of mud and dirtied blue. Beauty faded for her, as well as her age and it had become quite clear enough that there wasn't any return to the way things used to be. For her body had rotted away as well, starvation was progressing at a disturbing way. Only her chest remained and everything attached. On a quick note, she turned and started eating the lower part of her body, even the weaves she had made, the coils and the pretty thin legs she had. Neither of them fell off from her insides, which was great enough. It meant that this had only been a normal part of her body, of her anatomy, of the thing she was. There was nothing wrong with her, nor the way she hungered at that. It was immediate that she lunged and grabbed her loyal servant as he stood waiting for orders. Only this time, there'd be none of that, since he was no longer needed. A wish came, for it to escape and return into the hole, back to the place it had been given birth to. A few tears appeared on his fishy eyes, as the mask slipped and it had been revealed that it was in pain. It didn't want to die there, it knew it had been a loyal servant, even to the end. 'Please spare me, mistress, for I have served you well. Do not abandon me, for neither have I, neither have we, when we had been with you ever since the start.' But she only smiled and puffed her cheeks. His please was nothing more than an annoyance and she couldn't risk him driving or altering the guests out of her hunting area. With a squeeze over its tiny fish brain, he died instantly and was placed on the side. It had been clear enough that she wanted something else from them, a deep and thorough desire to look upon them and laugh. They were a group, not only a single person. Another rain had started and it had been clear where they were getting through. Soon, they would turn and follow around the entrance to the barn. She could not allow either of them to see what she was weaving or working at. It had been dangerous, but the body had been stored just well enough. It was safe enough that she could wish for nothing but the taint it had on it. Slightly deranged as it had been, there was a clear certainty to it. When they arrived there, there was nothing around. There was no one around. 'I swore I heard a sound.' And there she turned and flew through the hole. Her skull bore no eyes any longer and she started drying out. This would be her only choice as she guided herself only by their screams. It was agony, what followed next, but she had believed she had found them all, dragging them together and battering them into some sort of bloody pool. From the real one, she could only take hands full of water pouches and add them to the side. But those refreshed and pleased her no longer. She was inevitably growing fatter and getting drier than she should've been, to the damn point of being in danger of overexposure to the field. Now that the corpses that lain drained around her, she realised that there was no hope to preserve them for longer than her body was in need for. Despite her best attempts, that had been it and they were already looking mummified in the old ways of extractions, where they would've been preserved for long. They had looked ancient despite being so young. 'Servants, return!' She spoke in her vile tongue, only to be denied. It seemed likely that most of them had taken notice and had made the choice to leave her be. This wasn't a great choice, if one at all, but the water hole had suddenly closed. As it happened, it had been the reason behind her growing softer and pushing harder towards it, while she grasped and scratched at the empty spot in which it had been. That dreadful reason for which she begged for it to reopen failed. And in her wake, there it crashed, she bashed the walls and pushed the barn towards its limit. It felt on her but somehow avoided her vitals, as she had been surrounded by the hole. The entire place had been a mess, from the lanes of hay, the planted traps and even this place from which her spawn-like form had to go back. 'But where? Where would I go? Where can I seek rest and food?' Must she go ahead and dry off? Could it be that she would hear the lake out there? It wasn't certain, but standing there wasn't an option, not to mention that it had been a greater chance for her in the night than in the day. It was getting close now, and she feared she would fall in place. Some lake had to be nearby, she had heard the human tongue and knew enough words to wonder. But the fields outside stretched for long and looking at it, that was her only hope. A city lay in the distance, the farthest away she had ever seen. If anything, there was the water tower standing high, pushing from the bottom of the earth, to hear her own cry, she would go forth and drag herself over. The pain had been unbearable, as she dragged herself through the dirt and the trash which had lain on the road.

Small pieces of metal and tiny coins scratched and entered through the layers of her skin and pushed forth through the least of her painful blots. She had tiny beads of blown skin around her inhumane fingers, which grew their nails as long and sharp to be called in use as some tainted blades. Near the road, there had been a small puddle of water, at which she stopped. She looked at it for moments before showing her fist in it and draining it in mere seconds. But the mere image that she had seen was dreadful and had made her insecure. Something had changed, way past what she would've expected. Though her hair had fallen and her face looked wicked, it looked as if she had been shedding her face, just like her servants had. What was she afraid of? That if she went for too long without her body, she would find out that she was one of them? No, that couldn't be. She had been their mistress, their master, their goddess and if she stopped, she would die there. 'More, closer to it, I need more, more of it.' She said and as she had come closer, it would be the nearest she had ever been. That was just around the reaches of the town and it had been clear that there was no one around standing up late, looking for any kind of action or distraction. There wasn't any way she would've been seen or discovered. Of that she had been certain as she dragged herself and climbed the tower. It was there that she made a hole and held herself and the water drove down and finally gave her the strength to carry on through this drudge of a living. Her moistness had somehow bore through the various things which made her that way. She had been something close to some parasite, a being of no demise. That had been clear, as she had been away. The way it had looked on her, those metal pearls she had attained had given her quite the look and much desire to continue the way she was. And that was it, there was a lake, just around the town, deep enough by the looks of it, seaweed beneath the rim. Though her face hadn't entirely grown back up, she had been seen by a small child on her way towards this place, where she'd escape or lay in hiding. It had only been the child of a man, nothing more, the youth which would dismiss the sighting as nothing more than some kind of nightmare. Even there, at the window, he held his tiny wooden muzzle box, which looked more or less like some kind of labyrinth which had to be solved. But he had seen here with little thought of what she was, how she entered and why she had been there in their lake. And ever since that night she left, he went back to it again. The sleep which rested the boy, the night that shattered his thought of the sight. And there came another wave. There had been shots going on for all evening. 'Sir, they're coming back hard at us, what must we do?' 'Hole the lines, I don't think there's anything we can do yet. They're holding us pinned down.' A horrible thing, how many of the corpses the machine had stacked together. It was a way through which they somehow saved space of some other kind of dreadful idea through which this had to be the perfect combat unit. At least from an outsider's perspective, it looked like the utmost machine of rage and disaster. It looked like a machine of paranoia and fear. Something which had been mostly dangerous to even glance at even for a second behind the enemy lines, as behind it laid even more parts which could join it. This commotion had been even worse than the arrival of the other ones which had looked as if it would be even more dangerous than this one. Worse than that, it looked as if there was fear running dry in the air. The men had to retreat from sight before anything could happen, which would jeopardise their mission. As a matter of all fact, they went full on warfare, with their teeth grinding and their maddening roars heard from below. Not all corpses had been recruited by this technology. No, it seemed like many of the dying men had been dragged below the earth, just so they would be spared from serving. They weren't hurt along the way but that hadn't been any kind of excuse for what was going on. It was cruel to look at it, from the viewpoint of a ranger. Even worse from the looks of a mad stranger, but another one had arrived. He had been placed there, out of place as any sane man would've been in his case if he were to wake up in the middle of the battlefield with no explanation whatsoever. He had been afraid, his likes were rather caught up in the middle of something. 'What's going on?' 'Sit down soldier and shut your mouth. You want to give us away?' There were fingers flying in the air, as the many pointed steering wheel turned. They had another unfair advantage which had to be taken away. It had to have been brought from somewhere else that was certain. But a field car was in their possession, the likes of which shouldn't have had as much power as it had. With their troops grouped inside of which, it looked as if it was still limited by the wires which held them together and laid above their heads, strapping at far in the ceiling as they had been. It was unclear whether or not it was safe to look, but all of the sudden, everyone turned at the scarred man, who bore no army uniform, who was too clean to be there but very much alive. 'You're not a corpse, son. Where have they picked you up from?' 'I don't know.' 'Here, do you know how to aim and shoot up a gun?' He nodded with some kind of reluctance. At least he wasn't as paranoid as he had seemed to be a few minutes ago. The reign of which lay at the side. More so, there were dangerous things there, more likely to have them killed than a few walking corpses. For starts, there were these globes of energy which expanded at low intervals, over short spans of time before receding into small dots of visible static energy in the air. Those looked dreadfully dangerous, even from the first looks. It wasn't like they were, by any means vulnerable to them but likely to be caught off guard and killed. And no one was even remotely safe from their area of function or even from the likes of being caught by them. They kept expanding and pushing forth the boundaries of man, until it was too dangerous to wait near them. In a sudden surge a soldier had been caught. It looked painful, the way he died, through which the atoms in his body looked as if expanded and shot in every direction possible. His body hadn't just been full of burns, but it looked like his cells suddenly moved directly a few inches from where they should've been. He had been displaced and at the same time he had been affected, at large by some kind of strange abduction of energies inside his body, which pushed forth what had remained of his uneven body parts. Those slowly dissolved into a mass of floating cells which looked less human and less organic as this sudden shock ended, as he slowly got converted into a mass of energy and got pulled into the ball above him. That cruel thing made him remain active, to the point of being paranoid, in a state of un-wellness. He was there, not entirely alive, but not dead either.

Stuck in an invisible state to his eyes, the unnamed soul stood there, unable to speak or think of anything but observe. Such a cruel insulation of soul rendered him into a dreadful way of being there. A lack of spirit and of mind made him look mindlessly at the way they moved and still fought on. Were those minutes that passed when he was there? How much had it been since he had been dead? Were those his thoughts? No, it was just what he had heard. There was another one around him who had died. He was surrounded by dark shapes and shadows. His cries were clear and he could only watch his struggle while he had been caught. No feeling laid to it. There wasn't anything for him anymore. Just another static spot laid somewhere in the air, no energy but the reluctance which laid aside made him disperse. 'Take care out there, there might be a need for people like you in case we're ever looking for a way to turn around.' There were a few moments which had been bitter than those. Another man departed from their group. He had looked battered up and didn't wait a second until it was time to go. There was a clear departure, the likes of which couldn't have been worse than what was going on there. But another strange reluctance came. Inside the many wires that lay out there, there were platforms which were suddenly rotating and changing place. It revealed much, in the gap which lay above the ceiling, with there being many corpses hidden there. Just what they have been stalling for neither man could tell. Clearly there was some kind of desire to bring and keep as many of them there and there had been. In a note of watch, they had looked how the small rings flung themselves and started cutting through the roof on top of every mound of dirt. They were clearly trying to eradicate or melt some of the additional meters which lay on top of either side. It wasn't a bright look there, as there seemed to be less of what they expected. 'They're not destroying anything lad. I think they're trying to take something from it. Look at the pattern through which it acts. Don't make any noise and look at it for a moment now, you'll understand.' 'But sir, shouldn't we be trying to get away? What if it spots us?' 'Trust me on this lad, I think I know what I'm talking about.' He started glancing at how the flying circles began drawing in it some of the dirt and the other compounds in it before stopping. What resulted was a flat disk of dirt, which bore a bone in it, the face of a man and the remaining acid coming from something. That piece would be taken for some kind of analysis and from it, the extracted data would be more than useful in dealing with them. 'I think we've become more than a pest since our time here, they'll have to deal with us one way or another.' As he scuffed his neck, he looked around and saw that there had already been plenty of raised structures around the battlefield. It wasn't looking right any longer, at least not as they would be divided and dealt with from the likes of which, no man would survive. And was dying even just as bad as they made it out to be? He was a Quaker, he held his belief up high and didn't start doubting himself there. Somehow he knew they were being watched, somehow he knew they could be killed or dealt with at any moment but decided not to say a thing. This wasn't a war but a fight for survival, which was being lost. Farther away, the abomination made out of those many corpses had amassed into a giant, tall as to dwarf all others below it. Mightily walking and stalking as it went on to crush and remove the extra debris and take off the remaining hiding rats from their scurrying holes. Many of the men kept by the exit point had been executed by now in the least manner of concern or dignity. Their biological code was nothing short of being useless. But one, one man, managed to get through. His dirty golden locks had been there, hidden beyond a point. He had taken some kind of wild appearance which was made out of the machine parts he had taken off the battlefield. Without any recollection or idea whether or not they would be able to recognise one of their own, he went on to carry with this mission. He was there, afraid and unaware, the only man who entered the elevator. Looking at how slowly it started lifting itself made him realise that the men left behind would all die. All that sacrifice and hard work would be left there for nothing. As he entered, he had an immediate self-control motion in his mind. Speak no word, don't act and don't do anything too rash without thinking about it. They might be able to figure out what you are, who you are and the reason for which you're there. It was even worse there, in the clean environment, which was somehow kept in dark. Of course they wouldn't need any kind of illumination if they were all machines. They had no need for any kind of sight. Even there, he was on his knees and mainly walked whilst holding his hands on the ground. He could say farewell to the element of surprise, as he rolled away from being crushed underneath another one of the giants which had been sent down the drain. No one was able to deal with them in any kind of fashion which wouldn't end in some disaster or another. Completely told off, as it had been, there was a clear way of looking at it without being disturbed. But he had seen it, the many machines which had been made in mass. They weren't machines to begin with but felt them slowly becoming parts of the wiring and the other devices which laid interconnected to the walls. He figured out only by using his hands to feel around, to his own logic and common sense. It was something beyond the technology they had a grasp on, the likes of which couldn't have been called in thought. Cruelly, he started smashing with his bare fists one of the faces which had been carved in the near electrical panel and railing below. It was pointless for the thing was inactive, not to mention that he only hurt himself by doing that. What had happened to his brothers who fought there? It seemed like most of them had been somehow lost, walking in through the tunnels, in a city they had no idea they were in. This was no haven. It was horrible, being lost in an unknown place, looking like a dangerous man. Though it had been remarked that one Borbahough managed to get himself face to face with something of block, his was a special case. He didn't wake up above, but somewhere below. It was beneath the lake, in a cold place which had no water going in. A basement which had a small tunnel going through the underside of the lake, not through it directly, as it had been carved through stone but the stop had been done with some kind of crystal glass through which he could see the depth of the lake. There were men trapped on the tables there, some which were very much alive and held at a forty degree angle, still tied and looking at the ceiling. Drops of water kept falling at regular intervals in a system which had small holes which could either be closed or opened on command. That hadn't been the worst part of it either. Most of the so called patients weren't human, but held the human physiology in some kind of manner, either it being through the transparency, through which they looked like invisible vein holders, or those were their hosts. A system of long interconnected veins made up their entire bodies, with no organs, nothing which had been held up, other than the supreme reluctance to give up on the hosts they used. And the water had been more than annoying and repulsing to the human beings. It could've been anything from it, down to the configuration or the salt water from the lake which disturbed the men and the women on the beds. They still held some kind of living, even though they didn't share anything else, down from the pigmentation and the solid state normal beings were and their insides. Small and long, wide, transparent but bluish organs got them going. They had been repurposed or remade to look like them, that were certain, but there was something clear to them, the eel-like texture to them, the invisibility they display, or semi transparency which disturbed the doctors who experimented on them made them show some signs of the peculiarness they bore. It was torture for them, but neither host nor vein would give in and abandon one another. They endured. 'Should we, then go on with my hypothesis and surrender the fact that some of them might actually be just one plain being and not host and hostess?' 'No, Doctor Sullivan. That had already been rejected. It is already clear that they are indeed two different beings in contrast with the differences which they display. Not even, in any case, to be called into question, the fact that they bear some resemblance to other animals, in fact, we may conclude that these things have been modified. They display some kind of inherited traits that can be found in other animals here on earth and much so, like cold blooded reptiles, they show some kind of a unique ability.' He went on to display what he was talking about. With one surgical knife, not any kind of small cutting tool, but an actual knife which could've been used for surgery in some way or another, curved and long, the point of which seemed to bear some other sharp and long blades attached to it. This type of thing had to be used for some kind of torture or not any kind of purpose that had to be. It was even, by the likes of which, that he started chopping a few fingers and saw them dissolved into a liquid in a plate he had acquired in order to push over the pus that had gathered and even some of the retreating veins. They, as the multiple ended organisms have been called, displayed fear, for the first time in a long, long time. But that wasn't important. George A. Halstatt, the doctor in charge pointed at it and waited. 'Observe now how it grows, how, despite the lost mass, it can almost regrow itself in its original form. Despite how much of a circumference had been taken away, it seems, or it can be looked upon as some kind of inherited trait this being has.

Though it may look deformed, the explanation is quite simple. The regeneration capabilities are unaffected by its strangeness and everything which remains is nothing else but the flawed code which it must hold in one of the strange side organs which are being purposefully avoided by the veins. It's clear now that some of those side-pumps that are almost as transparent as its entire mass hold some knowledge of what a human looks or should look like.' And it had been clear enough that this strange man, as he should be called, or an eel-man, from the texture of his skin had regrown deformed toes, which were much longer and seemed to have grown extra layers of unfounded turning peeled leeches instead. For the most common suction seemed to be the method through which they absorbed the information, despite the fact that it laid there trapped passively, those newly grown toes seemed to jerk. In their place, they seemed to act out of body and out of host, through which they seemed pulled or drawn to the men and what they brought to the table. 'What do you suppose these tiny things want now, by your educated guess? You wouldn't happen to have a decent idea tied to it, would you?' 'Well, since you have given be the example already, I think you may be right, it knows we're here, it knows what we are. I think it needs contact with us in order to replicate if your proposal turns out to be right.' 'Indeed, my good friend Sullivan, you are right, I knew you would agree to it.' 'What have I agreed to now? What would that be?' He seemed to have prepared a scalpel, and pointed at him like some sort of lab rat which had be repurposed or dealt with. It was unclear whether or not he could be had in the same way through which other less than evolved creatures had been treated but this was a completely different environment, this was off the records. Multiple lab-coated observers stopped and looked at them. It wasn't certain whether or not he could stay clear or what was going off now. 'Unfortunately for you, Sullivan, or fortunately, depending on how you look at it, we may not necessarily need a living host to do so. Why don't you take this and perform a tiny incision on one of the bodies from the morgue?' He was on his way there, with the occasional pause to look back. The morgue was located right behind the inner bay, behind the section underneath the sea and straight into the rock formation. It had been cold in there, colder than it would've been expected, colder than usual per say, not to mention that it was moist around there, for the wrong reasons. Something unsanitary had happened one level above the morgue, regardless of which, there had been drop of blood finding their way through the cracks. Someone had to be informed. One man stopped him, he signed his name. Sullivan R. Agrippoe. Written and signed, to him there would be a number given, at any case to the people who came and visited the morgue. It was important to note that he had to be quick and match his entire schedule, since near his signature there was the exact hour and the minute he entered written on it. 'That one, I need to perform something on him.' 'I have noticed you were carrying something with you. Would that be for one of the projects?' He looked with some slight nervousness before deciding it was time to complain. Nothing could be done about it, at least not in any case, but it had been clear enough that there was something which had been said. 'I hope we could keep this thing off the records, you know? No one had to know why I'm here exactly, nor what I'm doing, right? It would do no one enough good to know what's happening here, would it?' 'Doctor.' 'Sullivan, you know who I am, we interacted before. There's no need to act as if I'm a stranger. We're all working for the same company here.' His best attempts couldn't prevent the sweat running from his forehead. Not only that but he had been clumsy, as he almost wiped himself with the small surgical tool he had been carrying in his right hand, with it having been pointed directly towards him. 'Can we agree on that at least? You could make an exception only this time, right? You would only need to write on his file that he had always been missing a toe and nothing would be done about it.' 'What about you visit here, Doc? Not to mention that what I would be doing here would be mightily suspicious, dangerous and illegal.' 'Unlike what we've been doing so far? I think you got the point.' 'What do I get from this then? What's in it for me?' Sullivan picked his own pocket and seemed to get a fifty out, no, that had been a bit too much, way too much for something of this kind, but he could afford the loss if it meant getting his toe. And it would've been much better than having to cut his own toe in order to get through with it. 'Would that do?' 'Go ahead and pick your toe, just make sure you don't cut the one with a tag on it. That one got placed right after he died and it rubbed itself quite hard enough to leave a mark. I don't think I could explain the lack of a mark if I were to be questioned.' Not to mention that he was most likely lying and he would be unable to explain in any case why there was a toe missing. But that one would do, the big one on his left foot. Despite the fact that they didn't match, this would've been just the perfect test. As he started cutting, both of them turned to look at the body. There was a moan which had come from beneath the cover. Despite them being somewhat specialists in it, they knew it had been, under any type of possible circumstance, impossible for him to be alive. What had been the sound then? Why was he in pain? 'Just be done with it and leave. They do that sometimes, there's no need to question it.' 'They're dead, how can they do that at all? How can they make any kind of sound if their sound cords aren't working any longer?' 'It's an echo they have, it's some kind of noise that remains with them ever since they had been alive. One of the other scientists explained it with me, I think. Perhaps it has something to do with the minerals and something being active inside them.' It came through, with a bit of difficulty, most of it having come from the fact that he was moaning all the way. After the process, he had wrapped it in a small plastic bag and left, knowing there'd be a signature, at least, for the likes of which, there'd be no way to look at it beforehand. Frankly, he had been backing, even sweatier than before. 'Ah, Sullivan, have you brought what I have asked of you? Go on then and put on your gloves, we'll be on our way just then and get on with it.' This wouldn't be just an extraction of information, this was a plan to attach it, apparently so. Multiple white coated men surrounded him as he prepared himself for this second procedure. It would be the attachment to the host, through which they would need to see whether or not they were compatible. It forced itself at first as soon as they were as a twenty inches apart. Though it had been cold and the meat was dead, it started the suction as it attached itself there. 'Back off now, let it be, we can clearly observe the process from a few feet away.' As it had been so, it jerked itself and all of the sudden, the leech-like extrusion turned into a spear and broke the finger into a small pop which shrewd it into small chunks of meat. They flew straight through the ground and left a mess in their way. 'It looks as if there was a rejection to the mass.' Such a claim would go ahead as to be undisputed over the fact that there hadn't been any other proof of the existence of another kind of subject to be used. 'We need a living one, I wager. It would seem like the ones which are dead are being met by an extreme show of gore encouraged by this rejection.' 'What do you supposed then Leader in Dock. What do you suppose we do in order to bring a living person and use him in this manner? What is the possible ramification and the moral implications involved? Should we entrap someone and bring him forth like some sort of sacrifice? Are we butchers?' 'No.' Another voice came and quickly responded to the inquiry. 'We are doctors, we are scientists, and we're made of the things which bring greatness to the world. Why should we decay as lesser men go ahead and live unjust? Why wouldn't they be made of use for sometimes in their lives?' 'Then whom shall we take? The old or the young, in order for this to work, I propose we use only the freshest of human lives. As being too old would only signal this new experiment as a failure. Can you not see the flag of old being far too close to being cold and dead? We're in need of warmth and of something which could be used as for an extraction would need the fresh cells of a young person.' 'Why not someone older then, in the middle of his life, someone who'd be more willingly to approach this in order for some compensation?' 'Because, you incomprehensible tool, one such as himself would only prove to be a major problem to our project. He would retaliate as soon as his instincts were to kick in. Such a man would be hard to deal with and control, which would jeopardise everything we've worked so hard for. As it just happens for me to know that a child would prove no difficulty to steer and direct, for even an adult of weak bones and poor physique would be able to overpower him and use him for his vile purposes.' 'You're mad and have no means of the morality. Are you certain you should be here with us? Are you certain you shouldn't be locked in some sort of facility dealing with those which are criminally insane? Why is it that I'm the only one here? Why are you all looking at me that way? I can't be, no, I refuse to believe that you would all sacrifice the life of a young child in order to achieve the final purpose.' 'This is understandable doctor. That's why we agreed to have our names stamped in silence. It's the reason why neither of us has spoken his real name nor have we given a chance to recognise one another. We're supposed to act like a cold machine and deal with the inconsistencies this moral dilemma has to offer. Despite what you may think of us, we're still human, we're still made out of flesh. In this day and age, where you may have no idea of the distress those above us suffer, you may think it isn't right. But what's a life wasted compared to the lives we may spare?' 'Not even saved, that's what stuck with him from that conversation. There was no moral high ground, this was a means, or a possible means to an end. They had no intention of saving lives in the near future but delaying murdering or experimenting on more than it was necessary. It was for the same reason for which, he, out of everyone in that room was sent upstairs. His would be the arm which would act, the one which would steal and creep, to kidnap through the night. As if it hadn't been enough that most of them had been alert. Apparently, there had been a serious case of many conditions which had been spread ever since that water tower had been poked. It was still there when he got out of the secret entrance, on a wet newspaper. Despite its moisture, the ink hadn't faded out. Clearly there had been things which had bore through his mind. What had been happening lately there? 'Great night for a walk, isn't it, stranger?' 'I beg your pardon?' The man on the other side of the street rubbed his glasses together. He seemed to have had a limp and a missing tooth on the other rim of his mouth. Something about him seemed to have pointed out that he had been known to him, for which the case begged for a reversal. 'Oh, I'm sorry, I think I know you from somewhere, we must've met, right? You're, umm, you're something, I think. 'I'm afraid we may have been acquainted a long time ago, dear stranger, but seeing how I'm a recluse, you may have forgotten me.' 'Well, that's great to know. Say, you don't happen to be in look for a partner, would you? No, no, no, I don't mean it in that way. We don't take it kindly to that around here either, but I suppose you knew of it already.' 'I suppose I have. Well, that's well enough to know. You know your way around here, do you not?' 'That.' Here it went again, the wail coming out from around the pools. It was clear that something was going on there, which begged him to investigate. At a later time perhaps, as there was a man here who was willing to help him and guide him around the town. Unclear to him whether or not he could go ahead and ask for questions, there were things that had raised some serious questions there. The man who was limping now besides him was far too active for this night. He hadn't looked as if he had been tired despite the bag under his eyes. As a matter of fact, there seemed to be nothing but emptiness inside his pupils. What if he were to take him instead of a child? Where would he find one at that hour, even if it were for the original plan to keep going, not to mention that it would be a dangerous act, to snick and break through someone's house unnoticed? It wouldn't happen that way, or the other, and this man would be a far better choice. 'Say, mister, since we're walking against this fine dark evening, what say you about the place? How long have you been living here for?' 'For the past few decades I suppose. As I said, in somewhat a complete seclusion, I don't enjoy being disturbed or my work being looked upon.' The man quickly eyed him from both sides and seemed to have been taken aback by the many things which weren't his. It was clear that he wasn't supposed to see him in any kind of if. No one else out there would see him either, for that night, he came with the right idea. 'Say, stranger, since we may have acquainted ourselves quite enough, you wouldn't happen to want me to show you around? I mean, the lab I'm working in isn't far. And this would be a great opportunity for me to show you what I've been at for the past few decades.' Otherwise, far away, back inside the lab, those transparent fiends seemed to have heated themselves and turned to a dark grey. It had been the light, through some strange alteration, which changed their composition. 'It can be observed that a mere change of the light and the suppression of which changed their entire body alteration. Most of their bodies started producing heat and changing into some kind of more visible appearance that would otherwise have been close to high-invisibility if it were for us to reduce everything to some cold, or near cold environment. Other observation to be called into play is the fact that the small leech which had been drawn seemed to have extended itself to the floor in search for a genetic component. Its growth has been closely observed and it has been determined that if nothing is to be done, one of us could get pulled and dragged in. Wait for Sullivan's sample in order to move on.' Through which, it had been an easy conviction to be forced onto the man. He held no reluctance and had a lesser clue of what he had been taken in. To him, this man had been nothing more but a friendly eccentric fellow who would promise to cure his limp. 'I've never seen such an elevator before, say, how much dough would one need to have one of these installed in their houses? I could do with a wine cellar.' Silence in the elevator. His throat was dry, and the man with his limp, of which name shouldn't be known either, seemed to have taken out a small metal bottle and started drinking out of it. He offered some to Sullivan, at which, he politely declined. 'You must excuse me, but I don't normally drink of the job, you know? I must have a perfect concentration if I am to do what I said I would.' 'Oh, I can understand that, I can respect that. Take all the time you need, I won't mind if you won't. I only wanted to be friendly.' But the atmosphere from inside the tight elevator squared chamber had been getting colder. He felt as if their relationship had been less of a human to another human and more like a butcher taking a pig to the slaughter house, as it seemed to have become. What would happen to him now? Just how much of him was there a need for? Obviously not a single thing of him would be wasted, if the experiment were to go on just well. After it stopped, he had been greeted by a strange entrance into the ante-chamber, right after the elevator room. It had been dry, harsh to breathe in. Some change had become apparent. His eyes hadn't been accustomed to what was going on there, and seemingly, every scientist who was there, which had left the room where the experiment took place in, wore some mask or another. A production of gas was obvious. 'What have you madmen done this time? I can't breathe properly.' 'Put this on.' He eyed the man who was with him. Some of them were disappointed by the fact that this wasn't a younger subject, rather than this middle-aged cripple, but they would have to deal with what they had. 'Shall we go on then?' 'Wait, aren't I getting a mask now?' 'You are, but we're out of them for the time being. We're going to take you to some place where we have more of them stored, so worry not about this.' His inner smile couldn't be seen only because the mask was obscuring it. But he was taken there, dizzy as he were. It was obvious enough that he had already lost a part of his consciousness, though that was well enough for them. 'Look, Sullivan, have you noticed it already? All of them started tying themselves together and joining in together with their feeding tubes. This is clearly harming them, not to mention that they're trying to make up for the loss of one of their own. Can't you see that they're in need of someone?' Everyone could see it. From the back, every other lab rat seemed to have taken a safe distance and stood there peering in at the sacrifice. What else could he call it if not that? It was disgusting, it had been repulsing and worst of all, and it had been accepted. The sudden cause from which the small pumping limp started dragging its nasty trunk and swallowing the body started there. 'Get away now, let's move on before they grow additional roots and they block our path.' His words had been taken aback as both of them turned and woke up in a large circle, surrounded by a system of floating hair which connected every single living being which stood on a table. Sullivan seemed to have been caught off guard, by the looks of which, he couldn't stray his thoughts away from what was going on. It was plain and simple that it wasn't going to be an easy way out from there. 'Do you still have the surgical knife on you, Sullivan?' 'I believe I do have it. You don't think we're going to be able to cut through them as easily as we can, do you?' There was a clear disability from the lack of patience everyone in the chamber seemed to display. They were watching but neither of them seemed to have cared in any shape or form of what was going on, other than the fact that they were there. A few more seconds passed, in which they would record every damned detail which had been going on. It was dreadful and disgusting but there wasn't any other option. No sign of there being any kind of display of aid would come to be. Seemingly, there would be some kind of insufficiency in their bones. Clearly, some of them were getting rather paranoid once met by the idea that some of those roots could move and grasp for them. 'Don't turn the light yet. We're still in the process of seeing what's going to happen. 'Apparently, now that they looked back, there had been a transparent cocoon in which the poor old man had been wrapped in. The second being which had lain inside seemed to have already roamed freely in the bile as it started eating through the body of the fiend. Clearly, there hadn't been a thing which laid to them. No one would dare say a word of what was going on, but it had been there. But the first incision came, not on the cord which blocked their way, but Sullivan came with another idea. Inside those transparent long and connected roots, there had been veins. And these creatures, as they appeared to be quite hungry and self aware were also feeling hunger. 'What are you doing now Sullivan? Are you in your faculties? Do you have any idea how dangerous that is?' His finger was now bleeding in small patches. No reaction yet. He moved it over the roots and saw them dirtied in blood, still no reaction. 'I'm afraid I'm going to have to take my chances and do something for which there might be no return. In case I'm wrong about this, I want you to take the surgical knife and cut through me and cut through it until you're free to join our team.' Indeed, it had been the cause for worry there, for he would end the same way as the man with his limp. His only excuse was that he had been doing it for a greater purpose, which was in itself an excuse to be cruel and sacrifice another human life. That's when he shoved his finger, feeling the root as softly as it had been a jelly. That feeling continued as his finger bled inside it. Many of the drops slowly floated and broke the flow between veins. It seemed as if they had been pleased, drinking out of him and playing with the wound without pushing too far in. Perhaps they could feel that he was still awake, for neither dare grow any larger or perform any attempt to grow inside of him. 'Look, Doctor Aspen, they're not harming me. I think we have come to an understanding.' And as if it had been so, the two roots suddenly rejected one another as he pulled out and each returned to their bodies. 'Let us return before they change their shapes and return to what they've been.' Both of them followed and joined until one short more. Aspen had taken the lead and made a wall between their colleagues and him. 'I'm afraid that until it's settled whether or not you're contaminated by what you've done, all of our connections should be stricken forth.' 'Look, look at what they're doing, I think we're bound for another discovery.' It seemed likely that it had been their intentions but every corpse on every other table than the one which had the limping man on it seemed to have been abandoned. The parasites travelled through by every mean and managed to get inside the very host which had laid there. 'What's happening there? Who's doing that?' The noise stopped, as one man was rubbing his pen against the paper, by means of observation. But what they witnessed after was the process through which they gave birth to those strange humanoid hosts. The limping man's shell of a body had been slowly removed from his organs. Outside and on the floor, his transparent outline had been slowly pushed, leaving every other organ to be devoured and left inside the mass they had crawled in. 'Interesting, make sure you write every important note on the papers. We don't want to miss anything happening there. Sullivan, I think we owe you something which can't be given to anyone else.' A stop of voice came. Sulfur in the air appeared, as well as the appearance of mist coming out of the main host body. They were spreading something from one another, expelling what hadn't been of use. A step of water came out of it as quickly as the guts had been there. Now, the consumption hadn't taken as long as it seemed it did. They had been quickly done with it and every other body had been taken and inhabited once again, with this new addition being no exception. Most of the roots had been taken back and it seemed likely that so had been the light. 'Who's done that? Who turned back the light? I don't think I gave that order, we were still bound to, and we were still bound to.' He broke off. A bunch of suits had already been there, and neither of them looked pleased. But there had been it, in its form. What other explanation could there be for what laid there? It was unclear whether or not they had been allowed to enter the facility or they had entered in somehow by some unsanitary and unfathomable means. Clearly there were there and for as long as they stood there, they had observed more than enough. At least, it had been clear enough that they would get off easily. 'What's going on in here?' A lab coated man seemed to have arrived from the back. What had happened there? He seemed to be unaffected by the voiceless suited men. Speaking of which, the scientists started backing a few feet away as this unaffected man just passed through them as if they hadn't even been real to begin with. 'What dreadful thing you have discovered, my dear colleague. What in the name of fluorescence is going on in here? Are these nothing but illusions?' But how had that happened? It had to be the mist which had been expelled, but how had it managed to pierce their masks in a way which would've left them vulnerable? It was clear enough that something was off. Neither man would admit to it. As the second blow came, everyone looked surprised. It must've been some defect or some malfunction to the genetic code. Something in the back had occurred. One of the bodies suddenly grew and inflated like some darkish green ball and blew in a spark of guts in the place where it had stood. Pieces of it had been spread across the various tables around it but neither corpse of parasite dare touch it. It came as no surprise that the first thought was that it had been infected or infested by something. What would trigger the reaction and how might they be able to replicate it? That had been strange and bizarre, peculiar in thought and cruel. Neither woe nor man would dare fuel the creeping of the masses. What if they would bring them to the city in order to observe? 'Am I the only one who has perhaps come with the greatest idea to ever come?' 'Perhaps we should seek to detoxify the environment before coming up with anything unrelated Sullivan.' Doctor Beurdemond looked around, he still didn't understand what was going on. Since it had been decided that they weren't real men, their faces and expressions changed. Not only have their faces warped, but it seemed like they had shaped their heads as to resemble blank pears which kept growing and expanding while pulling everything down from their suits and changing their textures into that creeping moving skin. They flew in various spaces but settled to standing, tied to the very ceiling above them while they crept and looked through various lenses. It would take some long while until they would disappear. 'Very well then, so what you're saying.' Sullivan and Beurdemond had been left alone in his office while the others had dispersed around, looking for a way to get rid of the fumes which had remained there. 'It's that we should look for a way to snick one of them above and abandon it in the city. What could go wrong with it? They need to be tested one way or another, right? And what if this is the greatest idea, the thing we've been waiting for? You've seen, like everyone else there what had happened to the man once he was placed there, right? We know, even after so many shots I've taken that I wasn't infected by the entire ordeal so what's the problem? Such bodies need a relative enough mass to devour and we don't even know if one of them is enough to take over an entire town. So what of it? Don't you suppose we were placed here for this reason alone? It does sound like a mightily awful coincidence that we were placed straightly underneath a city, which is remotely placed right about in the middle of nowhere.' 'And you wouldn't happen to think that's a bad thing? Sullivan, do you not realise what that means, in the rare case of some mutation of contamination, what do you suppose they'd do once they found it out? There's no way they would leave us be without grinding this place to the very ground.' Some mad deliberation there, as they could indeed be cornered and completely annihilated. But what if that had been worth it? After all, the more that they had been observed, these things were some kind of.

Going through the notes inside their many written papers, which had resulted in a peculiar set of observations? 'These are fetuses and seem to act that way, perhaps not in the same way our females do, but in some sort of similar manner. So, what happens when they hatch? What happens once they get enough of the genetic code we have to keep growing and suddenly expand?' It had been set already, in his mind that this kind of curiosity would have to be settled. Even then, in the dark, something had been clear. 'We'll wait a few days then, leaving them alone.

I think we should wait until there's nothing in there until we can make some further decisions.' And as it was seen through the cameras over the span of a few days, without their presence there, these human shells started reverting to something more primordial. It was fascinating to look at them, how all of the sudden they twisted and turned into basic shapes, rounded rather than toed. Some pseudo-limbs remained, but not enough to wager some change or any kind of evolution. 'It isn't our code, is it? Perhaps, it is, or it was our presence there which influenced their form or shape. That should signal some kind of awareness which would alert them that we were there.' Through one of the nights, something seemed to have been wrong. Despite their guards, which had consisted of one of their own, there was a dead angle which had been failed to be seen. There had been somewhere above their entire facility, inside that lake which creped on. It seemed to have taken advantage of the water system which regulated the water drops which would normally fall on them while the scientists were off. By now, the wretch of a creature which had lost its beauty had lost its shape as well. Of her, there was nothing any more, at least nothing other than the creakingly deceitful form which had lain inside her own wretched body filled with the stench of ages. It broke itself apart as if caught in a turning wheel which would batter her limbs. Without that, she would've slowly dissolved into the lake and became nothing but a mere memory to her forgotten fish-like servants who abandoned her in the time of need. Most of her bones were soft now and met no difficulty in breaking apart in the needful emergency of death. From the dampness came the dropping from above. She came into contact with them and started being slowly absorbed by the mass. It felt like a toxin at first, the harshness of which they tried rejecting. But it had been awful to look at, dreadful to feel. It was unclear whether or not it suffered through this but the veins inside those bodies, those parasites had instantly died. They had been poisoned by her mere form, the rejection of which had been bloody. As an immediate reaction, the bodies hardened and lost their transparency. They had shaped themselves into bone-like formations, cruelly shaped, and seemed to have their malignant human-like shapes cut off from what remained of their progressive bodies. As their shapes began to drift apart, there had been some things which crept and made them less likely to shout. Mouths tried appearing but were quickly stooped. From their insides, there had been expelled the many veins which seemed to have lost most of their masses as they pushed themselves out in a peculiar attempt to save themselves despite being formally dead. Some kind of undead had occurred that these virtually deceased malignant tubes filled with no blood nor warmth tried attaching themselves to something. By no means could they deny themselves of servitude as they turned and started worshipping this new form which had encompassed itself in some sort of mountain-shaped deity. It had been given life from what had remained of that sea liquid which had invaded the world and their agony. It was as if they had been destined to be there and provide the means for its rebirth, as it had been noted. A red light appeared on the wall. The needs for which there had been a signal for its mad contamination, many men having been awakened at the sound of the alarm. It would be awful, quite so, to avoid the thought of what was going on but it wouldn't stop. The creature had been sexless, as it seemed that most of the original genetic code as well as the means for which there had been a lady of the sea had been long lost. It looks awful and dreadful in shape, as well as it could be seen on the camera. Fragments of its former lives which manifested in most of its body mass being mountainous but showing some fragments of scales or of human shapes which had been pushed and stretched but had been covered in a texture which couldn't have belong to any living being on their planet. It would be cruel to let it live there, but a feeling came to everyone who watched in terror how that thing jerked and started wailing in its cage. Its darkened blue and red deaf and dead servants moved but without a doubt, without a shed of fear, those things had no chance to penetrate the walls and pass through. It would be fear which would reign through them. 'Do you still think there's a chance now to follow with your plan Sullivan? Do you think this would've gone any better if it happened out there? We could've jeopardised our entire lives if we were sent out there, you damned awful being, you wretch of a man of science.' Sullivan bowed down his head to Horsen. He had been another one of his colleagues who somehow knew of his plans. Apparently, there was no way to keep a secret down there, no way to stop the conversation as it went. But the place had been in full lock, and there had been nothing either of them could do. If anything, Sullivan had a jest of guilt as his knees started trembling. For in that image on the screen, before the gaseous attacks started being spread through, despite the presence of air-tight seals which should've prevented them from spreading, he winced. What he saw there or what he heard might've been a result of what he had of the strangeness of the gas which had attacked his mind. But he had seen and heard of some embodiment of the limping man inside that thing. One great part of its mass almost formed a misaligned form which resembled something he remembered of the man. 'What have I done?' But it hadn't stopped there, as every one saw a different thing on the screen, of something which would lay behind it. From a sudden burst there opened a giant hole, and as if the mountain had been only a cocoon from inside of it there came a giant floating evil eye. It floated and seemed to bear a mark of needles which had been blood shot. It looked behind as its former shell decayed, much more so dead from the exhaustion. As it stared, the one scientist who looked at it started being driven mad. His teeth were falling and he seemed to have been gone wildly blind. Unaware of what was happening, he started running out of the room and ended up in the morgue. It had been a strange thing there as well, as all the corpses had seemed to have raised themselves, standing upright and straight. The least of all, in that madness which could be foreseen by another man, was that there had been a slip and slide. It came quickly as the mountain suddenly shifted and covered every table as well as a good chunk of the floor. This show which had been displayed ended up revealing nothing but pillars in the shape of men. Most of them were something closely or related to the forms from ancient Hells of which embodiments were the perfect forms of men. How could something so cruel and disgusting, such a repulsing thing be the embodiment of perfection? It was something too bizarre to look away. This made him paranoid, the nameless Doctor, the one without identity. No one would miss him if he were to get inside of the room and witness the shapes for himself. As that thought alone occurred, he thought of how the men looked in ancient times. He wanted to see them, how they were in their prime and might in an age when perfection was in man's reach. Many gods had blessed him with the sight of it from the other side of a screen and he could do nothing but fantasize about their malignancy. Others didn't share his enthusiasm and as soon as he made a move to get out of the room, he had been stopped and put down. 'You mad man, your thoughts are clear, but we cannot allow you to open the gates and bring the contamination outside.' 'Let me go, please, let me be. I have to see them for myself, this is my only chance to witness the world as it had been.' 'Have you lost your mind? That morbidity there isn't what humanity had become? It's a reflection of dread, it's a soup of madness which keeps expanding.' As another look revealed what another man had feared. Most of the hardened mass had turned into a liquid with no common or broad shape. From inside, the form of a man trying to imitate agony came out. He struggled to get out, his screams could be heard. Fewer men came than expected to drag him down, as there wasn't any escape from the dread below. If that thing got out, humanity would be doomed. Some recognised the man which had been dragged, even though they didn't share the same visions. He looked at his colleagues and saw different expressions than there had been on their faces. Yet neither acted in body other than their woe, their faces lain of criers, their ears stooped into outlier. The pool would try expanding and growing and infect the lake, and ever after, they would be drowned and absorbed if it were given the chance to do it. Many would question whether or not this liquid could even burn from napalm or from worse, as the destruction would quickly follow. 'This isn't a bunker, we'll all die if they get out.' It was clear enough that everyone saw something different, even to themselves. Too many of the clues or the details didn't match. They had shaped themselves into many flying things which had tried escaping, without a sudden realisation of the madness which had been in. They crept with their wings, made out of primordial arms which resembled human membrane only in some slight appearance but seemed to be slightly more inclined to their primordial sight. From their ends there came leashes which had buttoned dark heads which moved as if in unison with individual living things rather than being subservient to their arms and hands. Their hands had their long and sharp fingers in numbers which far exceeded twenty on each side, pushing and wriggling in every direction they could. From a second look at their bodies, they were fat-like but rubbed together to a body which bore no legs but a rat-like tail which seemed to wriggle only in appearance. As for their heads, they had none, as they rounded at the top and seemed to bear no features other than a singly hole which pushed in and out and times, only to reveal that they spat blood tissue over themselves to keep themselves in the air. Sooner or later they had to be contained in order to run out of that blood which kept them flying or floating. It had to be a reason there. 'Look, it's calling for me. They made me an altar of faith, I can see it there.' The floor wall bloodied and so were the walls, everything was flat and in the middle of the room there laid a panel with a scribe's book in the middle. Clearly there had been something written on it, which would make the reader come to terms. 'But I am a man of science, not a man of the Lord.' There was doubt in his voice. The sight was unnatural but could be cleansed, if his faith would be as great as it had been, he saw it in himself as some sort of man who could bring some kind of righteousness to it and prevent this hellish thing from expanding to humanity. 'Another one's making a move put him down, now!' At least four scientists had been tied as they were raving at the screens. It was unclear, at least from the screams and agony which happened over a prolonged lack of exposure, of what would happen to their minds. 'Put the blind folds down, I can't stand them shouting that way.' In reality he couldn't happen to do otherwise. Sullivan had seen something else on the other side, ever since the images flashed in his head. He kept it to himself but wanted to get in. There was something which had encompassed his interest in a way of which no one would dare say otherwise. Clearly something was wrong with him but he said naught. 'What is the order of certainty then? Shall we wait? Should we close the screens?' 'No, you would send everyone in a deadly raving that way, which would only make us all suffer!' Everyone was bent on that one image in the middle of the screen now. For, they seemed to share some vision in common, as every man confirmed the sight. It was a red blotched screen which changed from moment to moment from static or full on bloody. Such a thing didn't seem likely, in any shape of form to display any kind of change other than the fact that there was something going on inside of it. That blotch, that piece of whatever was covering one of the multiple cameras there was moving, from side to side and upwards. It looked as if it was falling at times, being dragged as if to signal something there. Every screen seemed desaturated and gray in comparison with it and when the moment approached, there came a sudden glow from it. Inside the room they had been in, there was a clear view of the dark which lay around them. Most of them had been covered by the colour as they started. Not a single moment passed without them looking to see whether or not something might change. 'So we can all see it, can we not? The red spot?' 'It's kind of hard to miss at this point, so what do you think it is?' Two more minutes in, and there was a distant noise which seemed to come from inside that room. There wasn't any kind of way it could've come from the camera device since it had no sound or any kind of way for audio to come through. Another wait, the sound continued in by the means of hearing it through the hall. It came from inside that room, that had been clear, but what of the others? 'What are you seeing in every other camera now?' 'I can't seem to see anything other than the muffle and the dirt covering them.' How was it that they survived the visions so far? Why was it that neither one of them seemed to see anything which was going on there? It came as a clear sign of their paranoia and how clear it had been that something was mocking them. 'What do we remember then?' 'Free me, please, I don't think I can stand being tied any longer. Look, I'm doing well, please, just let me be. I haven't hurt anyone, see? Look at the back of my hands, they're clean, so is my lab coat, there's nothing to me.' 'That man is hyperventilating, we need to release his grasp as well.' 'No, I'm calling the shots now.' Said Sullivan with his tone being forced on the side on which there the incline to leave. But he couldn't, there was no way and they were still there. Those creatures which had been the suits, no one had closed the door behind them, which had left a clear view of what had happened behind. For now they had been passive as well as they have shown no sign of doing anything other than what they had been preoccupied with, but somehow the vision of them continued. Was it still the gas or was he the only one seeing them? He thought about asking for another but seemed to have a fear of being locked or tied if anyone disagreed with them. They can't be there, someone faded through them, keep that in mind you old dog. If they even suspect you of being as much affected as they are, you shall be locked more so than a whipped slave. 'What do we do then? We're locked and low of reserves.' A cry arose from somewhere inside. 'It's the morgue, it has to be, and we have to make it to there.' 'But what of them?' 'If we all get there, that way we'll be sure than no one will suddenly turn on us and release them while we're out. It's a fail-proof plan, I know it is. Let's go.' Despite being as paranoid as they were, they decided to leave them at the sight of red. It wasn't really any choice they could've taken or done but that had been it. Fear drove them to the edge of the door.

Even passing through had been rough, knowing that anyone of them could suddenly turn on them. Sullivan you bastard, why did you have to plant the seed of paranoia and betrayal? Why couldn't you have shut your mouth off? It had come close to him being clean of every certainty he had there, there was no way out, any way to return. And to top it off, another man had gone missing. 'Look, this place is empty, what do you think had happened here? He couldn't have left the place.' 'What do you say to the man who takes care of the dead?' 'Excuse me?' Bourdemond looked at the carry eyed glassy face which asked again. 'I asked you what do you say to the man who takes care of the dead?' There was a statement there, a question which made him look the other way. He knew that the man waited while everyone else seemed to have waited there. 'I don't know, what do you say to him?' 'We're taking you home.' That hadn't changed anything over him at first, but then, at a second glance, he looked at the many plates on the wall. 'He must be hiding into one of those, you're.' Right. He wasn't there, that had been strange, but Bourdemond looked as if he had seen the ghost of a man who had been there. 'It's empty. And this one as well, the others.' Everyone started pulling the metal trays there, seeing how suddenly it had been that they couldn't see anyone there any longer. It was strange, that they didn't get anywhere by doing this, but that had been it. 'Where had the scream come if there's no one here? Where did the bodies go? What of the attendant? He couldn't have taken all of them, but.' His voice faded once Sullivan seemed to have found the middle tray. There had been a tunnel there, in the back, the bastard must've escape through it. With an immediate slam, he closed it and decided to look away. He knew, deep down that he could've shared this information with the rest of them and possibly look for a way to get through but that just wasn't enough. It would be something for his own to figure out, especially the reason for which he would take every body with him there. 'We need to return, fast. I don't think it was the right choice to leave them alone there in that red room.' 'What are you trying to say, Sullivan?' 'I think we may have made a wrong turn here. 'Words couldn't come on easier than that. They were staring at him in some way through which he couldn't handle in the least of sense an easier thing than it had been. Clearly, he was being suspected for something he hadn't done himself. 'Very well then, lead the way if you're by your claim Sullivan. We shall see to it, by the time we're there, of what had happened and what goes on. Let's see it for ourselves, shall we?' They followed him, as he was in lead, with suspicious looks on their faces and rather pale from the gases which still floated around. It was unclear as to what the cause was. But the holes inside the walls had done nothing to filter it. As a matter of fact, it had become much worse, far more so than it would've ever been. A stranger, more dangerous thing came to mind. They looked around as if caught blindly by their minds. No one looked around nor were they aware of what was going on there, with them being afraid and paranoid. It was unclear whether or not anyone trusted him. But he was right, they had been shocked at the sight. In the time they had been left, the minutes through which had passed, the men who had been tied had been unrecognisable. Most of their faces and bodies had been bloodied to the point where they couldn't be distinguished from the bloody pulps they had become. 'Cover that damn screen now! Just cover it!' Sullivan had to yell twice and give another hard glance, just so he'd be sure someone listened. There had been a blanket, something which was rugged and looked like some sort of softer carpet which had been showed in-between the screens just so it would cover the one in the middle. Dimly lit by the mere lights, they looked at what had happened. With a leap of faith, one got closed and felt for himself. His hand had been bloodied and not only that, he felt no face and seemed to have turned to the others. 'I can't feel his nose, I haven't felt any teeth and I was able to shiver my fingers through the holes which had been his eye sockets placed through. I don't think there are many bones in there either.' His quick jerk of hand threw the spat of blood away. Neither woe nor anger laid to him, a mere impartiality to the cause, it seemed. 'We have killed the men here, haven't we? We're being cleansed and killed by that thing there and at the time we're done with it, there aren't going to be any survivor to stop it. Does anyone realise what this means? If a creature can just kill people off by gas or by sight, then who could stop it? What might happen once it gets any kind of control over the radio or the broad network? Do we know if its sounds corrupt as well? Can we even know of what other mad possessions it might be in hold of?' 'That's enough, you're just making us more paranoid and I don't like where you're going.' Sullivan bit himself by the boot, aware of where and what Bourdemond was getting at. He had almost said it himself, not to mention that he had been aware of something much worse. Much, much worse. 'We need to get into contact with one of the bases. They need to raise this place to the ground. The experiments had failed and everything else is lost.' 'You're mad if you think we can't turn this somehow in a victory. We can still find a way or another to save everyone and prevent it from escaping.' 'No, this has to be voted in unanimity, do you understand that? Else we may as well just give and die off one by one. There's not other way to look at it other than that.' He lit a cigar inside. It wasn't like the smoke was going to kill them off more so than the gas. They were five there and at least eight missing in action. Neither of them questioned where they had gone, it was a huge base of operation after all. 'Very well, then I shall take my leave.' 'Where exactly might you be going Sullivan?' Giovanna, one of the other scientists was holding him at gunpoint. No one had been aware that there had been such a thing as a firearm in the facility, but that didn't look unmodified. 'You're not going to run away in hiding after what happened. Those deaths are on you.' 'I couldn't have known that would happen if we left them there, look, it's not my fault. Even if someone stood with them, they would've ended up in the same manner.’ ‘Only if they looked at the screen for too long, do you seriously think they would’ve ended up in the same manner? Look at them. They’ve melted from the screen, there’s nothing in their bodies. I said, look at them, closely!’ Bodies, if so, looked rather deranged, the way they had seemed to replicate some kind of appearance which had lain behind the image. It was something they hadn’t been able to see in the first place but the thought arrived. Were they really dead? Of course they were, but could he convince Giovanna otherwise? Just how paranoid was this man and how far could he get against him if they were to match wits. That gun didn’t even look that right while it had been pointed at him. It had been a hot rock of a mess, but he couldn’t back away just yet, despite there being murder in his eyes. Plenty of words could describe what had happened there but neither came to mind. Everything he saw in front of himself as Sullivan thought was that barrel of the gun. ‘Well, what will it be then? Should I concede then and have you put a hole through me? It doesn’t seem likely that any of this will change.’ And just in time, the sounds came. It had been another group of scientists from the hall, going as far as to signal the fact that there had been reluctance to stay put. They could’ve hid away but chose not to a thing. ‘Throw me the other coat and be fast. I don’t want to stain it.’ Giovanna seemed to have covered his arm as well from the wrist, over his hand and over his entire arm’s length to hide the gun. He looked like some waiter who had been too much in himself, by the way he had been dressed and his hair had curled. It seemed likely for him to lead this place now. Getting on his nerve wouldn’t be the greatest thing, as he seemed to have noticed. ‘We’ll walk and see what’s going on. If anything’s wrong, Sullivan, I’ll keep in mind that you were the first to want to get out. Do you get me? A bullet will fly straight through your skull and what’s left of your mind will go away with you.’ ‘I got that clearly enough, Giovanna, loud and clear.’ He had moistened his feet from the waiting, sweating as much as he could’ve been in the kind of environment he had been in. Bizarrely enough, he looked out and around and seemed to find nothing of use, no way to get out without a hole through him. And everyone else was quite as well as they had been met with much reluctance, rather than have any kind of desire to help him get off. As he had suspected, everyone had either been mad or in it for themselves. No one could be trusted. Especially those lunatics they had encountered, who were banging small clubs on the door. Those were high velocity rounded edges they had ripped from the compressor. Were they mad? Sullivan was the first to recognise the pieces and where they would belong. The air compressor regulated the air and the carbon emission which went around the entire facility. Without those pieces, it would only get hotter. No wonder he had been sweating, but they waited before they said a thing. ‘Those things, are they what I think they are?’ ‘You know they are, Giovanna, and you know that unless we trust one another, we won’t be able to take all of them out. We need to get through this as a team, do you understand? If we give in now, they’ll just step on us and there won’t be a chance for us to get through.’ ‘Very well, what do you want us to them? We’re unarmed on average, other than I and I don’t think I can trust you by any means. It wouldn’t be the first time you tried to escape us.’ ‘Shh, look at their faces, they have no eyes either. Look at their ears, they’re deaf. Something went wrong on their sides as well. You don’t think we’ll be able to take them one by one that way? Look at how red they are, doesn’t that seem familiar as well?’ They looked only as red as the bleeding had come out of their heads. But on top of them they wore some white cones which had been bloodied. There had been holes in those cones, from which poured that red, volatile thing, but it could only cover as much as the area around their own. It seemed likely that they had been driven mad. And the heat hadn’t helped their cause either. Once they spoke, it had been clear. ‘Open the door, let us in.' With the voice of a normal man, it had been reasonably clear that they only looked mad in appearance, and nothing of their mind had been altered. 'Why are we locked? Can't you see we're only trying to get in and conduct our studies? This is unfair, we're as much a part of this project as you are. Nothing mad's going on.' 'Shoot them then, release them of their misery.' Only three of them laid there and Giovanna didn't want to waste a single bullet. Not as likely as he had been reluctant but he wasn't as sure to shoot either. But what was he hiding? 'No, I'll waste no bullet on them. Have them go on as well as to be clear, what's going on with their bodies must be a product of the red screen. It looks like.' He used his other hand to swipe of the head product off his forehead. It was indeed getting too hot. 'Find something and bash their heads from behind. They won't be able to hear us come.' 'Are you the one who lost his mind? Do you see anything around the place which might be used for it?' He nodded, in complexion with his cause. He wasn't aware nor could he think of any other cause than what was going on around it. 'Then choke them from behind, I don't care what it is but I won't waste a bullet.' 'If you won't waste it on them, then waste it on me. We can't risk losing more people to this madness and unless you haven't noticed, between the gas and the heat, breathing is getting worse down here. Either way, I'd rather be shot in the face than wait until the moment I would suffocate in here. Go ahead then and if you won't, I'll be sure to take the gun away from you.' It wasn't clear whether or not he would do it, but that had been just as mad as trying to wrestle those people at the door. Either way, they could contract, if it even were possible, the same kind of illness which reigned over them. And with the tiny amount of information which laid to it, that would be rather clear. 'Well, you're not going to shoot me then, Giovanna?' He was silent, he had been caught off guard and seemed to have been in the same way frozen like before. The guts on him to threaten someone with an empty barrel, nothing laid inside. Did you seriously think you could pull it this long off? What happened to the cartridges? 'They were never there, I only wanted to use this as a kind of last hope. You know, a way to scare off any intruder in the extreme case someone found their way inside the facility. I didn't intend it to get this far.' 'And you threatened all of us instead?' 'Only Sullivan, which, I may add, I still don't trust as of yet.' 'That's rich, coming out from someone threatening to shoot us unless we take a close one to them. From the information at hand, they could be contaminated.' Sullivan seemed to think, with little information and thought of what was going on. His comprehension had been bizarrely caught as well. It was a moot point, yet he moved closer in and took the gun. With the butt of it turned he came close enough and slammed it behind one of the back of their heads. It wasn't the reaction he had expected. The hit fully landed and seemed to have made a serious sound, but the man seemed unaffected by any means. Was his head empty by means alone? How come, under no circumstance, was there never any way of getting through to it? There were ways of looking forward, and less than that, they were caught into this primitive bashing. 'I think they're too far gone to be affected by brute force, you may want to stop trying to butt in. They won't cause any problem, Sullivan, so just in case, keep your distance and let them do whatever they're trying to accomplish.' 'You realise we'll have to get through it one way or the other, right? And we need those pieces in order to repair the compressor.' 'There should be a couple of spare parts in the same room, worry not about them. There's nothing being wasted here and I'm certain.' Of another scream which came from somewhere inside. They had to stop that. It was frightening, to the point where the bashing stopped and the blind deaf ones seemed to have been shocked as well despite there being no means for them to comprehend what had happened there. Somehow they managed to get through, to the point of having caught themselves that way. It was unclear, what they feared but they dropped the parts and seemed to have gotten into a run. Everyone else went out of their way to avoid contact with them as they seemed to have nothing against them getting as far away from them as possible. They were at that point where they seemed less like human beings and more like wild animals which had been released. 'They'll cause trouble if left unnoticed.' 'We'll all be dead unless we fix the compressor and the air keeps heating to an unnatural level. Do you understand that?' The base had already seemed vaguely infected, especially at the ceiling. Those agents had spread across it and seemed to have encompassed everything, including the walls. Sightlessly undressed, they had some of their features outreaching and trying to get at anything which may provide some kind of distraction. 'Ignore them, each of you should grab a metal piece and we should go. Not you Giovanna, I don't think I can trust you any longer.' He had a change in the way his nostrils had been arranged and he sniffed, but otherwise, he had been relatively content with the choice Sullivan had taken. It was either them or those ones. But he looked behind as he pretended to be their Overseer and instead looked concerned. What if they knew of the tunnel leading outside and what if it had been left open? Did they even remember him opening that one in particular? How exactly would they react? Undoubtedly in the same manner as he had once he found out that the gun was unloaded. That didn't matter, this did. The compressor room had been opened. Only two of them had been engineers there and what he had forgotten was the fact that one of them had been Giovanna after all. This would be the only think which kept him there, untouched despite playing wild ranger with them. 'You think you'll be able to keep up and help me with it? I know many of you don't have much understanding of it, but it should be only a matter of reattaching and rewiring.' It seemed simple enough, as long as the two engineers dealt with the wires, they only had to reattach it back. The tools were just around the giant compressor. It had looked something like a plane's engine by the looks of it, but with a different knick to it. If this would filter the air, that would be just well. What hadn't seemed to stay with any single one of them was the state in which the room had been. There had been an extra metal railing above of them. Someone had been there, recently speaking. Someone had smeared blood on the walls as they pushed forward and somehow made it to safety. The stench was awful, the light was dying out. 'The electricity, won't that be a problem?' 'There's an extra generator which should buy us a few more hours, but afterwards, everything else might be inevitable. Our options are limited at best.' It should've been clear to whom he was talking to. Though there was some noise going somewhere upstairs. Someone had been listening intently from one of the so called close door and without the thought of the so-called intervention, it would be unclear whether or not there had been something to it. 'Another one of those sounds?' 'Someone has to check on it, and I think I might be the only one who isn't occupied.' Said Sullivan, as well as he had been aware that this would be his chance, his moment, the only way he could possibly get through with it unattended. Just what was in his mind? What had there been going through? Everyone had been on the edge for far too long to give in now. But how was he unaware? 'Let's vote on it then? Should Sullivan be allowed to go alone? Does anyone else trust him?' 'Should we have any kind of reason not to trust him? So far he hasn't done nor had he said anything to show us otherwise. I think the only one with a quarrel on him is you Giovanna. Drop it already, or else we may not be able to continue our cooperation.' Giovanna tried looking at everyone else. They knew that this would not be a great idea, as someone who would be sent out there alone would be most likely to never return. But they all knew, despite not saying it that Sullivan had been untrustworthy. It was kind of clear at the edge of their eyes. As much as they didn't trust one another, Sullivan had been the one to be least thought off. He left. No one intervened to stop him under no circumstance whatsoever. Uncertainly said so, there had been something clear to it, to the point of view of one another being caught. There hadn't really been any noise out there, but a mere fragment of their manifesting paranoia which had come in terms of being heard. Such duress had the sound that they had all heard it without mutual confirmation, to the likes of Sullivan who knew where he had to go. This was it, the middle one, he opened and dragged the metal cover from the morgue, revealing the tunnel. It would be had but he could drag it from inside, just so he could buy himself some time and not get caught if they thought or found out about this exit. A simple explanation wasn't needed as to find out how did those madmen managed to cut through the metal pane at the back of it, or how had the attendant managed to drag all the corpses. Information of that kind was irrelevant at best. Not only that but he had no need to know it. He had been in and on his was to get out. Crammed in there, he had only a light pen on him, which produced the bare minimal for him to see through the tightness of the tunnel. It was clear that, by the scratches and the pounces left on the sides of it, someone had dug his way through with his bare hands. Unclearly said, there had come to no surprise that there wasn't any kind of confirmation as to say what the reason was for that smell. The scent of death, the scent of the gas which permeated as well despite him having left the area was still there, in the form of mad contamination, still bothering him. Sullivan couldn't tell how longhand it been since he had entered it and couldn't see an end to it. Trapped in there, with the likes of himself, he found the roundness getting tighter around him, like a ring of dirt, or some worm inside which he crawled. 'Where am I being taken?' He wondered and felt only the benefit of the coldness which laid there. It had been a break from the head death and the dryness of the air but air was there. And it wasn't stable, he wasn't suffocation, there had to be some source. There it was, now the hole suddenly took a turn upwards. It had been in the form of a giant oval, or an oblong thing, wide enough to have looked like some malformed light bulb, inside of which he suddenly raised himself on his feet. Standing there, with the inability to look in any other direction, he crept as his stale heart waited. Around him, on what seemed to be bed-like surfaces on which there rested the corpses, he was looked down upon by the mysteriously disappearing corpses that had been brought there. And to beat that off, there he was, the one and only morgue attendant, standing still with his eyes wide open, mindlessly staring at his pen-light flashed against his eyes. From behind of him, in the darkness, one hand reached and grabbed, as if alive, Sullivan's shoulder. He couldn't say a word or even think of it any longer as he dropped the light and crawled back into the hole. There was just enough space for him to return and try making it as far as he could out of fear that they might be able to turn and grab him, dragging him back to where he had been. In those tunnels, he felt pale and afraid, sweating in the cold, he sneezed. There was some blood of well, but it seemed close to having been frozen in his nostrils. What had come out had seemed to be a trail of blood which had come out in the form of some long, transparent string of glass-like ice. Just what was going on in there and why had that happened? He couldn't explain, but once the light of his pen stopped working and the noise returned, he feared the most. The sound of crawling echoed, like some wild animals getting through, following on the footsteps of their prey, while knowing where the end destination laid and the fact that there wasn't any escape. The moisture in the air not only had ended but there was the smell and there was that creeping feeling that he could be caught off guard at any moment in time and he could be grabbed by the soles. They were there behind him and he was only getting dirt in his face and getting more bruises from forcing himself through the tunnel. A single thought occurred and he had been there and the end. One metal, or something made out of some kind of imitation stood there to be pushed. Now, as he had been desperate, he started pushing and throwing himself against it, just so he would see the light. He had been grabbed finally, ready to shout. But then he had looked and noticed the sweaty hands which had wrapped around his shoulders and which had pulled him out. Those were the hands of a man, a living man, which were only followed by the others. 'Sullivan, have you lost your entire mind? What have you done?' 'Close it, close it before they get out of it.' After he had been thrown on the ground and the few seconds in which the words connected to their heads, they turned and looked to see the hole. From it came a plethora of hands and arms, the corpses' heads as well as every other limb, the ill. They were there, somewhat alive but cut by the force which pushed the metal coffin back inside. 'Block it now, pick up that steel bar and block it.' They had dragged one of the bars and placed it between the other metal coffins which lay above and below, blocking the one in the middle in some kind of strange span which had prevented any force from opening it if it came from the inside. 'Care to explain what were you doing inside there and why there was a hole?' 'This needs no explanation, this rat was trying to paint me as an untrustworthy person to facilitate his own escape. It's all too clear now. You know it as well, I had been right to threaten him with my unloaded gun, I knew he was up to something when he had made his attempt of flight.' 'Is he right, Sullivan? Were you planning on escaping without us all along? How long have you known of that exit?' He was in a bizarre position now, surrounded by all these people who may have been on his side not too long ago. How come they were still giving him the benefit of the doubt thought? It was something he couldn't explain. Sullivan do this, carry this order, make sure this thing goes as planned. 'Am I your servant then? Is that why you're all acting this nicely to me? Why is that you're making exceptions, even now out of all the times I've wronged you?' 'I was just going to ask the same thing as you have Sullivan. This is something which interests me just as well.' Said Giovanna. He had as much of a stake in this whole feud as everyone else around the room, even more than that, there was still dread and time now. Most of all, the compressor had been fixed. The panels would be red in the other rooms and it seemed like the bad news would keep returning. 'There's no one else around here and I think I've got some bad news.' Came one of their students, it had been the only one alive. Somehow he had managed to survive as the only one to carry on this message. 'Something malfunctioned with the screens and every single one of them turned red. The corpses we left in that room had been completely been turned into pools of meat and blood, I think they were dissolved by the screens.' 'And the room?' 'I completely sealed it off sir, I don't think it's safe any longer to dwell anywhere near it. For that reason, I sealed the edges of the door frame as well as the keyhole.' 'Why haven't you tried shutting down the screens first boy?' 'I've tried doing that sir, but they somehow still kept going on, I don't know why, but they stopped responding to any kind of brute force as well when I attempted to smash them.' There was some force and an attempt, this had been out there already. But what did that leave them out of? Everything, by means alone, they had little thought of what would happen afterwards. 'What are we to do about you, then?' Once the issue had been settled, there was still the issue of looking at him. Sullivan the traitor and the rat, he had backstabbed everyone as well as he had sacrificed that man. 'Any bright ideas then, or are we supposed to wait now to starve and kill each other off?' 'I think there's one option we haven't thought off yet. What if we end it before it comes to action and breaks into the water? We're forgetting one key element, which is the fact that we may not be able to escape or contact anyone but it may break through the panel above it and pollute the lake above it. What would the consequences be then? Let us assume a man goes swimming and suddenly comes out bearing some kind of disease? And what if it spreads?' 'How exactly do you suppose we're meant to exterminate that thing which is completely sealed off? Even if we managed to somehow break through that reinforced door, we're still outmatched. It grew in size, most of its mass.' Sullivan had stopped paying attention to them. He was still set on those things which he knew very well they had been in his mind, crawling atop the ceiling, seemingly unaware of any kind of interaction between the others. He was still set on the fact that he was the only one seeing them, but not only that, as it happened for them to follow. As if unable to know whether or not he was still with them, they decided to finally get to it. 'When you decide to follow us, know that we will be by the door. Regardless of your attempts for some escape, I believe there's no way out there that way, is there?' 'No, it's completely blocked out, from the point there in the back, there's nothing but a dead end, where he sits with the corpses.' 'Who exactly?' This wasn't the time for questioning at all, as they were getting ready to push forward through the mass of metal on the other side. Somehow they had to overwrite the lock and open it, despite being on a general lock down. 'Shouldn't we be able to open the lock on the elevator? They should work the same ways, shouldn't they?' 'You fool, haven't you paid any attention yet? That lock isn't similar in the least of sense, to the point of there being multiple locks that block every door from the one above, below, and the general lock on the elevator's panel. Its energy is being redirected as well, just so there would be no escapee from this suffocating trap we're in. We must admit this to ourselves, that there's no escape for us, though, there might be some escape for them. Unless we somehow managed to screw this plan or this order of events, we might not be able to prevent it from spreading.' And there it would be. This thing unleashed upon the world. And somehow, in the compressor room, it happened as well, despite there being no screen, somehow it had infected the light. 'Close that door lad and seal it off, quickly, I say!' Another man came with the young lad as they slammed it without looking. Everyone, including Sullivan who had barely joined them seemed rather surprised at the turn of the events. But that red light infested the room as well. 'It must be that thing inside. I remember there being panels and other machinery which connect it to the rest of the system. That must be the cause of it and if it had somehow managed to modify the light to the same effect as the image of it has, I think there might be no hope for us yet.' 'Then what are we to do?' 'Work on it, seal every other door. That should buy us some time, don't enter any other room. Sullivan, Bour, close the morgue and seal it off, this should leave us only here. If anything goes wrong, we should break the lights above us, just in case.' 'Not yet, and don't forget, this panel produces a light as well.' One square had been ripped apart from the wall. It was hidden from the sight of a layman or someone with a low access level, not to mention that it had been created for the sole reason of overwriting what would seem to be in total lockdown. Both sides had been sealed off immediately, completely and without a chance of a sight. There was something inside, something going on. The screen was malfunctioning, with the being dead dots on the screen, spreading and erasing important data. 'There's some corruption going on in here. I do not know what's causing it. But I think I've got enough to know and figure out what's to be done. Here.' Some options flashed. The first line of order seemed to close off the roof above the thing inside its locked cage. As long as it had no way of going into contact with the water, there was another line of defence against it. 'We should've bought ourselves a few more hours of time. The status is that the air shouldn't be running out, we should be fine for the time being. I'll redirect the energy.' A failure in the system, which prevented him from touching or even trying to remove the lights from the room, as they seemed to be drawn from inside.

Another few command prompts followed which had been entered, pushed and delivered. Nothing so far. 'Something's preventing me from canceling its lights.' 'Leave them be, the lock, we need to remove the lock. This damned gate which bars us from getting through. We should.' His words had little to do with the sight. It had been opened, leaving the door which would have to be manually pulled over. The man had done everything which could be done, leaving them there. With little to themselves, they seemed barely aware of the flashing and the dimness transition from a bright white light to a dim pinkish one. 'We'll have to enter.' 'And do what exactly? We know the size of it and what it's like. What do you expect us to do?' 'We can change the light and raise the heat from inside. Isn't it ridden to one place? Isn't it static? We should be able to turn the room into some oven and see that it boils and gets a piece of its own medicine.' 'No, that wouldn't work, there's not enough heat for that. It works like some kind of organ, doesn't it? Those worms inside of it, if we get to them, we could pull them off and.' 'We won't do anything if that keeps changing.' The light turned to red inside their room. 'Everyone open the door and get inside. We'll think of something while we're on the other side.' Without a second thought they all entered and slammed the door behind them. There was no word to describe what they had found there. Everyone peered as if they had been turned mad. But there it was, with the roof closed, the light untouched, the room was empty, with no mark or anything of the sort inside. There was nothing to it. Little information of woe, something dreadful and peculiar had been going on. With the little information going on and the rambling of words, there was the fear as the light had turned on them, red, with everyone else being caught in a trap, unable to comprehend that they were dead. How could this have happened to them? Out of all the people who could've been trapped there, it had to be them who would be killed. It made little sense, and there would be no explanation for the dread they felt and the way through which they would not escape. This was uneventful, but they tried at least to think it through. But even then, it seemed as if their minds had been in the dark, shallowly caught as if it didn't matter in the least. 'What do you think it is? Could it be that we're not seeing it properly? It wouldn't be the first time.' 'One should make a sacrifice and try walking over to see whether or not our minds are affected. If it's still there and we cannot see it, he would start being taken or eaten or whatever effect it might have on the body of the man entering in contact with it. But whom?' Everyone turned towards Sullivan and seemed to heed the call of looking forth. They thought he would be the best candidate after so many betrayals and after so many attempts to get himself off. 'Very well, seeing how there's no other way out, I may as well just see to it.' He walked with some confidence, the confidence of a dead man. After a few steps he stopped and waited. A bizarre turn of events seemed to creep behind him. In his mind, it had already been over, already through. There was nothing there, nothing blocking him from walking. 'Are we too late then? Had it escape through the ceiling holes?' The pools could be infested already, the explanations could be benign, but even that could be confirmed or denied with the help of a test. 'Release it for a few moments, check the water and see for yourselves.' Bouremond was there, messing with the controls, after which, there came the turn of a valve and drops of clean water came from the turns. Though there was no way to look at it, there had been a concentration of gas in there, one which would be harsh enough to last. 'What now? It would seem like this being disappeared without leaving any trace whatsoever. There's no sign left that it even existed. Look at the panels, they're broken but there's no mark of it having tried to get inside.' 'What if it escapes through it? What are the chances it somehow managed to get through?’None said one of the men as he drifted away. He was the first one to be affected as the light started dimming in the same room they were. It felt as if he had been on another planet just then as the walls changed from metal to some kind of wide walls, which stretched the image of a purple mess which moved. It was ticklish and bore long images of orange eyes, in the middle it seemed like they had been made of some material which didn’t belong to Earthlings but rather it had been traded by some dimensional overlords which brought them to where they laid. And that purple turned to a dark red, in the utmost grim of fashions. Even the drops of water turn to red, signaling the upcoming fate they were to bear. ‘There’s no escape from it, is there? We’ve been beaten, it must’ve escape through that way.’ ‘We need to seal it off then and turn off the compressor.’ ‘We’ll suffocate before the red light appears, what do you mean by that? We could even start being boiled and turned by the heat before it comes to pass. Look above us, the illumination here barely changes, it could take minutes, hours or who knows how much. But as soon as the air compressor stops, that’s it. There’s a window where the air gets drawn out, where the toxicity might make us slowly suffer from a few brain and lung conditions before we die.’ ‘And is that a bad thing? What would be the alternative? Dying from that mad light? If that’s what you will, stop delaying the inevitable and open the door. No way I’ll let it rule over us now, not after trying to stop it at every turn. Though I may not be able to take this on myself, I need all of you to agree with me on this. We need to stop the air filters and somehow let it be done.’ Already one of them had fallen on the ground, having been battered and crawling like an infant of blood. He was fuming out of his mouth. A black trail of gas was coming out of him, from his eyes and his nostrils as well. Blood splattered but even that changed its shape and magnitude, to have become something more solid and volatile. As dreadful as it had been, there was nothing worse than the way it looked. More so, they seemed to have accepted that he died there, despite moving. ‘That’s the way we’ll end, or much worse. At least this way we’ll have a chance, the three of us who are left. I cannot make any other case for him, or for anyone else from this point on. If we die, we’ll die together like he does. But at least that gives us a chance from preventing.’ ‘Preventing what Sullivan? Can’t you see it already? I don’t think it ever existed. The experiments, the entire show of gas, lights and everything so far, those couldn’t have gone that way? There’s no way it could’ve grown to that size out of nowhere with nothing to it. Everything so far.’ ‘It’s mad, I knew, but we. Look, nothing makes any sense so far, but we know there’s no way out of this, do we? So why bother? We won’t escape but it may have a chance to.’ He was hallucinating again. It was almost as if they had heard him and have crawled through the walls and spread everywhere in that room, looking at him. This time was different, for this time they spoke. ‘Tell them this.’ Various voices told him, once they pushed forward their necks and troubling heads. ‘It is safe to get through that door now. The red light will not hurt us, as it seems likely to have been nothing but a cheap trick.’ Sullivan seemed to have said it, word for word. They listened and seemed to have been caught in their own delusions. No one had been aware of anything any longer, which in prompt seemed to have let them reign off to their needs. It was unclear. No word went over as of that time. But they waited for an hour or two, looking at the walls, some with green or yellowed eyes. Something in the air seemed to have affected their pigmentation as well. Just as it seemed that they were getting sicker, their wills had been getting weaker as well. Now they obeyed. ‘Are you certain of it Sullivan? We trust you.’ ‘You’re the only one trustworthy Sullivan. After all, you risked your life trying to look into some way out for us. A hero, I might add.’ They almost worshipped him, as he went ahead, and worked his way through the panel. The door opened and one by one they went outside. By now, the red light had brightened too much that it hurt just standing on the other side and getting a glimpse of it. But neither man had seemed to care or to observe. 'Close it now, can't you see you're hurting us as well?' 'But they're inside of it.' 'Close it, close, close it, I said close it.' More voices joined as the others seemed to drag themselves from the mass which seemed to creep on the wall above him. 'He asked you to close it, or else you may doom us as well, you need to listen and close it now, press them. Press the buttons he said, enter the command. You're bleeding, bleed, bleeding, close, we need to enter the numbers again. Lock, lock, lock it now.' 'All right, stop it already, you're all making me nervous.' He had, without a shame or a glimpse of guilt, locked them there. He had been unable to think for himself there, unable to realise how inevitable it had been as well. Sullivan somewhat knew he would end the same way, but at least this way, he could buy some time. 'You shall do what we tell you to do. Look at it, the open box there, look inside of it and above.' 'It's too dark for me to see anything.' Said Sullivan, while trying to adapt his sight to what appeared to reign between the many overlapping dark walls. Other than the various parts which appeared to stretch endlessly, there had been nothing there. Only a few things seemed likely to be consistent with what he thought off in his mind. A lesser man would see much less than what his eyes saw. And even then it wasn't what ticked him off. One drop, a single drop of blood seemed to have made contact with his nose. It came from the hole he snuck his big ugly nose in. He knew then he would suffer, after realising that it had escaped somehow. Even more so, he knew he would be the only one, which drove him to a burst of rage. Without thinking he had stroke a valve. The top above him released the lock. It wasn't the one at the door, but what kept the water from flooding the room. 'Stop this, tell me how to stop this, the valve is broken.' Mostly, it had been the various things he tried over, against which his mind worked against him. Sullivan seemed to have forgotten the codes to unlock the door as well, while, he was mocked and laughed at by those filthy spreading malignant heads above him. 'You, you all tricked me. This is your fault. I'll drown, the heat, I'll boil, or die by the red light, I know it's coming, I can see its red shades.' 'Who's at fault for torturing the being with the help of the light? Was it not your people who switched and turned and made contact with it? Plus, I would bother about the electrical panel over there coming into contact with the water. I wouldn't even be certain which one of them could be responsible for your death. But I would hurry if I were you.' Hurry where, to what, the small metal plate of the floor. He could place it back and hold it. But it had been too heavy for a single man to lift it. 'I could crawl inside that hole. I think I'll be able to fit there.' Despite being slightly soaked, he decided to try. It was tight, but at least he had been partially right about it. He entered and seemed to be able to fit his head. His other parts seemed to have been working against him. But it was there that he had met his end. What he had failed to see in the dark was a small piece of the insulation pipes which had been cracked and broken. It left a sharp edge against which his neck now rubbed. The weight and the fact that he had been on his toes didn't help in any case. For there he met his bloody end, in an utmost horrible way, as he went ahead to rub back and forth, his shouts had echoed in that lost fort. The facility lay abandoned afterwards. A few more people died on the field. It seemed like this sudden infestation of man was running to an end. There wasn't a way to fight against the amount of drones and giants which hunted and started reforming the whole sector they had been in. Unclearly said, or observed, it seemed likely that there would be no survivor by the time the eight quarter of the overall section would be locked. Survival rates were low, even for those who had somehow managed to dig a deeper hole to hide themselves in and play coy by the time those giants left the area. Most of the place had looked not like some sort of battlefield now but like a prison made of blocked walls, with only room enough left for their own small places to be locked. Either those blocks of metal would fall from above or they would be caught off and sealed there. Regardless of the method through which their fates would be met, it was clear enough that there wasn't a way to avoid it. Every single living being there was in danger of immediate peril and death. Undoubtedly said, there wouldn't be anything clearer than that. As much as it had looked that way, there wasn't any sort of consistency to be looked upon. Fear seemed to reign, one man out there would feign. And as soon as the sound of him slamming against the wall echoed inside the tiny chambers which had been left free, the giant machines came and slammed another block on another stop. It had been a disaster on both sides. The dirt had to be carried out for it had racked too close to what had seemed to be benign. Where's everybody? Loneliness wasn't what defined this soldier. It was the fact that he had been separated for this long that he had grown accustomed to the likes of the walls around him. He had scribbled on them with some white chalk he had found long before, when there had been dirt, when there had been grubs to trade with. They had been mindless but even for them to show intelligence in order to trade had been a delight. Unfortunately, it had been short-lived, for he had been caught there, with his mind sinking even lower. There was the dread which came from either seeing a shadow or a strong light coming. Far away, the lift stopped even taking people on the other level, for those who managed to even glimpse at the sight of what lay beyond them seemed never to return. It was unclear what had been activated there, but no man could escape through that way without being completely demoralised and immediately destroyed. Either some ray or some force crept and annihilated whatever organic form of life had been detected, making sure that there were levels which would be cleansed of this virus or organic pest. Neither soldier made it through nor soon enough it would be over for either. It seemed like those walls were only pumps and this level would have to become active sooner or later. Just as it had been thought off, the top had started coming down. It dwarfed the men, who went on their knees and looked above them with the fear of being crushed, soon to realise that it stopped. There was no casualty so far. No man died from being hit or getting crushed yet. Safety came at a price nonetheless, as no one bothered to look away. But both the bottom and the top seemed to pump back and forth, which had been well enough for them to be certain. Those damn machines won't make it through any longer, as hard and hardened as they seem to be, they are too big and too wide to fit through the halls. It's only a matter of time until something of the sort might happen. Something of the sort, as in the sector being completely abandoned, as in the dire hopes of being forgotten, this would be the one time they would get a chance to hope for it. No drone laid there in the open. For this would be a simple victory, as there was no nuisance, the dirt and the sand had been gone, even the grubs and the corpses which had been turned against them seemed to have disappeared. 'Michael.' 'Sergeant, you're still alive! I'll be damned, we're still alive.' Two more soldiers came from distant places, almost afraid. This was a small plot of metal they stood in, with no more spread and not a single more shin of area to lie upon. What had happened there and how was it? It had been an awful journey but they stood straight. 'I'll make a fire and do good, it does seem to have gotten cold around here.' 'Look soldier, I'm more than packed on cans, this should keep up going for a while longer until someone else comes to find us.' 'Shouldn't one of us stand guard in case they decide to return?' 'No, soldier, we won't get another chance like this one. I doubt it might even matter if we were to be found, it's already over. Say, how much ammunition are you carrying? Thought so.' Even from his face, he could tell that the soldier was prepared to lie. At least eight others who might've been supposed to have been alive were missing. Nothing to shoot and nothing to shoot with, at it seemed like most of their guns had been jammed or malfunctioning for something close to days if they were kind with it. Dangerously aware of what was going on with others, it looked less like what would happen to them, as creakingly aware of some dreadful nuisance, but less than what it would've been if only it worked. 'It's right around the corner sir.' They followed with their opened cans, everyone using some rusty spoon they either inherited or kept a hold off for some time. All of them dark haired or gray, poor of sight and tired, stood in front of the elevator, clear of sight and aware that this had been what they had looked for. 'I'm afraid, it's too little and too late. It doesn't seem like it's going to work, at least not up there.' Through the glass there had seemed to be the closed off region, barred with a metal gate which prevented any kind of entry. If there had been a way to get through at all, it had been down. But there hadn't been an elevator leading down there. Only the long metal flat rounded line which stretched through the middle and seemed to go on down forever. Every man seemed to have ripped a piece of their undershirts and as they wrapped it around that line, they started slowly downscaling it.

Clearly, something would come close to being dangerous, there would some cruelty involved, and by the likes of normal being which would creep around until destruction came. It had been unclear who had been in the lead, but in the dark, they crept until one shimmer of light did appear. One giant door opened. Some motion deception had been in place. It was close enough for a man to make a leap towards and for the others to follow in his wake. Unlike the previous level which had moved and seemed to have been changed into some kind of piston, everything here had been clean. There wasn't any blood on the floor and everything was automated. Plates were being branded and shaped, cut and melted. It looked like a forge for pieces which spanned across and through the walls. The sharp parts had been the worst so far, as, by any way through which they would be looked at, it could be unclear as to whether or not it, it could be dangerous to approach. A few of the metal arms were at work as they pointed their hot points at them. 'Easy here, easy now, we're not trying to do anything.' The voice seemed to calm it down. It worked, for some reason, as slowly, as his hands went down, the arm noticed that he had been unarmed and returned to its work. That thing would've stung more than anything he had dealt with in the past. 'Try not angering anything here, I don't like the looks of it.' 'Then, could we not move a level lower? I don't like this place either, but I'm also not trying to shove myself into something I won't be able to get away from.' 'Just follow me and don't make any move, nothing too out of the ordinary.' 'Like some men who don't belong here and don't look like anything but out of place, right?' 'Don't get smart with me now, and just try to be calm. We have to find some kind of off switch and turn them down. It's the best way we could get back at them. If we somehow sabotage their belts and lower levels, we might stop whatever is going on here.' 'Sergeant.' A man shouted as soon as he had been met by the belt. One of the bodies which had been worked on seemed to have been caught alive, or driven on. It got up, even though it had only been half a torso, half a hand and one hand which could only extend from a pipe. That thing grabbed one of the low ranking officers by the neck and seemed to grab him there. In that moment, the belt stopped and suddenly every other did as well. The automation paused and as it did, the arms seemed to turn as if nervous of their work being interrupted. It was unclear as to what was going on there, but those things seemed to grow hotter by the minute. One quick jab and their faces and bodies could be maimed by the heat pointers. But everyone waited and looked at the main disturbance. It had been that uncorked and unfinished bot which had stood there, keeping the tight grip on the human's collar bone and pressing it slowly. The pain was disturbing at first but the pain could only come in form of blood. He was gushing out of his mouth and nose. Something was being injected as it seemed. Four arms seemed to have detached out of their stationary points as they attached themselves to the ceiling. Slowly they moved into position. 'Sergeant, look at what they're trying to.' He raised a hand and tried keeping as much faith in them as he could. As they went there, like some peculiar surgeons, they seemed to start the process and came to the point where the pipe would receive a hole. It revealed just the intense magnitude of its insides. Many wires, tubes and circuit seemed to reign inside. More than that, there had been the dreadful smell which came from the smoke as the hand had been disabled. It had been done yet. As soon as the metal hand had been pulled, slowly, it had taken out its needle out of the officer's collar bone. It was long and had been attached for far too long. The area around it not only changed to a blue and a purple but there had been signs of a bone infection there for not too long. The bot had been disabled but that hadn't ended yet. There was still the problem of the man, who stood, dazedly on his feet with an area which had been so affected that neither man seemed to think there was a chance for his survival. It was then when they interfered. Two arms wrapped around him and held out with their entire extension as if they had been a chair and a repulsory. 'Stand still soldiers, we may not have anything else to do for him yet. Let's see where this leads.' 'But, they're going to kill him sir.' 'Just wait for it and be ready to make it for the elevator and get grab a hold of the line.' Even now, the cold coming from its inside hadn't gone away, as for some reason, the door hadn't closed. They were exposed. Something as real and organic hid there, as they were aware. But would standing here be any much worth it? That couldn't be answered yet, not until they witnessed what they did to their comrade. They had soled something off in his body. At least from the mere sight, a fraction of his collar bone had been removed, instead of which there came something similar to it, out of some scrap metal junk pile which had laid not far from where they acted. The man stood there without shouting and took the pain as they cut, removed, stopped the bleeding and replaced the piece which had been taken and thrown. It looked like they had been done, each of the arm retreating back to its place and migrating towards its work. 'Come on, come on already, they won't let you get away otherwise.' Some of them laughed. Despite the pain and the loss of blood, he could still stand and join his brothers in arms. After all, it hadn't been as bad as it looked and only the pain was there as shallow as it had seemed to be. Unclear whether it would remain, they weren't even sure who'd look at it in the most peculiar manner. Two more moments there, as they looked behind, trying to decide what to make out of the arms. Clearly, they had seemed to be aware of what a human was like, especially with the way they had reshaped him. How much worse would it happen to be as they were to descend? Each man came next, leaving the one wounded man in the middle so they could try catching him between their ranks. He held one of the legs of it. Grogg above him and seemed to trust him enough not to let go. His legs were strong, and seemed to hold on, as, every now and then he would make sure his arms were wrapped around them as well as they held the piece of cloth which held him where he was. It was something close to him being wrapped both at the metal line and inside. Inside, was that what he had heard? Someone had said inside, quickly at that as well. What had they meant by that? There was no door open, just that, strangeness, the feeling of floating and being unable to go further below. One hole opened but that wasn't even close to being called traditionally a door, rather, some decrepitude of an entry through which their muscles had no control over. It was uneventful, the way they seemed to creep inside, as to look at it in a dreadful manner, they would be unaware of the consequences of woe, the way it looked, rather, made them unaware whether or not their feet would welcome the ground. As soon as it appeared that they all gravitated towards it, the long coiling plane against which they had been manipulated towards, they whined, as they had been broken apart. Inside that long cone, which stood in darkness, they looked towards its outside form. A pair of belts which had been connected as if through some constellation of many stars attained a perfect form. Their glow radiated then as they had been immediately destroyed. Nothing had been left out of them, neither body nor consciousness, as they had ventured too far, in some place they didn't belong. It didn't matter what their struggle had been, but what would happen afterwards, when the humans had been extinct in that place as there would be no biological life to muffle and to corrupt. They were now in their own world, with their own. Cursed, one might say, to live their layman lives, never to disturb and never to be disturbed by any means. Near a lake, as they stood, one which seemed to have been pure and unmolested by the presence of some grim thing. Their memories faded and most of them seemed to have lived good lives. But some had been stuck, struck and seemed to have been caught. In-between worlds, for those whose deaths hadn't been entirely supreme and unstationary, they had been left there, in some sort of dark transition, held by tiny humanoid shadows. They laughed and they grinned, now, as they rested, they seemed to be docile. It wasn't even certain how long it would take but each man who had gotten there seemed to have looked upon themselves only to notice the darkening of their shallow bodies. Now they could roam and walk through this infestation of metal and float through the walls, unaware of the light room below. One nameless spirit seemed to have crept towards the light room and saw the dark cone. Its belt of dark stars radiated with death. As soon as he flew in as close as he could be drawn towards it, he stopped and seemed to be alarmed. Unaware of the fact that touching it would be pure agony, he could only feel the constant pain of being in its presence. Others followed him, like tiny imps, children-like in form. Some were infants who didn't look like they had died, at least not the way he seemed to have passed away. He looked below his ribs and saw a giant hole which had extended down the line. No man would survive that kind of a blow. But the infants had been pure, the younger ones as well, even the older children who seemed able to grow. And as opposed to him, they all looked uninjured and very much more fluid than he had been. Neither one came near it, as if it had been understood that this death device would bring nothing but agony and despair. There would be nothing less of that if he continued going the way he had. 'Don't go near.' A shouting voice came. He had been saved from falling before he could awake from the mesmerizing pain he felt. Something dreadful, something bizarre, it would be unclear whether or not, he would be good at that. Clearly, he had been away, from the looks of which he lost his way. Both his fingers had been missing but he had recognised the man despite the lack of clear features. Something unholy had acquired most of them at the moment that pair of belts suddenly turned as if alive. A reanimated giant wretch of a thing, as it just happened for it to slam and trash everywhere around it in a motion which suddenly slammed and crushed every single other dark child as well as the two of them. Their bodies had been wrecked by the strike and immediately disabled with the supreme aspect of dark which had reign in their insides. A cruel fate, as it had seemed, no clear view of them crept within. If it would've been a crueler woe, none of them would be alive, but the two of them survive. As incomplete men, they floated away, as they had been pushed by the winds created by the dark stars there, pushing them as far as they would. Looking at them gave an eerie feeling to the others who had been whole. Inside their bodies there were not only missing parts but they had opened a whole new can of worms. There were small worm lings which bore smaller dark shining stars. A spoil coming from the fact that they had survived, as to their shine there came another release. When this dark prison ended, the shining worms had dragged them into their mad world, the halls and the strange place which they had wandered in. Where all the servants stood and greeted even more of those who had invaded, as the guards had been on their toes. All of them had similarities, in the way they had been dressed but colourless, other than that dark and deep red or crimson in their eyes. But another thing which held them together was those tiny shining dark stars which seemed to have infected everyone there. Outside they pointed at looked. 'Where are we now?' The words seemed to be slow and every time one of them spoke, it looked like an array of dark dust came out of their mouths. It had been unclear whether or not that could have an ill effect, but looking outside, at the gray sky, there had been revealed. The darkest of the stars, of which radiated with such a power that most of its mass had become a dark light which could only be seen as something transparent and weak. It wasn't solid but more akin to some floating bud of a flower, lost in the vastness of the extreme space. And they had bore the sky and they had been greeted with ill. 'Who are you, strangers? Why have you arrived here? You're not welcome in this place for your arrival here had been by chance.' Looking at themselves now, they had been whole again, by the mere glimpse. But they had felt those worms and the stars inside of them and it had been undeniable that this stranger could feel or knew for what they had come there. 'We're only trying to escape. We had been trapped.' 'Silence, I say. You are intruders here, in our world. Though you may bear our mark and are part of our beings, interlopers, must though intrude through this madness of ours? Then lest you follow, leave at once, but know this, the lands are barren outside our halls.' As soon as he said it, this man nodded for the guards to open the doors. It had been as he had said. The world outside looked as if it had been destroyed, the lands stretching had looked as if they were either flattened or filled with some peculiar dust which had stretched beyond imagination. But the marks on the ground had signaled, in the least that there had been something there. 'What about those?' 'We're the only survivors from the great destruction.' 'What about the others? You couldn't have checked every single corner of this world.' 'Indeed we haven't.' 'Then how do you know we aren't one of them either. After all, you couldn't have checked every place on this plane.' He stood there thinking about this, despite the strangeness and how they just popped right in out of nowhere, it may just be. But how could one explain the strange appearances they bore? They were different, they spoke and dressed differently than they had. But wouldn't a survivor be changed? Wouldn't the destruction change its entire body forever? 'Follow me in that case, we may decide what's to be done.' The guards opened the doors, in front of them while the outside had been closed. Inside the wide room, which had been shattered to look the form as if a rhombus, there laid a table and too many chairs to count, at least more than there could be filled. One more thing had seemed strange, the architecture, at least the way they seemed to have been caught by the appearance of it. Large pillars lay, but they weren't straight, as they seemed to be arched backwards towards the walls. They held them in place, but the vileness came from the fact that they bore holes in which there were those small dark stars as well. It was their symbol, that much had been known. The ceiling had been domes and squared in various sharp teeth marks, which would undoubtedly retreat as to open. More so, people started to gather. Despite them being strangers there, neither one of the council, as one would seem to believe they had been a part of, actually cared of them being what they were. For them, these were just mere insignificant outsiders. They didn't look dangerous, they were unarmed, and they stood up instead of sitting as they would be frowned upon. 'Ageus, who are they? Why haven't they been marked yet? You said they would be survivors, for which I could see as right. But why have they come here? Why haven't they died with the rest of this primitive world?' May we not speak for ourselves? One of them seemed to wonder and ask himself while there was no retreat. Though there was no way in the conversation as they all seemed to assemble in an orderly manner which left no room for entry. Neither man looked surprised or even shocked by the fact that they were there. Alive, out of everything they've heard. They seemed clueless as to why it mattered, for the presence of survivors. 'Don't take it personal, new-comers, it's not that it's not that great of a deal that there are other survivors lost in the world.' Said a voice from a bottleneck, which seemed to walk slowly from the end of the room. He looked rather young or middle aged. It was hard to tell since the only defining features were those bones which pushed them down. They seemed to have grown around their ribcages and as they seemed to have aged, they only got heavier. Another thing which seemed to distance one another was how much of that black dust had been spat out. For the bigger boned elders, the dust would be enough to fill a barrel full of it, at least by the time it disappeared in the wind. Not only that, but they appeared to be even less curious or concerned. They looked at their maps and their plans, the words scribbled on the walls and on the table with little concern about them. What if they had been spies sent there? Could it really have been that worse that they had no concern for any threat whatsoever? 'Well, I, for one, am curious, how have you managed to survive? Are there others like you out there?' 'We.' There was a slight hit from his beck. Right below the trading mark, it had been shallow and little felt, as there hadn't been any organs to be hit from there. 'Careful what you say to them. I'll let you do the talking while I look around the room.' Whispers came and went, and even then they weren't likely to be offended by the secrecy. Or at least they didn't look like it. They haven't looked like anything. It had all been too confusing for one night, especially at such a story. But if anything, if there had be a lie, he knew, as a soldier that he had to throw in something real just so he could make it even more believable. It was his only chance to get away with it. 'We almost died, I think. You see, something strange happened out there, in that mess of a red storm. As the dust and the winds seemed to have almost swallowed us, we saw something which almost came and destroyed us.' He had described, to his best of abilities, what that tentacle of many belts looked and acted like. His cheating manner through which he lied laid in the circumstances upon which they had encountered it. Since they had no way of knowing what human beings was this limp of belt and dark suns appeared somewhere out there, in the desert. 'It was a miracle we survived its wrath, as it had come out of nowhere and seemed to have almost ruined everything in its sight. There had been a tremor of woe coming out if as it ruined the buildings, creped on the dust and ended the lives of everyone out there.' 'Other than the two of you, I presume.' That couldn't have explained the strange features they appeared to have noticed on them. It could not be explained. By any means as well, both of them looked like every other one around there. As a fact, they were indistinguishable from one another as well. Was the person they were talking to an elder or a female? Even the younger sounding council members bore some large collars around their chests, so that couldn't have been it. It was time for them to bring forth what they had gathered. 'This wouldn't happen to be a private meeting would it?' Asked the other soldier as they had brought the living block there. From its shape, what had been drawn was the fact that it was changing. Pieces of sharp-looking sides and almost pointing cones seemed to have popped out of it. 'This should bring change.' One of the elders in the middle, if they were being, said. 'No one shall be excluded from this sight, from this change which is to come. With this alone, we shall master everything here and make sure there shall be nothing coming forth with brought destruction. Our kin shall survive and soon as we're inside.' Suddenly the doors locked, the holes barred and the lights came to be. What had been the deal with the seals placed on every exit? No real certainty could account for this, which they had feared. Trapped and trapped again, they asked. 'What are you planning to do with that thing?' But as if their voices seemed to echo, the stronger had its influence become. Soon enough, the many suns had their dark light drawn inside before they had been pulled in. Most of their bodies had been shaped and had their mass drawn in, leaving nothing but some peculiar looking skeletons which barely stood still. They could still move in their strange forms, dust falling off them. It felt like they had been afflicted by some sort of a disease as they dance malignantly through the seal. 'It it's done.' The lights came on and on a sudden curve, in the middle of the chamber; right through the middle of the table, there opened a grooming hole, which appeared to have been alive. In its bile, this thing through which they stored themselves had been places and swollen pushed itself in its depths. There would be no entry for either of them as it just happened for the moment when one pushed its bone-like hand inside the bile, it had melted in it. No pain came, no feeling whatsoever, as the doors opened, the lights switched and every exit came unsealed, other than the hole in which the sealing effigy had been stored. When the guards came in and inquired of the change, there appeared to be no response. There had been no like in those bones, other than some primitive passiveness which never came into light. For their looks and the blight they produced as they walked couldn't even compare with the likes of the dust which may have come out of them when they had been alive. But it would be much worse in their new tormented entry world. Where they had set themselves forth inside had been an ever-changing environment which seemed to have been just another mad spoil, which had been reckless. 'Now spread around and try to bring as many of them back to life.' Lifeless corpses lay on the various mad hills and inclined towers which seemed to have been anchored in the walls above them. But the corpses weren't normal by any means, as they seemed to bear the signs of automatons, or rather constructs of wood. They weren't as dark as they had been but seemed to be painted with red around their cheeks, simple clothes and features which varied. Most of them looked way too blunt to be smiling on that strange day, as it just happened for the sun to have had a light which looked yellowish-gray. What had come afterwards, on an immediate switch had been a pitch-black night, which had only been revealed with the help of some near-green or deep yellow lights from above. 'What's wrong with the way they look?' There was no one around him to hear his inquiry. But those people below them had almost madly comical features. Long mouths, crooked noses, empty sockets with tiny blobs instead of eyes. And worst of all, they seemed to be breathing even though by means of being checked, they had no pulse. Corpses breathing now? What kind of made plane had they been in. How was he supposed to bring him to life? It wasn't easy, that was certain, but the only attempt he had tried was some sort of shock. His hands came over his chest and he had pushed a tiny bit too hard. That thing rose from his place, with a missing piece of the upper front side of his chest, which the soldier had accidentally pushed through while pushing an inaudible scream. A resurrection attempt failed already as he fell back, bleeding internally with no way to be saved any longer. Reluctantly, he jumped near another, looking at their features again. This one had been heavier but he had to be brought into the light. Again, he had not realised on which side he had been grabbing on. As he looked behind he saw that he had left behind only the body while he had ripped his head off and threw it off the ground. 'How am I supposed to bring you back? This never ends well.' They had been repugnant now. Especially as they stood in their pile of corpses, as his every attempt ended up in him having accumulated some intensive neat pile of broken parts which didn't work properly any longer. Worse than that had been the fact that they spoke now. It had been a while since he had murdered everyone in there but they were no long a liability. Most seemed to grunt and smile, having no control over their limbs or over their emotions. It was unclear what had to be done here, whether or not they could be left alive, but he had done it nonetheless. One way or another, he had managed to bring every single one of them back to live and it was disturbing. He had to be mad to stay there with them, but he heard them in the way they acted. One man came through the pitch of the night and seemed to have found it. This had been a mess and worse than that, the man who had found the soldier was his comrade in arms. 'What have you done here? Did you do this all by yourself?' 'I can explain Rhotdam, I haven't, and it wasn't because of me. I shouldn't have but they just broke as I touched them. Have you tried bringing anyone here back to life?' Rhotdam looked the other way as well. He had been just as guilty over it but. What? 'Can't you hear it though? I have achieved my purpose nonetheless. Look, hear, hear, now, can't you feel them? They're trying to speak.' There was an interlude through which he attempted to listen to something, anything which might be. Nothing there, whatever he claimed to have heard there was nothing. 'There's nothing going on, they cannot speak. Do you understand? They can't hear, they can't move, twitch or show any other sign than their lifelessness. Even before, where they had shown signs of breathing that had at least been something. But now, they're not even able to do it any longer, do you understand?' He had to take his word for it, he had to. But what was he seeing now? 'Let us leave them and work together.' 'But how might we hold any track of one another in this dark of night? Is there some way we might escape? Without a certainty, we might look out of place and we may never be met by any means to suffice.' 'What do you mean? We only have to grab a hold of our clothes and walk slowly towards the lights out there. You'll see once we're in there, don't worry. Nothing may stop us now. We'll be safe.' He assured his fellow as they walked. Soon enough, as he had said, through the night, they found a way down, but it had been in the light. A bloating pair of corpses seemed to raise themselves rather ill. Most were fattened past and beyond repair, but they were just as static as they had been. What separated them from the ones above, other than their giant bellies were their thin and long arms which pushed forward out of their chests. Clearly they had been of the same species as the ones below. 'Look, there's one of the stars following us. I think it lives.' Indeed it had looked that way, with the fact that it reacted to their tones and their voices, it could not be doubted that it had been aware of them as well as it appeared to have taken a liking to them. For, it seemed to bounce and dangle when it approached but kept the distance, as if not to disturb or fear the madness of what had been upright. Clearly, there had been something much morose when their likes had met an active trader. It was the only one down there, in their depths, from the insides of the cave. Much more than what they had seen, there was an entry through the bridge. Only one remained and at some sort of in-between the cave and the other entrance, there had been this living thing, which seemed very much empty headed. For the looks on its face had been even worse than the ones which laid on both the corpses outside and the ones below which had been fatter. It seemed like it had taken a saddened appearance for its likes had waited there for far too long. And no one came. Its nose had almost gone from being crooked to having fallen off. Its eyes had a few flaps which blinded what had been of the holes. Even as they approached and they wondered whether they would know of be aware of anything of the sorts, it would be cruel to think otherwise. They were to be uneven through their disguise of madness and creakingly aware, they seemed to be out there already, past him. 'It's sad, isn't it? I think I would've liked to browse its tiny shop and see what it had gathered.' Though he might've had only stones and small pockets of orange filled glowing blocks, they were rather peculiar and interesting in nature. This could've been an opportunity in the least. But there, it seemed that they would be driven to it. What appeared to be no man, but statue, no creep, but the beast. It seemed, at least from the appearance. From the dark, in the array, after the bridge there seemed to be a system of stairs which lead below. It would be a long descent, the likes of which only lead to some trouble. But there, in the middle of the chamber below, surrounded by light which came from nowhere else, other than itself, there had been a statue. It held something akin to eight arms, all of which had been rotten from their very sauced and connected only through the bone which kept them interconnected to the rest of the body. Its forms became even clearer as they started receding to the bottom. There the heat and the cold had gone through mad cycles and changed their effects and temperatures for every second which passed. 'Should we have gone this way instead of trying to help them out there?' 'I don't think they'll need our help any longer, unless you count us to murder what other defenceless bodies lay out there. You know how it turned the last time, right? Why are you?' Why was he looking at it all of the sudden? It was almost as if he heard something again. First the corpses, now this. Of course it wasn't his fault that he had been driven to this point, but the least he could do was to attempt to be normal. It was there though that it spoke. 'Come closer.' He almost strapped himself for a sprint in the dark. Something even the star feared. It seemed like their glowing friend stood and waited adjacent to their way back. By no way would it approach whatever the statue in the middle of the room was. As clear as its features had been, it took the stance of a warrior and stood repugnantly aware. Each arm held a body which wasn't there at all, and as soon as he saw his fellow stop, he caught up with him and saw why. It held a body which had been similar to the ones above them, from whence they had came. Both of them looked at one another after staring at the corpses and knew, instinctively that they weren't there when they had first looked at the statue. Neither was the pile of corpses upon which he stood. No, that had been something close to a rounded base of stone. Its face had been deformed, its teeth sharp and protruding. A flat had lay at the back but domed above, with a chin which had been broken and eyes which had been blinded. The details of the blood coming into the form of stone had been minute detailed. They had wondered whether or not this had been a living thing once which had been cursed and turned into stone. For no amount of detail could be spared like that. Its muscles bulged and chest unbidden, in the back nothing was hidden. Both of their gazes revealed the broken side which had reigned inside. There had been ribs missing, organs and even a good chunk of it. Inside of that hole resided another one of the corpses which had been killed outside. Most importantly, it had been headless, which had spoken enough of their actions there. 'What does it say?' This time he seemed to have believed it, for some reason. But he hadn't even told him it had spoken to him. Was he expecting it so curiously or had it been a guess? 'It's silent now, I think.' 'So, it had spoken to you before, would that be correct?' 'Indeed it would, but what do you think that means?' 'I don't know, just leave me be, I can't think of it, I don't want to be bothered by voices again.' But it had happened then, whether he wanted it to happen or not. There was only one man affected by this ordeal, which made little sense as it had barely left any room to wonder. What was it saying then? It had spoken. Its mouth suddenly started moving as if it had been living the entire time and hadn't been a statue or the sort. From its grasp, the stone texture had been lost and instead of it, there had been revealed some kind of skin-like, blood dripping, malignant form which almost burst bulging in the form of a muscle. The other pairs of muscles seemed to start at it again, going through their dreadful motions as they paired with one another in their dreadful manner. A cruel thing came as the leap out of the pile had seemed to release the corpses which had lain in its giant hands. It grabbed both of them as if they were nothing more but the equivalents of the bodies it had thrown away and seemed to stare. 'Do you hear me now? Would this work for you in the same manner as your fellow had listened?' His mouth was bloody because his teeth had been misaligned. They looked like tusks and sometimes, they appeared to have pierced through his big, bloody lips. It pulled out a tongue which had been long and forked, attempting to lick one of their faces only to feel nothing there. They had been expressionless and tasteless. It didn't matter as much, since, despite their struggles and their so-called advantages in their peculiar encounter, they had been too weak to escape his grasp. 'What do you want of us? I understand you've spoken to him, but why are you holding us?' 'Because I have watched you closely, ever since you have decided to seek refuge in this plane of mine. Do you not think I have not realised who you are? Have you undertaken the fact that I'm aware that you are nothing alike them by any measurement whatsoever? I know of you and of your place, invaders. You may have joined their ranks but I know better than to trust you.' 'So what do you want of us?' 'Servitude until my needs and requirements are met. Afterwards, you shall be set free to roam wherever you want and do whatever might please either of you. I give you this deal, serve me or face the consequences of your actions.' 'Was this a trick all along then? Were you pretending to be out of stone?' 'Indeed it had been but now, it's not the time to question any of it. You're to listen and obey. Neither one of you shall be suffered here with that amount of insolence whatsoever. Do you understand?' Both nodded, with little resistance now and not much reluctance to do what he asked for. After all, his thick fingers had seemed to be so wrapped around their tiny necks that his grasp had only held three of them around, as its full hand might've crushed them whole. Suddenly, a burst of growth had started. It had been time to be whole. As the corpses around them started to thin, right about the pile, the upper area which had been empty, around the upper side of his arms, as well as the hole from his back had started being filled by the mass of meat which lay on the ground. Even his mouth tears and bloody nose had come back into one piece, leaving only the approach which had been laid. 'You've already made me a rather pleasant service, in offering me the corpses outside. Whether it was intentional or not, that's irrelevant. Do you accept my deal or will you perish here, alone? Their time out there runs short and this decision of yours shall affect them in the same kind of manner.' 'Will you offer them the same deal?' 'Perhaps I will, little man, perhaps they'll accept where you have refused after I would've presented them what the alternative is. They all seem peculiarly aware and full on themselves, as if they'd be immortal or near never-ending. A much more than a supreme kind of agony shall be inflicted on them at the end.' 'Wait, wait, before you do anything rash, you must know.' His neck had been grainy now. This kind of pain was obviously reminiscent of what had happened before, the likes of which had been even less dreadful than this. But never had they been offered the chance. Never would they get it again. 'They're trying to resurrect them, your servants.' 'And I have no need of it. Do you think they had never been awake before? Do you think I would've slaughtered them all for no reason or that I have lost my power? Ignorant little insect, a mere snap of my fingers had resulted in all of them being put down. Another snap had burst the mass of my body, so I would look like nothing more than some abandoned idol. What makes you think it wasn't my will alone which had guided you into the dark

to join me?’ ‘Then it is hopeless.’ Or it had been, it would’ve been, if their minds weren’t already set. Both of them seemed to be out of options now, and in the end, they had given in. Once they had been released from the grasp, they had knelt in front of him. It was hopeless. ‘Who are you? What should we call you?’ ‘Orogh, Myorgh, Ghor, unnamed, call me whatever pleases you more, for I have no need to be called by anything in particular. For I will know if I am called, and I shall heed your call and feed your desire to suffer.’ ‘What do you want of us now? What shall we do?’ ‘Return to the land and start preparing the traps. This need for some kind of resurrection of my servants is benign. It is a mere play with the bodies of the jesters which only entertain me. Now, I have a real play at hand and I shall not easily dismiss it.’ They felt as if they had been guided rather than forced. ‘Walk now, we’re a long way to get there, exactly where we need to.’ ‘What do you intend to do when they see us together?’ ‘They may not.’ He spoke with some amount of certainty at least, as if he knew what was destined to happen. The dark would extend through until there could be something less of a need. Yet the lights out there, of which they inquired. ‘Those are not mine, they belong to some other entity who planted them there. You may’ve seen their long poles, which look like some kind of protrusions from the ground. And they hold their eyes glowing only to look and observe my plane.’ ‘Why haven’t you destroyed them then?’ ‘Why should I bother about them? I have invited the fiend into my world myself. I wouldn’t have been such a great guest if I were to destroy his gifts.’ ‘Even if his gifts intrude on your privacy?’ ‘They cannot see me at all that is one of their major and only flaws they seem to have. I am invisible for their giant eyes, and little of everything else might concern me. If he decided that this sudden arousal is great enough to wager for a return, let it be so. I wouldn’t turn his kind away, nor would I stop him from observing.’ The way ahead, which lay, alas, there were many corpses in their path. One slight extension of their sight had been granted for their likes alone, they could barely see through the dark now but it had been enough. Enough at least, to look at the so called corpses and notice how they would grow. ‘Nothing certainly dies here unless I will it so. Though they may be standing flaccidly, unerect on the ground, with their guts spilled out, they will drag themselves back together until awakened again.’ ‘Has anyone of them managed to raise any of your servants back to live? Have they returned to the living such as we are?’ ‘But little man, you’re not alive. Long ago, though it may have been, you have died. And your kind alone, I’ve seen before. There were many of your, that I have looked from my kingdom in my quiet days. When I had been bored, I had the pleasure and the certainty to know where to look for, this kind of specific thing. It seems likely that I knew of you all along, of your torment and peril, that’s why I have called you here.’ ‘You mean the belt?’ ‘It was all mine, indeed it has been. We’re not in a box now that had been nothing more but an after image of the portal. That thing now lies in an abandoned planet, in an empty universe, as something useless that, by now, it had been broken apart. In its place, there are only skeletons left, which are watching, waiting as their gray stars are dying out.’ ‘Why haven’t you brought the others? And why haven’t you?’ ‘That’s enough, there’s no need for you to raise your voice little thing!’ His giant arm had already flowed forward, grabbing a hold of his tiny neck and pushing a tiny array of strong fingers through. He was holding in something which had almost gone through to choke him by accident. By then, his comrade turned and unaware of what was to be done, he laid frozen and watched. ‘Good, I have no intention of harming either of you know, but even if I had, I could always bring you back to life. To your question, here’s what I may say. Most of your kin had already flown and passed away before they could’ve been caught. And those you have encountered, in the guard chamber had little interest to me. I have plans to kidnap and inhabit my world once it's finished.' A release had been quid. It was sudden then, but he had felt what had been a loss of breath, which forced him to lie a few seconds on the ground. Though there wasn't that distinguishable mouth or nose, oxygen had been drawn in. Something in it had been abhorrent. Worse than that, its stench was that of roaming dread, the scent of death was near. 'Look at the corpses.' 'A side effect I would like you to inquire about. I have placed the corpses you have brought to me back in place. You should recognise the familiarity of the place we're currently residing in. Though you may no want to look for long, there they are.' One single being made of that pile, guts flung together. It had been floating in the air. Many of their eyes were glowing with some fake kind of red radiance which only left room for wonder. Under which control had it been? Though they may have been given free will, there was no doubt that this Okham had eyes which were just as red as theirs had become. And he had been master over all, by the likes of it. 'What do you intend to do with them?' 'I shall do nothing. Why, they are my jesters, their sole existence is to entertain. I will only find it rather faithful if they were too kind to my guests. Just follow it and do what it says.' He had disappeared then, right, beyond any kind of sense or sound. There wasn't any trace which would've even signaled any kind of certainty that they had been there. It had looked mightily awful by the likes alone. It had been so. 'Great, as it does happen that we certainly wanted to be pushed around by a pile of floating corpses.' All of which laughed and grinned in unison as they said so, making sure to add to the length of their noses and the grins they bore. It seemed like some bizarre glum had been soaked there in blood, one of which could only grow aghast. 'Should we listen to it now?' 'It doesn't sound right, does it? First that thing below its depths and now this creature made out of the corpses you've made. It just doesn't sit well with me at all.' 'Don't blame it on me now, I've had nothing to do with it.' 'Haven't you? Are you certain of that? I'm quite sure, more than enough that you're responsible for it at least in some. It wasn't I who created all those corpses.' 'Can't obey, must say.' That had seemed rather unwell. It went away without waiting and without warning them at all, losing every bit of interest there had been to them. It seemed to have lost itself into the dark, or at least would've completely done so if it weren't for the fact that they had this fraction to see it. Not to mention that it had been tall and wide enough not to miss. 'Follow it before it escapes and creates more trouble than there needs to be.' 'But what shall we tell them if we're being seen together?' 'We'll lie and say this happened not because of us but because of some ill effect which had been beyond our power. Don't forget what that Orogh said. He'll be watching us move through this place, not to mention that if we don't play his game, we might end up in his pile.' Their will was quite beyond the need to defile. But both could see how filthy the grass had come to me. It was miserably desaturated, being as close to a yellow with each strand. Not to mention the insect and the likes of the dirt below it which had been softer than expected, and much more tainted that it had seemed to be. It was unclear whether or not it had been anything resembling the living thing from which floated now. But either way, they followed, unable to deny that it was greeted with open arms. Both of them stopped in their tracks. 'Look, it had managed what we have failed. Those servants are rather close to being alive. They're moving and bowing to their master.' 'But won't they just be absorbed in that manner? Under what circumstance will we wait and see? What's there to be?' It had looked as if it would be unclear, there was nothing there to fear for either one that looked obscure. But they bowed again and dance, as they had been avoided afterwards. It seemed that it had to be their default position and their play when they weren't given orders. How unproductive of them. Creatures which stood there without a mind and without order to work by, they were merely tainted in the hand. The first reaction that came to either one of them was to attempt to find the nearest rock and to bash one of their heads in. It seemed like they had taken to song, a morbid one, from flutes and small instruments which had been on them for the entire time. 'Quickly, follow before it goes away. We cannot lose this resurrector now, in all likelihood, we must be seen as trackers in order to further our trust to them.' It was clear then, that they had been lost. Surrounded by a few of them, with little of the ill intention of being hurt or bringing it to them, as for the time being, most seemed passive and reluctant to hurt either one. Mostly, it had been the obscure which had tainted their likes. As they stopped from their songs and seemed to be as curious as tiny children, looking to touch and to react to the strange formed dark ones in front of them. First the reluctance came, with either one being reluctant to touch. It could be dangerous after all. It seemed like these ones were too peculiar, too much for mere observation to be attained. Inside their own minds they looked like obscure men, or men who had been obscured. On their side, it couldn't have been farther than what they were opinionated for the likes. Being alive hadn't made them less repulsive or more bearing. They had been peculiar and wrong, being more of an annoyance than anything else. 'Let us follow, we must be heard.' There it had stopped the likes of being heard. It was a full stop in the dark, the silence was there. No one sang, not a noise had been made. Fifty meters away, there it had been. One of the elders, walking slowly from a light point to another, as for him, there could be no way, no possible sight into the great dark. It had been obscured to the point of being near-sightedly blind. They reeked even more. As he seemed to notice, the scent turned him towards a different direction. One more step, or almost a step into the air, as it floated nearer to him, driving the elder farther into the dark. That strangeness was breaking up. It was peculiar, being there, after the song had stopped. But once he had been fairly away, the lights from which he had come and went towards had been stomped. Not by a few, but by the servants which had been brought back to life. They had crawled like slimy things, which grasped for the base, crawled towards the top and started trying to devour the eyes. Light died in them that moment. There was a shake which receded into the ground, not to mention that on both sides, those bled far beyond anything natural. It was painful to watch, but even worse when they both realised what might happen to the elder. In the direction he had been walking towards, there would be nothing waiting for him. He was walking in a sea of sitting bodies, numbed by the likes of waiting. In his tracks, there came this oratory of disgust, the stench of which aroused life in every sitting corpse. He was there. It felt like they were watching and old man who had been affected by dementia who was trying to find his way back home. He lay on his knees, feeling the ground with his hands, pushing forth and calling for something there. No one laid in reach, at least any who might hear or even dare to make an attempt to help him. As bizarrely as it had looked, this was the loner who had been abandoned. The lost soul, the lamb which was to be used for sacrifice, which only begged the question for either one of them, could he die? How certain were they on themselves and on this kind of strange existence they had been set forth in? It was unclear whether or not they had the power to kill them, or merely Ogoth, who had been their captor alone. He more than proved that he could harm both of them whenever he wanted that he could kill them and have them lay in the same pile as the corpses they had created. Worse than that, it had seemed that they could be taken and kidnapped, bashed and forced to obey. They looked only laid forth a commentary on his being. 'Look at how he's trying to get away. They've already managed to surround him now, there's no escape, and he belongs to that pile now.' 'How could you say such a horrible thing? Isn't he one of ours now? Shouldn't we try at least to do something to help him?' 'It's pointless, and even more, we need to see what happens next. If his life ends and he perishes here, so may we. And that's the most dangerous and horrendous thing which could happen to us. We can't trust this, not a single moment of it, do you understand?' 'Because, if we do we'll end up in the same circumstance as he does.' 'I'll be there to have your back.' The man interrupted as he watched. There was no pause to it as they leaped on the kneeling elder and started piling over him. Despite their coming attempts and the way they tried pushing onto him, there was no dreadful strike which penetrated. It had been a jest, through which they only managed to pound him farther into the ground and trap him there. For that there was no escape, the cage they have made was both made out of bodies, bones and the very dirt below him. The pile flew and sprayed a liquid over them, as to melt the ones on the top. They left the elder unaffected but the chemicals in the liquid had managed to create a pseudo-looking pile of dirt, which had the texture of the jesters lying forth. It was still distinguishable from the normal ground, but there wasn't any sign of an approaching daylight. Blessed by the dark, this seemed to happen everywhere. Light after light started dying off in the distance and one by one they have picked and trapped them there. They both waited to see whether or not they could suffocate. Even as they approached they could hear the heart beats and the circumstance in which the elder was. He was alive. 'They cannot die, and neither can we. Don't you see what suffering awaits us?' 'Only if we disobey, look, it doesn't have to be any different from serving does it?' 'Only that it's from this point forth, and it may never end. Can't you understand that? That's our trap, we're here to obey for as long as it pleases him.' 'And what's the alternative then? Lying in the ground as they do? Would you rather have that or look over his servants? Look around you, they already started waking up.' 'You don't understand anything, do you now? Do you? Why is he keeping us alive? He wanted to use us to gain their trust, but look, he trapped every single one of them, why do you think that is? What's our purpose then if he's already taken care of every single one of them? They're beneath the ground and we're here. Why?' 'That is a good enough question.' Orogth said as he appeared. He had looked like a blank shadow, with a gray-like outline seemingly differentiating him from the blankness of the dark. It seemed that he had been even taller, more horrendous looking as a shade than in his form. His teeth had been outlined as well but they didn't move as he spoke. Rather than it being him in person, this had looked like an apparition. 'I have a task for you. There's one out there whom I have left alone. Neither one of my servants will have approached him by any means, he's to be avoided by everyone but the two of you.' 'What's your intention then?' 'He needs to serve me in a specific task. In the depths of the sky, there's a small nest floating there, held by strings that cannot be cut. He need to be used as bait to draw out the parasite that's been infesting my kingdom and who had used my servants as nothing more than sustenance. Do this favour and I may reward you by some means. Have I made myself clear now? Or must I say something of the vile?' The words didn't bode well, but they seemed to have their visions extended. Not in terms of length or how far they might see, but somewhere in the distance, that almost flying hive out there had been revealed and came under the likes of a higher light. It had been dim but they could see those long and giant limbs coming out of its robust form. They could drag and pick small humanoids from the distance, throwing nothing out of it as they were consumed. Couldn't he have cut the strings that kept the hive in place? Why they to be used and how many things were even resided in there? It was unclear but they obeyed out of fear. Something about it made them feel as if they resigned and the idea of there being some tainted creature hiding in it made it much worse than it had to be. Even in the distance they looked at those small attempts of jests which happened. Their teeth must've been anything but sharp, since it rather looked as if they were unable to cut deeply through the roughness of the nets which held the hive there. Moreover, they bled out of their gums and out of their mouth, furiously grasping for air since they had been unable to strike for anything else. Those poor servants, no, slaves were forced into pain, only as a show, for them to see how hard it had been for them to try taking the hive down. 'Should we call for help then? It seems like this is something we may not be able to handle alone. At least not with the likes of us.' 'No, we'll get through this together. I don't care for the others as much, but if it does turn out we're unable to die.' 'He never said it, do you understand? He never said we're unable to die. At least I don't think he did. We may be hurt from interacting with someone else who may reside in here with us. The same rules may apply to it as well.' 'I trust him, this Ogoth, I think he's right. We must find another way to trap it at least, perhaps you'll find that it may starve forever but never die off if the likes of it just happen to be true. What do you say about it? May we at least attempt to trap it?' There it had been, its head remained. One of which grasped for air, which seemed to bear the sight of grim and of madness, of evil, deceitful agony of form. It was hard to look at its giant head, the box-like elongated in every direction head, with its giant eyes and gaping mouth. From the inside of its mouth, there were plenty of meat straps which held it in place, which reigned just around its sharp teeth. Its mere sight was damning enough to freeze those poor souls which had attempted to cut off the roots of its nest. That had alarmed the being, and as it had, suddenly from inside its big chest, there came the limbs. Long and sharp, they came and picked up eight of the ones who came with their jests and as it happened, it started eating them one big one in front of them. From where it stood, it seemed like, close it, at least, likely that it could see both of them. For the first time, it waited there, with its head out, caught as if it had never seen any visitors whatsoever. Something peaked its curiosity, at least, so it seemed, since it got out, with its thin body and waited outside its hive. What a peak-like body, it had, thought, rather, for its big head. Two legs and two weak arms lay there, pushing against the ground as it held out. Despite the biological similarity between them, there were things that belonged to one another from which the conclusion could be drawn that they were alike. Obvious overly degenerate forms aside, the burst chest from which the many tendril-like limbs came out from, they were somewhat alike. That had been it. But its dark skin and the hairs, the stench as it approached, the way it grasped for air as if tired had been a dead giveaway of its mad condition and the state it had been in. Just what had this being been? What was it there for? 'This might be dangerous, don't you think it might be a good time to stop. I think we are in its hearing range. Just follow the magnitude of my voice.' 'Listen here.' He croaked another word but it seemed to be pale. Even though it had been dark and there was only the sight in the dark, mostly as it had seemed to be the likes of looking at a dim object, he appeared to have gotten its full attention there. 'What do you want?' It said with the same magnitude, if not higher of a tone, with a mighty indifference which hadn't lasted. Something unnecessarily obtuse seemed to be gone there. Unevenly aware of what was going on between the two of them, there came the following. 'You've come here to disturb my stay, haven't you?' By now, as of the time it spoke, three of its gut-limbs stared out and seemed to have been used for support. Just how had that thing managed to fit inside the hive at all? At least now it appeared as if it had been two or three times the likes of its own nest. Unless there was something which had compiled itself inside its own body, there had been something unnatural happening to it. Dreadfully spoken, as well as it had been paranoid or devoid of many emotions, it spoke. 'If you will, would you come inside my nest and speak to me as a guest? I may not be aware of what's your reason for disturbing my silence but I may at least get something out of it, wouldn't you think?' Even though they had little trust, they took the bait and followed. It drooled as it looked behind, not saliva but a thick yellowish cover over the oily red blood that seemed to spread from inside its mouth. That had been rotting, it seemed, from one the many carcasses which had been stuck between or had been impaled in its teeth. Much of its ill nature came out. The daftness of hatred had seemed to be bizarre, as they stepped on the invisible bridge which had been laid inside the middle region of the airshaft which went to the entrance of its repulsing kind of lair. The connection between them seemed to have faded as their likes met. Inside this lair, they were met by him, who was standing quite aroused by their presence. It looked like his body had turned inside and remained there, for the likes of which there stood a single mass behind his head.

It looked like a growing benign growth from the side of his head, which moved and pushed as he waited for something to be said. It would've been quite fitting to start with the reason for them being there. But it would've been just as dangerous to say that they were there to drive him out or engulf his lair into pure blistering destruction. 'Well, we were sent here.' 'By whom?' His eyes turned, almost anemone, from one side to another, like two creeping wheels rather than the irises it bore. They held no reflection and seemed more likely to be the kin of empty circles, pushed inside and bred for dread. No colour laid in them, but the lack of ink seemed to be discouraging of the fact that it may have had a soul. It seemed unlikely though. There was something in his breath which was corrupt, in the way it shook in the mass behind its back. The dreadful thing had no form of its own but chose to grin and do its malignant dance behind, as if it had been hiding something. One, rather large pool laid underneath it, and it took no amount of light or vision to get what it had been. The smell of death had been a dead giveaway. He was bathing in blood, but somehow kept a clean appearance rather than it be tainted or dirtied by it. Or it had been only his body and limbs which had been dirtied, leaving his head much more than clean, in which case, it had been disturbing in any case. 'We're cannot say who it was, only that you're not welcome here any longer.

You've eaten too many of them already and this lair of yours needs to go.' All of the sudden his wheels turned towards the other one. They were indistinguishable from the many layers of texture which lay in his lair. Not only that but they were silent enough for him not to notice or be aware of their exact location there. For all intensive purposes they could be nothing more than figments of his mind. That disturbed him, much more than being unaware of what had been going on, looking back at it with fear and disgust, at the time they had entered, he had been unaware if they actually entered his lair or if he had been thinking of it all along. There was no way of knowing. 'But I must know who it was, the one who asked for my exit, for the one who wants me out. I've done nothing but feed my hunger in this place. What does he want of me? To leave? Where?' 'We don't know this. Where.' 'What my partner meant was, could you not return from where you came from? From whatever pit or hole, of rock from the thinness of space you may've appeared?' 'I've always been here, for as long as I remember. Perhaps not within this lair but I have dwelled for far too long on these planes. I've seen their emptiness far between and for as long as I have come and rested upon their fields. It is you who do not belong in here, strangers. Beings of dark that cannot be seen at night, stalkers and disturbers. I should have to swallow you both.' It was quick, that he opened himself from underneath the skin flops and their many folds of meat and the entire ceiling above them had been encompassed by his many limbs and giant-like arms. To them they had been big and meaty, and in one strike, they could be trapped in there. But instead of jumping or indeed, trying to do as he had said, he waited. Both of them did as well, in this pseudo madness of a standoff. Neither moved, nor did he still think they weren't there? They were mere voices and he had little of a clue, if anything that they might be there by any means. Instead of brushing it off and trying to sneer at the nothingness which spoke to him, he calmed himself down and suddenly curled back into the form he had laid in before. 'Are you still here?' 'We are here, we haven't left yet.' 'Must I abandon my lair then and leave?' 'It would only have to be a chance of pace, that's all, as long as you don't build them at here, and I don't see any problem with you keeping the march.' He had been bumped on the shoulder. Not even he had been aware of what he meant. It was clear enough that they were unsure whether or not he could be left out there, or even be safe enough as to enjoy his freedom in the dark. Unclear, as to say, he pushed himself past them, like some creeping mass, revealing the many legs which hid underneath him. The speed had been inhumane and as he had been gone, the lair turned into a mass of blotched skin and pestilence took over. 'We need to get out, now, before it crashed down on us. We'll be trapped if we don't!' They went out by mere chance, as they stumbled and fell through a bridge which hadn't been there anymore. The thing which had been left behind looked like a growing pool which moved and lived on its own. Just what abomination had been given life now? Everything had been a mess, by the looks of it, and daylight showed no sign of returning anytime sooner. Now the plains had been inhabited by hordes of corpses, flying ones as well, running abominations and living pools of dread. Nothing had been right, not in the least, without a chance or a slim of a sign that it could return to the way it had been by the time they had come back. But there it was, the pitch had seemed to have taken a tool which had been way too unbearable to be left alone unattended to its own likes. As the day had return, the sky and the land had been anything but properly lit. What had come laid only as a gray light, which seemed to give the impression of some mist. Certainly it had been better than storing at the pitch, but now? Now it looked as if they had been the only two dark ones laid there on the fields. The rest of the servants had been brought to life as they were resilient. Now their corpse overlords floated above them, hovering and pushing to a flight only to look and make sure that they were still working. Now it came back to slavery, in their sight. They worked hard, cutting and chopping, building structures and small houses out of wood. Small altars laid there as well, with their tiny frames having been put in place as to glorify their strange god. 'Look, it's him, the exact form, the shape he's appeared to us, in person!' They approached and seemed to have observed him standing there, no, posing for them as to be guilt tripped into making even more altars for their deity. This Ogoth had little consideration for them and it had been strange, the way they show their own reluctance and sadness in doing it. For someone who should've been used to the amusement they had settled down and crashed to a stop. 'Why are you servants unhappy?' 'Should I be concerned with their likes? It's only that their minds are limited and now that they have to pay tribute and show some responsibility towards their creator that you're disturbed. Pay little heed to them, as you may be aware. I'm here to be served by everyone, and everyone's turn may come one day.' 'Including us as well? Does that mean we'll have to build you a shrine or something similar to that? Because that's now what we signed up for, we haven't even asked to be brought here.' 'Little by little you may come to know that the circumstances aren't important, only that you may serve. Though I might add that you have managed yourselves quite well, as that hive had been gotten rid off entirely and no longer disturbs me in its current form. On the contrary as well, I'm pleased by the way it looks and the way it's scaring the servants that come into contact with it. They are kept on their toes and alive, they're given a chance to run out of fright rather than be picked one by one without a chance to react. 'When may we speak of something of our own then? If you don't mind, your Excellency, we're only trying to return, I think, to our previous form.' But that had been impossible and both of them knew it. With little consciousness left in either of their minds, they had already been far too gone from humanity to ever be able to look for some return. Either way, it had to be faced. 'You may never return to the way you've been. Now that you've come into my plane, you have left something behind, can you guess what it had been?' As he said so, another apparition which looked exactly like him appeared from their behind. It wasn't a replica or a mirror image of himself but a rather uglier, more brutish kind of copy of him. His thicker fingers approached with their long, cut-throatiest nails and seemed to have scratched at one of their arms. The cut had managed to reveal that there had been nothing inside, which explained just so much. No blood, no bone, nothing but a blanket of dark which rolled around a gap. It felt empty, both of them felt emptier right then, knowing that they had been filled with nothing. They were the ghastly apparitions which roamed there, they had been the intruders. It had become relevant as they had become aware of the reason for which that tainted thing couldn't see them in the dark. How would they be any more distinguishable from the dark if they had been made out of no matter? 'It must be hard to accept now, but that's the only truth that belongs to you.' The peeled arm seemed to have come back together, now that they understood. There were so many other questions to ask. 'What will happen to them if they're left there in their pits for too long?' 'They will disappear, it will be as if they never existed, unless you come in.' Suddenly the real one came off and started walking towards them. Now that the illusion was nowhere to be seen, it had been way too close to comfort that it approached. 'Well, as I have said, you'll have your use and if you do it well, you may get to live again.' It was clear enough, to say the least. Clearly, there weren't any words to explain what dread had caused them to accept this deal as it came. 'As long as you'll try making them accept my deal and serve in my land, I shall allow them to live unbidden so they may not vanish there in the dark.' 'Wait, were we not at risk of fading away when the world had been encompassed by the pitch?' This question only made Ogoth grin as he pointed at one of their arms. It took a lot of wonder to be hinted at but it was clear enough that they had been weakened. How else one of them would be hurt, and even more than that, how else could one of them be cut in such a disturbing manner? 'Neither of you is immortal here, you may fade away entirely unless you give in and make do with what I tell you. We wouldn't want something like that to happen to either of you, would we? Not after you've been as obedient as you were. Just look at it, look at the planes. They're empty, quiet, and dull. I need someone to help me build a kingdom so I may reign upon it. And that's where you and they shall come in. This is what I needed, some new hands, and some visions to guide me in my block.' There seemed to be some disquiet in him as well as there was in them. For different reasons at that, which hadn't made anything of what they had to deal with any easier for them, as it looked likely that they would have to tirelessly work for his pleasure alone? 'Well, if you would look onto this, so far I have come up with the greatest city that ever seemed to reign over it. The main eight towers will be places here, interconnected, separating every section from it. Inside, I shall place every kind of building and surround it with a wall of woe so no stranger might invade or come in unannounced.' But there were flaws in the design, with most likely one being the fact that this world or this place would be wholly unmet by standards. It would be empty, with the likes of servants who knew nothing else other than supreme obedience. 'What will you do about the emptiness at hand? There are naught out there but your servants whom may only do whatever you desire and nothing else but what you ask of them. Most of them are heartless only know obedience as their first assignment. 'Are we any different then? We were soldiers before, grunts, we were sent to our deaths and we obeyed. We killed without any kind of thought and before this, before we were trapped here, we had been trapped in another place, remember? Forced to kill our own brethren as they had been brought back to life in their disgusting forms, so, how are any better than them? What makes us any less ill than they are? It's meaningless, can't you see?' 'Enough with your petty thoughts, for I am already here with a resolve. I will open another gate when the time comes and entrap as many souls from other planes. And they will be men and women of the same race as you have been and I have witnessed you like before the change. They shall make good subjects after I shall wipe off their minds and cruelly force them to live into my world. You shall aid me in this and make their lives decent as only you will have known otherwise.' They seemed to come and follow this deity as he walked with the many rolls of his plans laid in his every hand. He held them tightly as he looked unruly at what he had passed down. It looked obviously decent in his mind, but the wonder came again.

Just what was he? He was no god by any means, this dark fool, the filth of form he had been. It was only that his might was limited, otherwise, they would all be dead and there would be no need for him to make others do his filth of a construction for him. And then there was that. The time had come for them to be sent out there and start digging them out in order to convince them to join their side. It was uneventful as it started. One single dig had started and it seemed like most of what they had found had been a few of those jester-like creatures standing on a blanket. By now, it looked no lesser of a being, but some kind of smooth black silky-like veil which moved shrouded and almost near-formless. It creped away and started fading, unable to raise itself for as long as it stood there. 'We're late, it seems. I don't think it may return to its previous being any longer. It's too weak to do anything any longer, I even doubt it can think for itself now.' It had been sad and pointless, as they had been sent out there to recruit what seemed to be just part of what they had been. The light never came and every time they stood around the mass of graves, it seemed that only these fragments seemed to have been freed. Some had human-like parts attached, like heads which had been flattened or in the forms of bumps which lay on top of their silk-like veils. Others had something which would part with limbs, as to why they were abandoned in there, it had been pointless. 'We're the only ones left, unfortunately. Doesn't it seem sad? We almost ended up in the same way as they had, just look at how frail I've become.' One quick pull almost ripped out his entire artery, which went just along. He was uninterested in that, at least now they had something to look back at. It hadn't served as a reason to recruit those which had been buried, but a warning. A warning of what would happen if they failed to do what they had been tasked with. 'May we correct the likes of it then?' 'Well, what else might we do?' It was there that they would start it. A field had been plain enough to raise the likes of his city. So many towers lay there, or would lie there, which made both of them wonder just what his obsession was. They had looked stranger than the rest of the buildings it seemed. And there in the distance, it waited, as he appeared with the plans laid outright, with the base being placed already, the wooden planks and the stones laid in the way. Perhaps they had been wrong and this Ogoth had something to him there. Doubting him would be nigh-deadly, not to mention of the chance of overkill. They could be crushed, as a matter of fact, they might've been placed underneath one of those falling blocks, the stacks of wood and of tormented fire which fell. Not only that, but they had been given iron and the means to forge, nothing too special but the likes of something nigh-primitive to have their likes with. 'I shall give you the opportunity to prove yourselves, the freedom to shape this place as you desire as long as you do not deviate from what I have made. You're to work on it while I shape the life here as I so desire. As it would only be fitting for perfectly shaped being to live into my city, without the repulsiveness of the jest they had been forced into.' And he had been bored by their likes, and the ones that had been created for the mere task of bringing a jest seemed to have become saddened themselves. More so, they had looked depressed and night suicidal by the looks of which it had become clear to either soldier. 'Do you suppose they had been dead only because they attempted to commit suicide? It seems likely so, being unwanted but unable to die. He may have kept them alive, at least, we should know what happens if we attempt anything.' 'But we can die, don't you understand? We're not tied to this place, we could fade, if anything happens, that's our way out.

But do you want to do it or do you wish to get through it? Get a damn hold on yourself and don't become too docile.' But his flesh had been just as weak and he seemed rather sick, even for someone which bore the same puffy appearance. It came to be that they both seemed to look that way, instead of being rather formed, small long hairs came out of them. It looked like mold tubes coming out. It felt grim, repulsing but no one would look at them so no one would know the shame of what it'd be like. First, it hadn't been important, they had been tasked with trying to raise the towers in the frontal region of the marked areas they had made. Sad being approached and seemed to have either been faced or to have come out of their own desire to create, now, it was seemingly clear what was going on.

Unclear to them was why. Their features had been crooked, their fingers were benign and fat, too fat for any dexterity to be had, but they would make for the grunt work. At first they came and wrapped themselves around the tall base which would make the framework of the first tower. That fell. 'I don't think we should go with this, the towers I mean. We should scratch them off the plans and replace them. They do not fit the city by any means. I think it would even be detrimental to what we'll build here.' 'Then let us call him and bring the news.' They shouted and as soon as he happened to appear, those smaller servants seemed to cower and pretend they weren't there, or rather, that they hadn't been alive. It was a mere jest, the one which had been mastered a long time ago. It worked, by simple means, and by the fact that he was not paying any mind to his mindless servants. 'We refuse to build the towers, they will not fit with the city.' 'You refuse to go on with my command? By what means do you do so? What shall we replace it with if your desire overrides mine?' They looked confused, rather, at the question of how freedom they would be granted. 'Leave the middle place, empty, but surrounded with the means of.' 'Death.' The other one had said it. But what, why did he mean to say by that? All of the sudden, the voice and appearance of this tyrant, this mad creature, this Ogoth had his interest pushed forth. 'What do you have in mind?' 'A pit that goes down in as far as to the dark core of this plane, so those whom may so desire to seek death shall be granted it with no question in mind.' 'The towers should be replaced but something like this would be too dangerous.' 'No.' Ogoth said, and as he looked and reconsidered, he pushed a breath which wiped the towers which had lay in the middle and replaced them with the magnitude of the pit. Its likes would be distastefully mad and rabid with its feel. Something had been tainted, especially as he said. 'Back away and look at how I may taint this plane.' He picked something from the ground, something out of his own shadow. It looked like he had just picked up a piece of it and turned it into a black disk which almost tainted all of his fingers. With a quick drop, then threw it on the ground and saw it expand. A few meters in and it melted, bursting through the ground. Everything shook at the mere force which had pushed itself deeper into the ground. Even the gray light of the day seemed to have been switching to a darker version of itself then back to normal as the thing went in. And in mere moments, they could see no dark, but look at how much his face had changed. This Ogoth looked plagued, his face had been thinned out by the drops of shadow which had fallen on his face. His small eye sockets had been dug in and seemed to have turned inside out as they had filled themselves with the harrowing taint which lay inside them. It dripped over as he drew in and jumped into his own pit, never to be seen moments after. Both the soldiers had been silent as they witnessed the event. Clearly, something was down there. Going by the lack of a smell of the one which laid in-between the gap of air and the very edge where the hole began, there had been a plethora of mad scents which didn't belong there. At least, some of them wouldn't have been met by any means whatsoever. It would be cruel to look away, no living man would look at it and say it with the hope of survival. 'This is it, isn't it? This is what you hoped for, a way out, right? You've managed to do it, damned bastard, you, tricking the deity itself. What now? Should we jump and be at loss? Are we going to die down there without hopes of making it through?' 'That had been the plan, right? Seeing how the dark kills us, what better way to go but down there, fighting our way through and struggling? I never wanted to be buried and left there to fade away, or even worse, return in some kind of mad state. You know just as well as I have, what happened to those people on the field that died. What happened to their bodies, no one deserves that, at least no one should be forced into that, let alone us. We're not human any longer, we're soulless and it is time.' With little thoughts of return and hope, both the soldiers leaped and disappeared. They left no trace, no wonder and nothing behind. Ogoth stood by the pit, looking down at what he had created. Perhaps it had been a sign of trickery of he had intended to do just how he had been pleased to go forth with it. Dreadfully looked down upon, he had been cruelly disgusted with the manner in which this pit looked. 'Shall you be touched again, be it as a mark of your torment as you lay here?' He spoke and as he said it, hair came out of the edges, long and rough and tilted and wide. Now these would prevent anyone whom tried to end themselves without and beyond his will. They could crush and push away even the harder bodies which came into contact or tried to attempt denying his will. And the plane had only gone worse because of it, for they dared anger him with the likes of ending themselves. What had remained of the grass turned into something which had hardened and was far too sharp to walk amongst unless you slowed down? Everywhere around his fields, the colour red stood out as his servants, saddened as they were, cut themselves amongst the sharp sheets and rooted plows of grass which came. Those things turned to something akin to blades and only those which had been set into hovering flights attempted that kind of surrender. It seemed like they had come. Only the fiend who had planted its hive and the hovering pile of corpses appeared amongst the tiny servants whom appeared in front of him. Everyone was there and they had been somewhat ready to serve in their own peculiar way. 'Since I have been betrayed, the task of building my city comes shall boil down to you, and understand this, colour me not as you please for I shall show no mercy and no easy way out this time. For those whom so desire to end themselves, know that there's no end to the servitude unless you desire a fate which be grimmer than what it is. Look at it, look at the plans and obey.' There had been room for interpretation but neither of them seemed to show reluctance to follow. It seemed like the chief who'd guide the founding of the city would be the very constructor of his own hive. He'd be allowed to live in it as a matter of fact and agony, in exchange. 'Let me invite more of my own race so we may inhabit your plane as well. Those creatures you've spoken of bringing here, I have listened to it and know. They are not to be trusted and you know more than anyone what would happen if they would be left here unattended. Such as they would bring war and destruction to what you've managed to create here.' 'And shall I bring many of your own to infest the lands and take easy prey? Do you think I would allow so many of you here to produce breeding grounds for a kin who produces that filth which roams over my grounds?' It seemed likely, that in the distance, it bled in its own unique way. The silk-like remainder of a hive appeared to be dying as well, from having become a living entity to a dying one in a single stroke or a slash had seemed to be tainted. Leaving it alive would be much worse than what it had been or looked like. Unclear and clever, fiend which had reigned, it seemed like they'd be an adversary for those whom lived out there. 'Very well, I shall agree with one condition. Upon entering my plane, their ability to produce the same means as you will have disappeared from their kin. They as well as anyone else who might share your kind shall live in the same metal constructs as I have willed. Only then will they be allowed to come and live and breed.' 'Accepted, we shall make good.' 'Not yet, the second condition shall be that in the city, naught may take the life of another being on the streets and seen by others. The consequence of such an action shall be complete denial of existence as the culprit shall be thrown inside of it. And no flight might come as the might shall devour whoever the one it eats. From it, no kind of existence might emerge, other than mine and mine alone for I am the ruler of this plane.' It was a hard deal, knowing its own nature and the mad nature from which its kin came to be. But they would do, as it seemed quite even and fair for him to have his word. This peculiar kind of creature seemed to be brooding in itself as it looked at the pit. In a least remorseless way, it thought about what it might do and how it might come to abuse that thing. After all, the pit, unlike him, had been imperfect, the space between the various thick straw-like hairs had widened every second as they moved. One could take a smaller being and throw it in-between, showing it to its death, forcefully pushing it to an irreversible death, from which none may spawn. A wider thrall did come to announce. 'More are to arrive.' There they were, as it had promised. Not only had they come in numbers, but it seemed likely that they had been nurtured by the likes of being null. They were unable to produce anything from their inner groins, and from the outside, they almost looked castrated. A pitiful sight, indeed, it had been, not only humiliating for them but for it as well. He would be their chain master, the only one allowed to come there untouched. Compared with their likes, he had distinguished itself quite evenly, more so, as they came. It was a strange sight to behold and at first there were questions thrown in their strange, almost clicking language. But it hadn't come out of their mouths. He had forgotten how long it had been, but they used their inner limbs to create noise and make that pseudo-language which bore little interest now. 'You shall learn how to speak, slaves.' Most of them, if not all, had been startled by his response. Seeing that mouth move in the manner it had which had been used beyond chewing and eating had been something not only dreadful but bizarre. It had no place there, no clear usage by any means. There were things out there which bore the mark of strangeness and of danger but clearly, this had been the most dangerous thing out of all. They were frightened by him, for some reason, the mere act of him speaking had not only estranged but it seemed to have forced them into a relationship of savagery between him and their group. Yet, they understood his words and what he had said. 'Pick up the wooden bars and start working on the framework. This shouldn't be anything beyond your comprehension, there were plans such as this one in our home as well.' Neither moved as they waited, wrapped around some of the materials they had picked up. What exactly were they waiting for? It was unclear as to what happened there, but clearly, there was a pause as his every move and every twitch had a defensive reaction from them. Are they waiting for me to move away from it?

Could they be that frightened? ‘Very well, I shall step away and make way for you to approach. But be fast and weary of the plans, we’re working of a schedule of our own.’ Great, come close, much closer to it. There’s need for workers and for slaves. No one dared say a word, but click as they started and took in the plans. Now, not only would they interpret, but there was a keen and eerie sense which drove the construction which lay ahead. There had been a great deal of choices this god had taken in order to allow them to work there. Even by the planks and the frame, they started chewing and forming the base however they wanted. It had been a pleasure of their kin to make smaller chambers hidden in the walls, where cold and moisture would start happening and spreading as their young would dwell inside. And it had been clear that that’s what they intended to do. Despite being forced to use only their mandibles and limbs, there were other things they used in the construction. Their spit had a sort of chemical which acted like an agent which kept things together. It felt like some sort of binding thing which was reactive, as it moved and sometimes twitched. It lived, as well and as for as long as it would be kept in a cold and dark enough environment to live and breed with itself down there. And most of them, as they kept placing the frames had dark ideas as where to start. They had recognised the dangers of the pit and had gone on to place the first of the many frames surrounding it. Thought it would not be completely sealed, it should be noted that this could’ve been converted to some kind of temple of sacrifice. It would be quite kindly magnificent to have it so. No one would be bothered by the likes, not only that but neither would be distracted from their work as to look at him. This tormented grunt which had come. Neither knew his name, but seemed to feel the force he embodied. ‘As I have promised, they shall be allowed to stay, as long as they work on building my city, then raise up my gates, they will live.’ ‘But they won’t be pleased unless they live up on heights which would spread as high as to feel the reaches of those dark clouds you’ve made. There’s no other thing which would please them.’ ‘Then that’s how it shall be, as long as they’ll build the frames high enough and coat them in steel, I shall turn the insides in the same manner.’ But he didn’t speak of the iron of the steel, but the mere show of how the wood revealed itself as being bare bone with blood and meat, living and holding everything together. It was a mere trick of sight, but this Ogoth assured him that every piece of material which had been used there was living or seemed to have some kind of sentience of its own. Not only that but the mere fact dictated that it would last. They were planning to build his living citadel, with everything from its guts and bones hidden underneath a veil of iron and of wood. Mere tricks went on and off but neither of them could be trusted by any means alone as they crept with their own likes. It had been taken as a way of being lied to and tricked into that kind of peculiar slavery. Most importantly, they obeyed. Neither of which looked eye to eye as the first buildings came to be embodied, the spires having been pulled forward and made as if to last. ‘Continue placing them forward, have as many of them as you can possibly place, let naught be wasted by the kin.’ And as they did there seemed to be some deprivation. In the distance, that Ogoth smile as he played torture on one of his loyal servants. They were sterile and got pushed around by his might alone, getting trapped into small boxes from which only he could unlock and allow escape. From it he moved to another and then to another and another one as well. Soon, the fields had become infested with cages, small in nature, as to allow no freedom to move but force them to watch as the grandness of his citadel would come to life, for that’s what it was to become. He had neither clue nor certainty how they had reached that idea or his secret plan, but there was a clear devotion from the plans which had been laid to them. Those instructions not only had been ignored but they had gone even nearer to making his shrine in front of the pit, farther away as to not be in the same building as the way of death but close enough, near its proximity as to the wove. It came as no surprise that even then, the various points above them, the air was breaking apart. From hole of black, filled with blue came some strange beings which didn't belong, and haven't been invited by their means. Their bodies seemed to bend and twist and turn in the shapes of the holes from which they came. And every now and then, the screech of dread from one of the magnificent abominations would be heard. They had been pulled inside, gushing with fear and with their live liquids, spewing their green sod of a blood, blotting in anger to escape. And those long face jumpers had their tainted teeth wrapped around and held together, almost welded to their victims. As they had been dragged, many dropped their wooden plates and seemed to have tried grabbing at their brother, only to find out that the release was nigh-impossible. Close, but not enough, they realised that its body had been crushed from every possible angle in some supreme way, that it could not be touched and held any longer without doing any kind of damage themselves and bring forth a torture which could never be met any longer by no possible means. It was fear that drove them to spread as paranoia made more of those holes appear. Could be, that there were no holes but mere illusions made by semi-transparent creeps out there. Clearly, or mostly so, there had been a difference between them which couldn't be extinguished by the mere means of being there. And every now and then, this Ogoth would come and push a hand in some invisible pocket, only to pull out a line of guts which had been stranded and stretched between the means of survival. Inside of one of those he pulled out what had looked like the digested form of a living being, or one which had been living, even if it were, moments ago when everyone was watching. 'Return to your work.' He said, and somehow his voice had appeared both by the common way and through some clicks he hadn't made himself, at least not from inside his mouth or by his limbs. It was clear now, what he had been doing. That being, which had been dead returned to the way it had previously been. Not to wonder at the fright which would be brought, he pulled the worker back to life, in some way through which it could not be redeemed. Most of its body had already turned in itself and merged together with the organs of that defiler. 'Filthy parasites, I may not remove them from you yet. Let that serve as a warning for those who might dare come near as to devour.' And it seemed to last, at least for the first stage. One glance over made them all return to where they have been, as there was nothing else to be seen. For, as it was clear that their likes alone would suffice, twice of thrice had there been attempts, as long as their trickery lasted they seemed to be lumping with one another in a way most benign. Come unto me, little thing. One seemed to think as it dug a hole and hid in it. There was some kind of fake hairs lying on its outer rims. It waited, pretending to be another one of those dark holes which lay out there placed by their master. Soon, as to bow to this sign, they brought more frames and placed it there. At least, one had turned unlucky, as to be clear, out of a mere sign of fear. A snap startled that one who might have turned and attempted to return. From his insides, something had pierced through his back and as it had become clearer, most of its limbs had been grasped and strangled, caught and entangled, rooted not to be removed. Its body had been dragged inside and slowly, it pulled twenty feet down. That way it could eat and grow, hidden from any kind of woe. He had won, this was the dark might of a kind of predator which would not suffice and would not be satisfied with the likes of something weaker. There was a clear abstinence of blood which filled the entire pit with a feeling of ecstatic morbidity which seemed to remain inside. It felt awful for the thing which lived down there, as it would not only bask but also sweat in its own filth and peculiar liquids which would be produced. For some reason and another, it kept creeping at the surface, trying to look at what was going on, being mightily paranoid as a result of being kept in the dark. That much had been clear, for as long as it remained there, the inspection of guts would remain. No other option laid but to wait for the others. Sooner or later, those invisible pagans of dread would dig up pits of their own and lay out the same trap as he had. It was clear enough that they had no intention of building more of those as they came to the conclusion that they were being trapped. Instead of placing frames around the newly made pits, they seemed to have brought sand and dirt to cover them up alive. Despite the strength they had, with a huge amount of dirt thrown over them, they had looked powerless as they suffocated within themselves. A crueler fate had come now, as they appeared to have reign and bowed to these foes. The one small pit which lay inside its own place seemed to have caught on the fact that it had been trapped there, as the small box had no exit. The only way, it would seem had be down. But as it dogged or tried digging a way underneath or as it attempted to go around it, the mighty trap had come to be. Bars of bone extended to the very depths of the ground. It was unclear, what had enforced the growth. But the madness was there, the cruel, cruel fate of being forced there. And another blow to the creatures' mind came to the dark. It must've been that filth of a tyrant, the cruel being which had forced itself onto him. For, inside his guts, there would likely appeal some kind of living thing which tried grasping for air as well. It tried to escape, to push and puncture through his guts. It would be unacceptable, in the least of kin, the likes of which would consume his whole being if it weren't for him to get harder at it. From his insides, there came the sparkling sharp teeth which forced themselves on the meat. This was a matter of time until it could use its many limbs to push itself out and leave him there. Half of his body had already been laid and formed into the trap, leaving him in a state of supreme weakness and perpetual kind of divisive motion which jerked off most of its tiny hair. And those which had been played along with and stretched in the air, along with many small pockets of dirt which had been tied to its meat now lay there, falling off, pound to pound. It was shaking, almightily awful for its own kin. From its mouth, there came a gasp, from which one of the limbs, not his, pushed on. His teeth came down upon it as it struggled to kill this worker and push it down so he could be digested. And all of this happened while outside, the other parasites had been picked up one by one and forced out their invisible veils, which acted like some kind of cloaks which only protected them from the veiled sun. That gray light not only hurt them but made them suffer. It burned their skin from inside out. The blood which resulted from the many skin bubbles and pox-like stubs seemed not to pop on the outside but on the inside, and as they have, the blood gushed and drowned their own organs instead of touching anything else or anything of the kind. First their guts, then their many eyes, their breathing spheres which popped and extended, soon to be blocked by a mucks formed out of the excruciating chemical formed out of spores and their own blood. Soon they would be blocked inside and forced to fall off and be removed from the sight. One by one, body had been picked up and formed into a pile. It wasn't long until it had been given life by unnatural means and forced into a flight by their mad impulses. But it wasn't that they had been a pile of corpses, but an infected giant bubble of skin and blood which was constantly suffering and releasing a noise of vile poison for the mind. The workers would be left undisturbed as they carried on. And inside that very box, as it struggled for this long a while, now there came time to stop, after all that happened, now there came the blow or the stop. It was as sudden as a man might know, the likes of which only brought of the fear which had come alight. It had been a season of blight after all, making it even harder to breathe. One of the limbs had managed to jerk inside the body, piercing through a gut. As it did, suddenly it found itself wrapped around one of the breathing spheres and felt at it, nothing as deranged as being eaten alive but close enough to it. Much of the fear came out of sight. It was the constant pounding and the pain which had been inflicted upon the restriction which forced him to feel his breath being taken away. It couldn't force its jaws down on the limb which came out of his mouth either, for any kind of jolt could cause him to die right there if that gut filth were to be startled. It would be cruel, to think of anything less, he feared, he was in some kind of distress which would at least last. What happened next was fast. It felt like some kind of breathing disorder as the walls inside his spheres came down crashing upon him. Something dreadful and unnatural came to light, making it seem likely to him that there was no way of escaping it. The force from which the collapse, the rushing of the various gasses which had inhabited its lungs had been expunged inside his own body. Now, it looked like an inflated body in which resided a broken thing. Though it had managed to somehow cripple and force this mindless insect-like thing into the act of suffocating, there would be no kind of return. Dread was in its eyes, its life ended there in an instant as the gases rushed in its head, instantly blowing a gust of wind, a blow to its brain. The implosion had been quick and had managed to crush it in an instant. Clear pain had come and went in the one instant it had been alive. Other than that, there it lay, mindless, lifeless and only like some embodied blanket of skin which stood over the corpse of its prey. As it continued struggling, all too clear it had become that out of its veil, there came some kind of terror. From its inside, there it struggled for escape and as it had, its many limbs started cutting and tearing the veil to many pieces and many layers which had been dismantled and abandoned. After which, there came the sudden release as it dragged itself out, making it quite clear what had happened and where it might try getting at. But it was pointless in the nastiest way. This thing had been partially digested, slow, though it may have been, it couldn't have prevented itself from feeling and from coming forth with its mad way of reasoning. The effect had been tainted and had looked bizarre. Now, it had been time to dine on its own flesh as it realised that moth of its legs hadn't even been attached to its body, only a mere artificial kind of connection laid in any case. So much so, that it had looked ready to be slain in a dreadful manner. It was uneven and eventful at best. What had crept out of it was the stench of the putrid as each bite on them released the pheromones which had been stored in small, tiny, almost invisible pouches which had been attached to its rotting muscle masses. Those would've acted like some kind of way to steer clear of some kinds of predators which may have been repelled by the likes of it if they tried anything. Neither it nor any of its kind expected those kinds of intelligent beings which seemed to appear out of nowhere and from the deadly holes and pits and spaces, hidden and based on trickery and woe. Now, it slipped and fell even deeper in the hole, unable to raise itself, having been only a body with its oversized numb head. From its insides, the limbs were tired, what had remained out of it either bled or would bleed in. The sight, though covered by dark had dimmed as it adapted its sight to see the dark properly. Even though it had been blinded, partially, it is, by the acid from which it came, there would be nothing coming out of it but the fear and the impurity of woe. Anger would've come even faster and nearer if it had had the strength but now? It waited there, trapped inside, rotting. And the way it went outside had been magnificent in its whole magnitude of likes. The spires had risen to the likes of the hold, having tiny beads of metal aligned like some kind of chain, coming into the tallest building which stood, erect as it had been uneven to the shape of everything else. Not only had it seemed or looked like some kind of hold of despair, but it was held there only by the system of chains upon which had been based. This Ogoth seemed to bask in the glory of the city he had created. It had been or at least it had looked somewhat beyond his vision, the likes of which had belonged to the vision of a being which had been Ill. Something had seemed rather mental if not the dread which had filled what had laid in his mind. Greater, greater, it needs to be far greater, the spikes and their likes need not suffice for the kind of dread I feel. Sharper, make it so, he appeared in front of the workers which immediately bowed and hid their limbs inside their bodies. Their bodies seemed to have immediately become wormed out and seemingly fat. What had they eaten? Well, it was no wonder, for he allowed it, but small arms and legs had still been tossed around and he could recognise them anywhere. It wasn't that neither creature desires it, but they looked at it from the way it had been. They needed to eat, he had to feed his servants. What else might he do it with if not with his own? Well, enough of that, it would be clear. 'Where is he?' Again, the clicks had come, and they pointed and they made those clicks themselves. It was even clearer where he had been, the likes of which drew in where he would be like. There he stood resting, like some kind of captain or leader of grunts. From beneath him lay some kind of throne, inside the hold he had held below. The building he had set himself in had been strangled, like some kind of built-in twisted spiral which went down beneath the earth. What kind of abomination of wood and steel had been built down there? The land hadn't been spared off this anomaly, by any means, as it had not only been disturbing to look down upon but to also walk through, as there were no stairs, but patches of lands which stood in to themselves, from which one may jump from one to the other. Those patches of ground seemed to have been impaled from side to side or at least held by some moving metal rods which had been attached to a device which laid in the middle of this system. It looked way overly complicated to have been created by such primitive beings and he himself had trouble believing it so. What had escaped my sight? Could it be that there's more to them than I had dared look into? Even while going through the various creations and builds they had made, there was a clear disturbance in his mind. He hadn't been surprised before but now he had become aware. Clearly, there was something to their craft but more so, not to the way they looked but how they acted. It was their fluidity which captured his interest and nothing else. It looked like, at times, those platforms he had been on moved by them as he descended below. More than that, it felt as if he was slowly being drafted or taken in like some sort of fly caught in a trap, going smoothly through this constructed silk trap. More than a few hundreds of meters below, the walls stopped being made of dirt and they had become apparent to him. They had been covered with stone or some kind of light darkly lit platinum of some kind. Some empty holes had been punctured on them, or place where something had been pounded. Either way, there were those sings and long strings which had been used as decorations, the exact way they liked. It looked like, as he came to the point where depictions arrived, there had been something dreadfully familiar about all of this. Hanged men laid everywhere, from the insides of their own, where those giant spires which produced their mad silk had come to be of use. It was of little interest to mess up with their plans any longer, why, he was quite amused. How much would they dare over extend? It was quite fruitful there. In its hole, where the patched ended, either it would be left unfinished or it may just be that there was no desire or it hadn't been planned on to be finished. A dread drop came, for the likes of the fact that only he would survive it. No living thing could stand in but it. Somewhere out there he laid, working on something in his hole. And the strange thing wasn't the emptiness but how clean the bottom was. There was a floor but it hadn't been made of dirt or simple sand. Somehow this decrepit creature, mindless compared to him, had managed to perfect its own lair. Could be that it had made him jealous there? It was so evenly squared, the sandstone on the floor. It looked like sand but it had been as hard as stone, carved by the likes, evenly spread everywhere around. And though it had been dark, there came a glow from the sand storm which was there. Every fragment of sand, every strange of atom which made it seemed to produce some kind of energy which lit the room. It created a dim effect and no real light by any means, but this pseudo desert-like cove which would be found nowhere else. Just how had he done it? And why was it that it seemed so familiar? He stood there, sitting on the floor, thinking of what the thought entailed. For some reason, this thought, or memory of the kin had seemed not vague enough to ignore. And there it would be that he remembered. This dreadful creature, this parasite, this invader, this damned one had cast himself as deep as he could go. What he had seen below wasn't his creation by any means. As he looked everywhere he had realised that he wasn't in his plane any longer. Just as he had invaded his world and had agreed to be his servant, he had dared trick him in the lowest of means. That decrepit creature had opened a way, a portal and some mad gate and had connected their worlds in a most peculiar fashion. Above of them, the gate still stood and he had little doubt of anything at all. It might not be that they planned to trap him there, no, not since he could return back to his plane at any times. It was an escape only for him, it seemed, but why. Why not ask him himself? It wasn't even that he had gone that far, that he had found him working on trying to dig through the cave. Perhaps this expedition had been short-lived, but he found neither feeling nor any force which would make him want to slay this benign creature here. 'Was this your escape plan all along? Or had it been something which had just appeared?' For a moment, he had been ignored, at least until he turned. It wasn't that he had doubted the lucidity he had shown, but something was wrong. He wasn't supposed to be there, he couldn't have been there. The way he started fuming and breathing, it looked as if a stroke had reduced the size of his lungs to small blotched holes. 'I have not expected you to find me as soon as you have done it. Well, it isn't like my part of the deal had been depleted and feigned.' 'But you have sought for a way to escape, have you not? While they're out there working for your kin.' 'Indeed they are, perhaps mindless and afraid. For them, this servitude may not end, not when they have already been disciplined into this manipulation. They've been fed flesh for serving and have been taught and shown what happens otherwise. I do think you know that they may never stop serving.' Ogoth looked at him in the same manner. From this angle, it almost looked like this creature had been sentient and alive, perhaps not as mindless as he had once thought. It would be in itself mightily cruel to stamp and end his life here, especially with how much it had managed to achieve. At least, for the longest time, there was some desire to leave it to itself and see what it may make of this room. 'There's no way out, would there be some kind of escape?' 'Not that I can see, I cannot force my way through as of yet. The walls are too hardy and I don't have the means, the tools or even the direction to make it through the rock.' Not to mention that the environment itself seemed to be hurting its carapace and its moldy skin. This was a creature which carved for moisture and it looked for it in any place it might find it. But somehow this spot underneath the earth held a pocket of gas, air and some glowing mass of sand which never seemed to stop by any means. 'You shall return then but not unpunished for the circumstances which had been forced upon me. This trip of yours shall cast a piece of you which might remain here as some sort of reminder.' 'Don't crave me up, do not cripple me yet. I'm still in need of my every limb so I may no limp and fall in front of the others. How may they listen to me if I'm broken?' 'Very well, then you shall be locked in here and adapt, I curse thee that you may not die but suffer in this hole until you've brought me something of use from this filth plane. But bear in mind, that even if by some means you make it through the planes outside, there lays nothing but a world that's been destroyed. Only rubble and it seemed obscure. It thought for a moment, in this one chance through which it could prove itself more than it would've been by normal means. 'What of the world underneath? Would there not be escapees who sought refuge underneath their broken world? Would they not adapt after centuries spent underneath the rubble and inside places not like this obscure pocket but full of moisture and of life in the dark?' 'Would you bring the reassurance that there is such a thing as life underneath there? How might you know about such a thing other than mad speculation?' On a second thought, it spared no second and seemed to have brushed him off, nearing one of the walls. With one finger pushed inside, there seemed to have been crushed in it to itself, carving a deep tunnel which lead nowhere else but underneath the hole it had created. And there was a clear path below there, though it was dark, the sand seemed to follow and lit the place. Like some moth drawn to a flame, small chunks of black and blue rocks flew and seemed to be attracted to the light. But they weren't rocks, not in the least. They were some small and insignificant being which looked benign on a closer inspection. At least their kin was dangerously even to one another, as it happened for them to glow and pop. It was there that his master disappeared, leaving him free reign. It was something which, in its primitive state, it may never be able to understand at all. But it went below there, followed by the light. What had drawn it in its turn had been the source of those benign small beings, which had indeed been chunks of some winder form which had merged itself or had been there all along, on the wall. There were no features, just the various sharp edges which bore reflections of the lights.

It looked dangerous to get near, not only since there would be the danger of getting itself cut but also because it emanated a sound from its inner self. That sound had a reverb, it vibrated and seemed to lead to a clear high pitch which pushed him away. He, the said being which came to walk farther from the chunk and seem to attempt to flee from its sight appeared rather unaware of its surroundings. Clearly there was a drop, and there would be another.

Though bridges were anything but natural there, there had been stones and platforms which had been left untouched. Something else had eroded the land beneath, to the point where such a fall would inquire the failure of organs and of any humble being. There would be a great time to come. It started by going forward within itself, pushing and drawing its many limbs to grab a hold of anything it could reach in order not to fall. A few inches in and it had been grabbed. It looked like one of the beings had taken hold of him and grabbed in through one of the longest tunnels he had ever seen. There was a struggle but it had resulted in a failure to get away. When he was released, he hadn't reached the land but seemed to have been caught in a state of constant floating. It felt as if he had been submerged, looking there and the various forms which all drew in themselves, to points or spheres or objects which lay inside their own middle points. And from the insides, from their own cores there came limbs and various pockets of dust and of various chemicals, gases and even liquids which had been somehow tied and forced to their midst's. Some of them looked like stars, others looked more dynamic and rather erect in the way they moved. The space beneath got possessed by the many pockets of rock had been entirely diminished and destroyed, entirely and supremely forced into nothingness, leaving them there in a constant state of flight. It wasn't right, to look anywhere down or anywhere else, as its head had been forced and centered. From it, every limb and every rib, bone or piece of meat had changed into a state of agony as it was forced into their own forms. For some reason, there hadn't been any warning of this change, not even the kind which would require its body to resist or attempt to fight this seemingly irreversible change. There hadn't been any kind of direction or resistance of the kind. It was there, in a minute and afterwards it never left. A feeling of dread had not only been present but it had been followed by the sight of abandonment. He wasn't one of theirs, not one whom belonged of the same kin and of their pack. Soon enough that had noticed or had made it notice the kind of behaviours which left it floating there alone. They had been repelled and repulsed by it, despite having been forced to share in their appearance. It wasn't the same, he didn't belong by any means there. And this existence had been horrible, for its likes had been twisted and confusing to live into. Everyone, as he followed seemed to be caught underneath their own mad projects as they formed and seemed to modify the stones underneath them. Forging various concave arches seemed rather pitiful but they had to have their uses, it inquired in the least. For, as deeper as he descended, there came the pitiful orbs. They were peculiar but seemed to pull so many of them to the point where he would see hundreds of thousands of them wrapped around it. As its glow had been peculiarly fit to creep inside their own, there would be nothing close to their own kind, just the gloom which wouldn't go anywhere soon. It pushed, as some kind of invisible force which pushed every kin away. And in their march they got lost immediately as his sight came into being. Something had been to him that much was clear. Why else would he be avoided and treated in such a manner. Yet the disgust hadn't come yet, that had to be earned. From inside the orb, there was something calling onto him as he approached. This had to be the reason, as he had been aware, for everyone to be pulled and to rejoice and the mere touch of its magnificence. It was mad, to think about touching, or even more so, to think that he could have any kind of chance to enter the orb and reside inside of it. But that had been it. They followed but only from the distance. As he crept closer, all of that roundness it displayed seemed to be blunt. It hardened as it approached, no longer letting it slip from it. From the hardness and the harshness it displayed, it almost felt flat upon the touch. One side of the sphere had come to get straight through it, through the meat and as it had, he felt his body be encompassed by this solid form. What had resulted out of them merging together had been some peculiar floating bulk which relentlessly slowed down from the force pushed in by the heaviness of the object. Nothing would go forth, not any sooner, not for the likes. There had been a clear mistake between their likes, not to mention that there would be fear for those which approached. But they came, sooner than expected. Every star-like being came and touched and made contact with him now. They were almost there, feeling their insides pulled closer to the source and now, now they were able to feel its might. He had been anchored there, as this system embodied by their bodies created. From there, they had made a small star, a real one not of the likes of the sea. From their insides, there gravitated and rounded small forms and chunks inside the ground and it felt there, that it was time to return from where it came from. It had control over and neither of the intruders had any kind of likes that they would leave. Why would they if this benign form was so strong? No wall and no stone touched their bodies in the least. A mere approach would force the many edges of the walls and the various spikes remains flatten just like the orb had when they merged with one another. There mere show of force continued up until the point where it had crushed walls and everything around them as it made its way towards the tunnel. Would there be an end? How could such a thing be in sight? At least, it had become obviously mad, from the likes of looking forward at it. What could this madness gravitate towards? It wasn't even midst of day, that through the portal, it had come, crushing and destroying the way back as it had returned. And the hole and the cave which it had created as a hope of escape laid no more but buried in rubble and dirt. The metal device had been dealt with and now it stood just as it had been. When the moment of entry had come, from the distance, the forms made of the bodies of the fallen which had been rejuvenated and forced into their flights had looked back and seemed to be rather pulled towards this estranged being. For the time being it stood there, looming and not to destroy. It would be rather pitiful to have returned and only add to the destruction of what he had helped created. The only one who had approached was that decrepit deity, the mad one who appeared forth, unaffected by the gravitational pull of the flattening effect through which it seemed to have attained the ability of a clean and supreme destruction. Clearly, it had been mad, unclear so, whether or not it could say or lay on itself to look down upon and creep forth. What had it been or where would it look? There were no eyes but it wasn't blind. Pain came forward from its inside, as it felt the act of repulsive interest they showed in one another. It would've been interesting, at least from the likes of having seen through it. But what could it be that pulled at him so often from its insides? There wasn't a force or power which drew him closer, but the interest he had in hearing all of their thoughts. Being so close to them made him listen, calmly to their likes while slowly coming to some kind of understanding. It felt eventful there, at least to the point where he could stop and listen to their thoughts for ages. While everything around them kept spreading and expanding, he waited and listened to quick stops and sounds which formed inside their minds. They looked prepared for anything, as they went on to observe and look at everything around them. As their minds became even more open, he could see part of them, of their creation, the ancient magnitude of the organs which formed out of nothingness as they were lost in space. How they had been drawn to parts of the world which were rather abandoned and missing the likes of living beings. How they had shaped their own worlds out of the ether and the lost atoms in the outer space. It was interesting to watch and probe inside their minds, sometimes getting too close for comfort and seeing what wars they had waged between one another. Far, out there, in their world, it looked like they had made several planets in a self-edited or self-made universe and galaxy of their own. Never have their likes been alike, rather, they had taken different forms, going through too much iteration until they had managed to get to their perfect form which involved the likes of rotating matter. And in their current form, they could touch the likes of matter itself and shape everything into anything they so desired, for as long as they held their likely power to themselves undisturbed. It was a trick which had been used to temper with the core of their own planets, coming to the point of almost destroying themselves in the process. As he looked farther, farther away into their wars, he had seen them being waged. Many of them had started by the likes of bringing two planets too close to one another, force some kind of artificial pull which never appeared to leave on its own. Some crashed into one another and never came to a fix, only being forced to merge and lose the roundness of their own forms. And as they waged their wars, never have they dared meet with one another or be as close as they have now become. Rather than that, they had created life and shaped some abominations in their likes. Legless and caught in flights, these armed things seemed not to rotate but joust against one another, forcing themselves to charge recklessly into death, revealing massive blood baths there. The grounds which had once been gray or red-like had been blasted with that horrid blood of their kin. It was awful and the bastard started. Only one stood there, right near the ground, carrying itself by the many tentacles and trying to fight not for its masters, not for destruction but for a kind of survival. Many others of both sides stopped and gave up on their weird spears and arched sticks and instead, they tried doing something else which didn't matter. Soon they would survive. Nothing else mattered in the least, not to creep, not for the likes of any beast. A march had begun once there was the interlude, between which, they had figured that sending those creeps against one another, into a joust, a flight or into the fight had been less about a domination and more so for the kind of being entertained. A few raised themselves over the others and said. 'Let us follow and go forth. We have fought and slaughtered our own. Now, we shall be free to go ahead and do as we please.' It spoke in a self-spoken language that only their kin would understand. Some of the words hadn't been entire spoke but have come out of some holes which lay in their insides. From there, they had been converted into some kind of flaccid wind which came and traveled through themselves and outside as it followed on their breathing pattern. That message soon enough had managed to be disturbed and distorted after each breath. 'Follow forth as we have known distraught pain. Freedom, lays head, as we.' Worse, it had been interpreted as something of a call. Were this hatred and this agony to end? Could it be that the fight hadn't been over yet? It was hard to see from the way it attempted to form its limbs, but those arms which had been fingerless but looked closer to tendrils themselves pushed forward and changed. They were, they had looked or they had already become something close to wicked looking legs. Hair laid on them, as it had become clear they would march. Some took the initiative and changed their body themselves. Others would be carried or would hold onto the ones which grew those things which helped them walk over the ground with much more ease. In time, those relationships changed as they kept on their march. Soon enough, those who were on top started melting and forcing themselves over the others. This strange relationship would be a symbiosis of little or close to no kind of normality one knew. Madness had begun and it had been time to reign at least. One couldn't feel the touch of any kind of mad induced feast. Soon enough they had been deranged, forcing those who were only halves to weld themselves together or perish there, during the nights. And during those long nights, they suffered into silence, as they had been crippled. They had been observed by the creators with much amusement as they refused to help them by any moral or normal means. There was harsh time ahead, especially while following the trail of some peculiarly weird plane which had been close to being destroyed and crushed entirely by force. A far deeper pair of suns came being as they approached the middle point of the created space they had been in. Not only had they been stringed to some kind of ambience which played aloud but there was something in there, rotting. It turned their insides out and instantly ended them, with something close to eight quarters of the planet they were in. Many of the star shaped beings had been distracted by the amusement and instantly died in that even, to the peculiarness of the universe which couldn't be explained by normal means. It had been only a rotten point there which came over and seemed to have dispelled life entirely while bearing no kind of sign that it had ever been there. Even on the outside, it looked like any of the empty corners of the universe, showing no sign whatsoever, other than the deaths which had been immediate and without delay. It was a dark even, indeed, as they had been force to stop their planets from going forward, out of fear. The few that remained in there, who came to war stopped now, especially since they realised that other may pray upon them and inflict much worse and far more damage than it had been done here. An in their wake, upon the realisation that this conflict would continue, they chose to stay, anchored there, in the spot which would be near their destruction as well as their salvation. Depending upon the angle upon which they would come, there would be no kind of estranged danger which came forth then. Only the wait, as much as it had been came to them. They should've been aware of others, especially since they expected them to bring entire stars, rocks, satellites and other formations which would be bent to their will, in order to come forward and destroy. None would come closer to annihilation than they had been. And many did come, not in rocks, or any kind of similar construct, but in invisible kinds of ships which were living. Their insides had been organic and looked as if they had been swallowed by some peculiar infant leviathans which weren't invisible or transparent but had been as dark as matter and the universe itself. Many of the rays coming from the stars revealed what they looked like and it only seemed even to say that their forms were awful in nature, for this was the space and not a natural environment. Their chances would suffice if they meant the survival in that kind of place and in the vacuum they peered with no eyes but raised holes which looked like some small erupting mountains. From their sides there were almost wings, if it weren't for the fact that they had some tiny zits as they presented the first coming sings of an infection. Soon enough, the entire reconnaissance stopped there. It seemed that, what had remained of the planets had been obscured from the other side, as it wasn't even there to begin with. This leviathan of the kind had stopped as well, as it had been alerted by what was going on in there. As a natural kind of defence, it had been made aware of the peculiarness and the strange act of having been infested and made aware of the rotting factor. Many of the others had stopped as well and refused to draw in closer. It would be much worse than that, to the point where no dread would be any crueler than to look upon it. Much less, as it had been, there would be nowhere near the hatred which had been displayed. A kind of paranoia lived between them as they would return together, marching like some kind of pack. Sooner than it had been expected, they started gnawing and trying to get at one another, having grown impatient of the fact that they were being used. Since they couldn't expel the invaders from outside their bodies, they deduced that the fewer chances to them out would be, either to war against one another or head back to the place where everything would rot. A much bolder creature seemed to erect itself far harder than what the others had been through. It wasn't like anything they had believed into, but that had been clear enough. Not only had it charged, but all of the sudden, everyone turned to watch. It charged right through and seemed to have suddenly released both itself and the invader from inside its body. A lifeless body now stood and waited, little to it and its mind being there. There had been dread in the scream and the cry which came from both the star-creature and the leviathan it, as much as from all others. Not only had they been made aware but there was no clue of the disturbance and why that thing had been the way it had been. Much more, it looked like, what had been hidden behind in had somehow managed to force itself into a pocket from which it could never get out by any means any longer. At least not any longer since a strange kind of gravity forced the halvened planet to stay there. It hadn't moved and even as it seemed that a piece of it had begun growing, it hadn't been anything but those trapped fiends which had no interest in dying. More over, they would stay and wait and be trapped for an eternity of dread, taken as prisoners of their own war. It was something from which they could never dare or hope to recover from. Crueler fates as a whole have come to be, even more than those filth induced anomalies of space. Leviathans were bore by their own likes as they had been driven away and never met as hosts. But somewhere in their benign journey, it looked likely that they had been found near the ends of one universe and at the beginning of another. The leviathans had made it through the journey with little to no injury whatsoever. Much of the injuries had been caught and force against each other as it seemed likely for them to survive the planes and the morbid space they had entered. For, the substance there wasn't dark but a deep greenish purple which seemed to have replaced the dark. And the stars bore something close to the growth of a deep and pinkish green which rose and fell in the distance. It was an uncharted land, an uncharted world by many means, through which there couldn't have been any less mysteries and what was going to happen in there. A cruel star had come and stopped. Its glow was strong but heat had been weak, or weaker than what they had been expected. Those leviathans had stood out as they were dark beings in the distance, to the point where they couldn't have been more revealed. Even as they were approached by the star, this sphere suddenly stopped burning and turned around only to reveal something close to some long and deceitful long hair which stretched and pushed forward akin to some peculiar crowns which began and ended as soon as they left out their outer rims. They wormed and pushed forward malignantly, as from its insides, the hard appearance faded and it revealed a wart-like complexion which was soft and cruel. From its inside there came the pair of eyes which watched, but no mouth laid there. Other than some sealed hole which looked as if it had bore the look of singing organ pipes which had been completely forced close upon it, that had been it. And even its eyes had been turned to look inwardly, like some seeds which had been ill-grown and cut in halves. The way they blinked had been uneven, to the point where those roach-like eyes close and popped out of their dreadful inabilities to distinguish between sight and right. No amount of light would enter them, as it just happened for them to go into motions or pause. They were tired at least, followed by the trip. As the leviathans started growing away from it, this strange star, which was unlike any other from their universe, if star it be, started following them. And onto the bridge of another ship, from the distance, there seemed to be a clear interest which had been shown, against the new arrivals. This star oft not, to have entered its living form, in which case, it had grown to shown the texture of a living corpse. The more it stood in its living worm, the more it had become browner, darker, bearing a crown of worms, eyes which had been bloodshot, flesh-like rot on its every side. It left a trail of gas behind it as it trailer over and followed those dark leviathans. Not only that, but that kind of behavior turned the living into peculiar living, as by no means were they allowed to live in that manner over there. Fear and fright reigned over those who traveled through this universe, as there had to be order. In their ship, which looked like an awful long rock which had been spiked on every edge laid a tall bridge-like tower from which there laid the chain of command. Inside the highest of levels, there were men, real ones, made of flesh and bone. Human beings, who had lived or seemed to have lived there, gave their commands. 'Prepare the engines, there's a living one.' It was already late, by the means of which, the universe had been affected by the colours of madness. A deep brown-red had come to be. Now and again, the stars had started turning from their normal ways to living things there, and that's when the danger came, that's where it started. They were living then, no longer obscured or dormant. Not only had they been alive, but they were also somewhat rabid in their wake. Stranger things had come to pass, there was no fear if there would be no mass. Somewhat likely, the intruders had come to be driven as far away from their likes as it would be possible. It wasn't that they spread of that they had wasted their likes, but it looked like the leviathans couldn't even live there. Being a problem with their breathing patterns, those things suffocated and disintegrated there, leaving nothing but them, the strange star-like beings which would just happen to be their equivalents in some strange fashion. And where would it just happen to be? The portal which had connected their universes was nowhere to be seen, by no means could they find or even guess where it was placed. It was a sudden turn now that revealed the magnitude of the ship which was to approach. Even though they felt some safety as they thought themselves somewhat immortal, those sea-like star abominations were ship less and slow without the leviathans. Those sphere-like creatures trailed them in a most benign-like matter, to one point where they had been drawn in. Rather than be taken and risk the chance of getting trapped by whoever drove that ship, the many sea-like star fiends started dwelling on the trailing sphere. They had been welcomed and stood there over some strange reign with little noise and no interest in what was going on behind. Without a sign for them to realise whether or not they had been seen or notice, there would be a cruel reprise to be seen. Where else would they have been in that case? Something close to a great eight of the surface they laid on had been soft. Digging some kind of spatial trenches hadn't been as hard as they had thought, but even more so, the insides had been filled with some kind of filth. As the emptiness inside waged for them to come and spread, they had made something alike of some similar fashion in which they stood now. The similarity was somewhat close to what it had been, much closer to what it had been than where they bore themselves over. Now, even in the distance, the universe looked darker, going a few shades deeper below. From the distance, it looked vaguely like some kind of emptiness holes had been dug by some beings in the matter itself, leaving everything either eaten or partially eaten until that point where there had been patches left in the sky. It was then that the dark of space, of which they had all been accustomed to, had appeared. But it was late for them to observe as they had laid in the hiding. That's what they men had appeared to fear, at least for their like and kin alone. It was safe to get to the zones through which the patches started appearing for who knew what might happen there. It had to be checked before the other stars came and swarmed over it, pushing it into some kind of veil from their swarm, through which it might be lost. There was always that danger, from which it spans. More corridors of space, it looked like it had become more structural again. Though there might've been no sign for it, there seemed likely that there were some invisible corridors through which they pushed forward and went. Something close to a lock had come into being as their ship started pushing forward at a much slower pace. 'We won't be able to get through, unless we send a ship, captain. It's the only way we may reach it in time.' 'But if we send a crew, this may be a mission without a way back. There'd be no return from it, officer, do you realise what you're proposing? There's nothing but death laying out there for any but us.' 'It may be our only chance of getting to there in time and marking the star. Look, captain, they're approaching it. Those things will cover and switch around with themselves until there will be nothing left for it, other than the insufficient kind of vagueness which would reign benign.' There was no time to argue or to question the decision there. Something or someone had to take this chance, as he seemed to be caught on his own policies. It would be illegal to say the least, but one man already made his way towards the hangar. 'Pyott, wait.' He had been joined by a low-class engineer by the name of Kran. It wasn't that shady that they found themselves going by the same passage during this time of distress, even less obvious, as they went through the lift eight floors below. But it looked quite so, especially where they would be going. 'You aren't going to listen to the captain or anyone else telling you it's dangerous, are you?' 'Look, if you're here to stop me, then fine, I think I'll be able to handle you before getting down there. I may not want to do it, but we're running out of time.' 'Pyott, non, non, no, you misunderstood me. I didn't want, I haven't come here to stop you. This is a rather strange turn that I may have taken here, but I came here to join you. I'm coming with you on this mission. You're in need of a good engineer if you're planning on making in through. It's dangerous out there and I think you may come to quite approve of my expertise.' 'Very well then, would that be all? I think we're going to be full already. I've already signaled for my copilot. He listened through the intercom and knows of what's to come. The three of us, you realise there's no coming back for us, do you? Are you certain of this? There's a chance for you already, you may be able to return to the deck later if you wait. It will already be too late for us to return once we're out there in the space.' 'I know the.' Dangerous circumstance they were in. The sudden power surge wasn't right, but the small metal container they were in was still going down. Somehow the elevator was still on its track, going strong despite it being that way. But what had happened there? It seemed to have come out of nowhere, the second power surge being rather stronger. It darkened the elevator room and seemed to have been close to how peculiar this entire experience had been. At least from the looks of it, there was only one thing clear, the danger of this thing which had crashed in the ship. The corridors of space had been breached and part of their giant ship had been molded into the havened star which had come into contact with it. One of its eyes had somehow been welded and molded into the hulk of the skip. Though it had lost its roundness, there seemed to be a general drain coming from it. From the force which came from the impact, the bridge above had been entirely whipped and smashed, instantly killing everyone who lay above. Now the ship lay in some refuge of stop, as it was slowly being converted and lost. The light was fading at a faster rate, and even as it happened for the patches to grow larger, there was no certainty of the fate they would eventually share. Nothing had been right by any means, in which case, Pyott and Kran started welding through the shut doors. 'We'll have to cut through and get there manually now. Unless the second engine had another one powering it, I don't think there's going to be another one coming through.' 'How are we going to open the doors then and make it through with the ship?' 'Payott, you handle the piloting part, I'll do the rest.' A few more moments had been waited and accounted for, with little interest, as to know if there would be some kind of estranged lost pull or another system which would bring back the light. They were still and they would still be abandoned there in the dark with little recoil or any kind of power. 'We'll have to move through the metal shafts and the various metal tunnels if we're planning on making it through. Any other way won't suffice.' 'What's the plan then? Are those things going to keep holding while we're heading through them or will they collapse under weight and stress?' 'I cannot say for certain, at least, for as long as I am aware, it held a T-four eighteen and that model weights at least eight times our weights combined. Well, I can't say for certain how much you weight, but I believe it should hold on for the time being.' Another desperate shake seemed to have landed from somewhere above. It had come from the deck. From that side, the bulk of the attack seemed to have hit the most. Pyott thought only of the best, but even then, he had little doubt that there was anyone up there still alive or not without some kind of severe injury which had been sustained. There would've had to be a giant hit for the generators to be put down. The main one being up there, in the engine room hadn't been a great sign. At least not since he had seen and known that there wouldn't be any kind of fairness to be had at the thought of it malfunctioning. When they had, tiny sparks came out of every end, he had worked and observed some as well. He'd been warned that, if something were to happen, the explosion would spread and push forward in every corner until the static would be so high, small object would float around in the air, held only by static. Some of that would be followed, in a case of total panic by the dread of what was to follow, being some kind of explosion and inner destruction of every filed inside that small device which powered a good part of the upper side of the ship. If it just happened for something to go wrong, there would be no way back, not by normal means. The chances of survival were low to begin with and even lower for them unless they found a way to retreat and get as far away as possible. 'How much longer do you suppose we'll have access to breathing oxygen?' 'I don't know, I can't tell here either since we're in a shaft and not going through the normal passage. Just keep moving and hope that you won't pass out from the lack of it.' 'Would you be certain of it then? How could anyone like you know?' There was a conversation being had just underneath them. Both of them stopped, as to not make any noise while listening. 'This ship is infested then. If everything you told me is confirm, then there will be no survivors by the time this ship released from the corridor out there. I dread to think of what might happen to the living members of the crew inside of here, if only they knew what sacrifice I have to make. But once the process is over, no one should be able to breathe.' With a bang, both of them snapped through the grid and fell over the man whom was speaking on the intercom, grinning with a bloody jolt on his face while his knees had been crushed by the piece of metal which had fallen over them. He came furiously alive with both of them there, spitting and cursing, trying to get a hold to himself. 'Check the board, what does it say?' 'It's the process? I don't have any kind of clearance here. I think he's trying to suffocate everyone here, there won't be any chance for me to disable it in time.' 'Listen you fucker, I want you to listen carefully. Unless you tell us how to reverse this entire thing, everyone will die here. This may be your intention, but let me make it just as clear, if not more so. If everyone on this ship dies, I'll make sure that you're going to be dragged with those pieces of metal shoved inside your knees until you've witnessed everyone out here whom you killed.' There wasn't even a reaction to his face. He looked rather likely to be unaffected by the threat. Until the moment came where Pyott took one of the pieces from the side and shoved it in like some kind of metal porcupine, he hadn't realised how serious he had been. 'Stop, stop, I yield to you. I yield to you, just make the pain stop.' He was willing to talk, even with his thick accent and strange demeanour. It was uncertain what his whole deal was or why he acted in that strange manner, but he would hold. At least since the little point remained, he couldn't think straight not look at it from any kind of way, otherwise he would've looked weak. 'Push me so I may sit upright. I can't see anything around me, I think I'm suffering of vertigo now.' 'Can't you talk now? Look, see that thing on the broken grid? He's trying his best there, but he cannot find any kind of way to reverse it. Why is that?' 'It's locked, only authorised people do. Only authorised people know how to unlock it.

Code, hard, long code, I can't say.' His accent grew even thicker as he was dosing in ahead. There was little doubt in his mind, he couldn't look by any means, for the sake of his own mind. He had bled too much for a normal yielding human being to be had, at least not without passing out. Most of the heat had gotten to his head as well. It was cold now. His breathe seemed to be fading out, the lump in his throat was slowly receding and pushing through the heat he felt. As his eyes dilated, he seemed to have been caught off and left himself there with nothing in mind. Something crept in and out, with little interest as the man died. There had been a strange device attached to the back of his head, which Pyott had pulled. The moment in which that happened, there came a quick draw of the feel, the strange-like manner through which no man could upon a dying man as it came. Though he had been able to recognise that kind of device as it was pulled out of a metal box which had encapsulated his skull, it came with a short price. A kind-of defamation of his corpse cape as all the skin and features of his face melted on his own shirt. Much and more of the corpse now laid there, with a metal tube which had been attached to his spinal cord behind and the skull which had been filled with the metal box and the strange creep that seemed to make him suffer ever after the sight of this dying man. There was a cruelty and an evil which didn't belong there. It wasn't that he had been pitiful in the approach, but they had seemed to mix together, material and blood. It was a total mess, by any means and words alone couldn't describe what was going on there. Two more so, four more so, eight more so, twenty ticks in the small box he had pulled. 'Do you think this might help us? I can't say for certain, but this looks likely to do it. As strange as it seems, I think you may be able to fit this box into the device.' One thicker appeared there. Another one followed and this small thing seemed to fit in a slot below the grid. It trailed over one broken screen as it had shown a path unlike any other, through which they'd have to take. 'This is the map of the entire floor below us. I don't think I may be able to stop this suffocation from up here. One of us needs to stay here and guide the other through the maze below.' 'You can't be serious here, through where?' In a quick turn, he pointed at a single spot on the floor, which looked far too clean and untouched to be had. Far from what it had been like, there was a little incentive to have it so, more or less, he threw him a small welding tool and signaled for him alone to begin. 'Start at any corner, of it but make sure it's that exact spot I pointed you at. I'll start the tracking device from his corpse, one of us may be able to take and head down there. But we need to be as fast as we can, otherwise.' There was no room for interpretation there. What of the alternative, then? It wouldn't be likely to be had for they bore no room or reason for it. As much as one crept, there would be another left to suffer after and creep after a while. Those damned things which hid behind the corners. Four of them showed up, small robots which were there to clean. They must've detected the heatless coming from the body in that one cold spot inside their hot room. As soon as they approach, both men back away and let them do their thing. As quickly as it had been or as much as it had seemed to be, the body had a few tubes attached to them, which pushed in it to themselves to their every corner. They drew in every ounce of blood and bloated the corpse with a hot liquid. It didn't matter as he had taken the tracking device and the small communication pellet. 'Keep this onto you. I'll connect it to mine. As long as we both keep it, there won't be a moment where won't be able to talk to one another. Make sure nothing happens afterwards.' Two more moments seemed to come. It wasn't until they left that they opened the hatch and started drawing in. 'It isn't much of a choice though. Do you know how to work the Grid, Pyott? I'm the only one who's able to fix the damn machine down there and open the air vents.' 'I think I'll be able to handle it.' He came closer and seemed to creep over the board. There were buttons there which could be pushed and stroke towards. It wasn't uneventful yet, but there seemed to be some need to try some of the buttons. It was fair enough there, that eight controls over where the maps went came to be. 'One quick moment, just so we'll be set. That box in the socket should be connecting to the source I'm carrying. That way, you should be able to detect me from time to time.' 'Quite convenient, wouldn't you say?' He shrugged and went on the ladder. Likely, it would've been a hard drop which couldn't have been survived otherwise, the hatred of which couldn't be had otherwise by means alone and creeping ever-after. It wasn't likely to be called upon the dread which had been felt by the degeneracy which manifested itself down there. Malfunctioning as well, as it had happened for his communicator to fail, he looked forward and crept by the side. It wasn't so that they would have it any other way, with little pay for their work as it came forward. One access key had been wasted to pass through a tunnel. Would he even know if he had died there? Without a way to speak with him, he would be lost and away. One light blew everything apart, as he had finally noticed the filth he would have to get through. That had been unexpected, at least in the way he had seen in. The pipe stripped down in halves, which looked more or less the same way through which he would've looked. If only there had been a way to get through it and looked at an easier break. So far, there hadn't been a near-sighted vision of which way he would have to take. 'Pyott, Pyott, come in, can you hear me?' 'Yes I can, what do you want to know?' 'There are two pipes down here. Large enough for entry, which?’ ‘The one below you, do you hear? The one below you, take the one below you.’ Though, if the instructions he had given were right, it would at least mean that, through some way, he would have to translate it into going right or left. It wasn’t even clear as how the map had to be interpreted from his side of the grid. But at least he would be aware, something was down there. A sort of strange and sticky partially melted mark which had a scent which didn’t belong in such a moist place, which trailed itself through the pipe on the left. Coincidentally, there was something which would be more than clear, if it came forth to what was going on. Such pragmatism couldn’t have been in his mind but he would dare not look in any other way and by no means alone. The influence of the scent made him choose the obvious choice, despite this being as mad of a pick as it were. Dreadfully aware that something was out there, no standards would be as likely to be had. No one had been aware or would be aware of what had been clouding his judgment of what would creep inside that tunnel. What woe would there be? That one would be as dreadfully aware as to be called upon the notice of a breeder inside that rusted tunnel? It wasn’t what he expected at all. Not unlike before, as he had thought, this looked like something mad, like some delusion his mind had created because of all the silence it bore. Had he been so alone that everything had been a fluke? The certainty was just as likely to be had there. By no means would there be a kind to be looked down upon as he had entered it. But what there had been, it looked closely to the remains of a breeding stock of some malignant spatial insecticides that bore themselves and seemed to have devoured their way through metal and rust until they had gotten where they needed be. No means would look forward or be afraid, paranoid or devoid of many emotions which were there. As cruel as it had been, he felt for them, as he had descended through it. Many of them had become apparent, by the likes of self-cannibalism which had occurred there. The weak ones had been left behind, while the strong ones most likely spread across the entire ship’s system between the enclosed walls. Though it may have been minor, this looked like it could be a problem on the long run. ‘Pyott, I think there’s something going on here. I know it’s strange, but hear me out. I believe I’ve got something going through. There are these things which seemed to have laid eggs, they’re everywhere.’ Every word had been almost cut out, though the message had been left aloud and clear enough to be heard through the small communication device. It seemed likely that the occurrence had been high now, or even higher, as the deeper they descended, the more so it would seem that there was something likely to happen. Either a piece of the ship would crush him under weight or the oxygen would suddenly run off. Speaking of which, Pyott wondered. He had been caught in there for far too long that a delusion would be likely to be there. It wasn’t so, by any means of which the degeneracy of the lack of a means to breathe started. It had been uncertain, for the likes of which couldn’t have been trusted or forced through the mind. He walked around the room blindly and started looking at the corpse with which he was caught inside the room with. He still had his metal skull, or the device which represented its embodiment. It looked like some sort of hybrid, at least the part which hadn’t been melted and welded with a part of his chest. As cruel as it would be likely, his expectations would be met, one way or another, he would be called there, to adhere to the likes of woe, in the meantime where he would know what was wrong with it. Why had the eye socket flickered? It didn’t look normal and he understood why. ‘Get rid of it, stop it now, I can’t deal with this until the oxygen is returned.’ But the screens on the grid had switched from the map to a direct connection of the camera which lay in the exact spot where the shot had been. Its likes were of such manner that there could be no less than expected to be called upon. The wares of war would be met, one way or another, through some kind of average stalking which would drive him to the edge every few seconds. Perhaps that had only been a result of the poor likes of being met by the wage of being dutiful and occupied with what was eating it. Something seemed to have raised itself in the biological part of its own body. Suddenly, as if on a timed motion, it came to show its insides rather than anything of the likes which might've included anything decent in the least. He was aware of what was going on there, even of the likes of the feast. It happened inside of that body, he was eaten by some kind of creeping insides which had dug long tunnels, everything of which had been shown and verified exactly in his mind. Most of the insides looked like they had grown inwards as they made way for those things which grew there. It wasn't that surprising that they could look either way through the glimpses between one side and another. But more surprising it had been that the camera which seemed to keep descending below made way through the tunnels they had dug into. For far too long it had been a black screen which didn't seem to bother him in the least, at least for the likes of which, there wouldn't be any kind of woe. Danger was even less than likely to be had, unless he would be forced to become mad. From all that inquiry, his mind was being atrophied by the lack of oxygen in the room. 'How long until you can start it again? I can feel it getting to my head already. Can't you understand I'm ready to fall here and never get up?' No clear response, it felt as if he hadn't even been listened to, as he had been more than aware of their likes and the many dices which were thrown. Neither of which fell on the sides which would favour him living or getting through. And it was dangerous, to sit there on the filth, straight on the same plane with the body. Especially now that the parasites came out and started moving, not to mention that the entire station was in shambles. Outside their reach and vision, it had looked rather worse. It felt likely that they couldn't be trusted in the least with anything other than what could be called forth. Danger looked as if it had been dry, they had been rummaging through metal, cords and plenty of growth in the vastness of the space until the cry. It came quickly and ended just as soon. True to itself, the poison of which would bear it to be likely, as it would be heard, the battering of the circuits and gates would soon come. For there, in the dark, the star-beings were given birth. They were tall and mighty, paranoid in thought, their humanoid bodies picked up where their progenitor had left, while their star heads were immobile and active at the same time, as their eyes were being formed. Most stood still until this process ended, as they would have to be careful not to grow improperly and die there before they could be deployed. Every now and then, a defect would leave one eyeless or beheaded there, left to rot and never to be recovered. But most of them had started pushing forth as the invasion was in full flight. It was marvelously hidden from the sight of man, as no one would know or even dare for the likes of which, there could be no one less likely to be trusted, if one had to hid away. One would think of say worse things about the woe. Their anger was fluent, but regardless of that, it had gotten worse with time, the likes of which couldn't be even less than benign. Dread came to them, the human beings of the station, until that point where it had come. Over the communication device it came again. 'What's the number here? I think it's fifty-eight. I need you to open the door marked as fifty-eight, do you hear me Pyott? Open, door, fifty-eight. Over.' He had read about that in the ancient books and thought it clever at least. There wouldn't be another way to return in time, there wouldn't be a way for him to return and come over, so this was it. If somehow he had failed to open this one door, there'd be nothing he could do to gloss over and get through. It wouldn't be in the least that there could be anything of the like. But danger came ahead, and soon he would be dead. Paranoid it seemed, he watch as the door opened suddenly, without a single way of release. This would be a feast for the eyes, to watch it undergo as the room was there, suddenly revealed as the tunnel ended. He was somewhat tired, but this room kept more than enough oxygen for him to be released and go over it. As long as he had known, never had he been thrown from the likes of being pushed around. Many devices laid there which reminded him of the blunt force through which he would have to have gone in order to get through. Even so, he would be cruelly aware of something worse than that. A danger which couldn't have been called out yet, he had witnessed a small metal wing come near his throat. It was close enough for him to get beheaded if he hadn't paid enough attention. He felt over and pushed himself against the engine. This would do the trick at least, as he had known that the likely cause of it malfunctioning was that there device, which had a source of power dedicated for itself and no other seemed to be hidden somewhere and disconnected from the main power system. One quick flip and he heard it then, the oxygen machine, as it would be nicknamed, seemed to be working again. No amount of power and time appeared to be called upon there. It was clear that he would be listening and waiting for something there, in the least. One long enough point where there could be nothing else but the fast-going dry receiver. 'I think this should do it.' After being done with sighing, he went ahead and opened a small beer he had in his tiny ransack. By now it would be warm, but the room was cold enough for him to rest for a while until he recovered his strength.

The wing made it so he had to be aware of his surroundings for the time being, only so he wouldn't find himself open to some kind of beheading in the least. That had been done at least, there would be no clear cause of death as long as he was there, in the least, and he could try hinting at the fact that he'd be caught by the means of going forward as he had been afraid. But Pyott had already gotten up and seemed to have tried establishing contact with him. 'Well, can you hear me?' It wasn't the first time a connection fell off, worse than that. He must've been out cold, for the tunnel or the hole he had gone through had been flooded with a thick kind of water. He tried pushing his hand through but it was too thick, enough that it would seem as if he tried pushing his arm through mud. Little more had he known of the disgust and the repulsiveness he felt at that, especially as the degenerate sound came from the intercom. There wasn't any reason to look at the screen any longer, for his had shown just as much as the same, if not murkier and darker than it had been. His fellow was nowhere to be seen. A quick assumption immediately came and had to be justified as fast as he could've placed his thoughts in order. He was dread, either way, he couldn't have made it through without alerting him, and at least, he couldn't have made it as to flee in time. There were no other exits, that he had known and their entire plan, of being guided had fallen apart. But how had there been oxygen then? If those chambers hadn't been closed down there, there might've been a shock which would've killed him. Too much laid on his thought and he had little interest in what he had done. As long as he had been fairly aware of his plans of dread, they had been creped over, through the thoughts he had and how far away from reality he had been. Going down through the open hallway was hard as it was without him hallucinating he had been in a town. There were a few things which had to be said. The chain of delusions, the leaps through the worlds had taken something of a toll on it. Outside, in the world where sanity seemed to be lost, the vessel seemed to have grown to its full extent in the mines, but every single hole had been sealed as to prevent its escape. Now that every man there had been killed by means of gas and others, their minds being completely starved, there had been no living being to be placed inside. It seemed like it had managed to trap itself out of this self-devouring cannibalistic greed. Filth couldn't have been rougher to itself, especially there, especially since it attempted to push itself onto a far more dreadful nature which didn't belong to anything other than itself. That of which had been denied, through which no kind or rite of passage could be trusted as to have been known to it. There was no ritual for it to perform as its death was ready to occur at its own hand and over its own fault. Neither woe had been thought nor could no amount of grown change the fact that it would starve. Despite the many roots it bore, there couldn't have been anything of the kind which reigned over it, the likes of which couldn't have been trusted in its own hands or to its own cruel magnificence which couldn't be overlooked. No man walked there, other than the outside. In a town there no man looked peculiar or even attempted to search for a missing nobody which may have been looked out for. And the fantasy inside had to end as well as a last means to extend its lifetime. For in itself, there was some kind of strange fuel which couldn't have been trusted to be used. The consciousness which were stored in its own brain had to be eaten alive and used for its own means of survival, the kinds of which couldn't be trusted in the least. Now the vile, which might defile, couldn't have been crept in the least, the feast of which would be aghast. It was the likes of which, for those that couldn't have even share the trust they shoved they had. For there, inside the station, which had become a side of town, through which the plane and dirt seemed to have been merged with a giant star had been under siege. Giant gates and many other means seemed to keep them at bay, behind any means of getting through and making it seem likely that they could be caught off guard. It wasn't until they were caught off by the destruction of the one wing that they realised there were intruders amongst their ranks. And they bore their faces and their bodies but only as a weak thing. Behind them, through their backs and through some kind of strange and peculiar things, there appeared to be a strange thing which had to be bore. In a strange kind of repugnance, there crept a like which had to be had, the end of which no one trusted. No man sat there outside. As a matter of fact, there had been some way to end them, to end it. It couldn't continue that way. Two maidens had beaten behind a window still and seemed to move on in peculiar woes, through which there couldn't be trust, for in themselves, there were creeping things which never thought. Never have they been brought by means of filth, by the creeps of whom no one might even closely defile the certainty of woe, the danger of being brought to near-death. For one who flew had his body torn, and one tail did entail some danger as the red growth from its orb seemed to have pushed forward to a magnitude of red, the creeps of which, seemed to have encouraged something which would weep. It spread dangerously aware of its mad surroundings, pushing forward some of its growth only to reveal that it was no real light, the likes of which only had shown itself like some kind of long spiked needles of red. They pushed forward and seemed to have somewhat cut through the air and infected everything around them, including the atoms with the sign of their choice. All of the sudden the red turned into blue and as it happened they fell. Down from their insides, their blood had been revealed as to bear the blue hue which pushed forward and seemed to creep with the likes. Neither man looked away as they drew in from their locked doors, before grabbing Pyott and forcing him back inside with them. Little had been known and fewer than it had been said, there could be naught of the likes, there could be no certainty, for which they wouldn't even be aware. It was cold out there and neither man could complain. For, inside the house, not only was there no fire but there was almost an undoubtedly amount of dread they felt at that moving substance outside. 'Don't get near the door, don't try getting any closer to it, do you hear? There's something out there and I simply cannot even think of anything of the like.' Nothing was nearer to some kind of indifference laid in his eyes, despite his dry chopped lips and the marks of a bleeding gash which had been inside his nose, he had been aware of what was to be of him. A blue mark lay on his neck. Many needle-like prints seemed to have pushed deep enough to leave a round mark which seemed to draw in the skin. 'Hey, you've, you've been....' The silence was there for a neat moment before he turned. 'I know.' Slowly, he moved to the chair and seemed to have been set down. This other fellow which looked bulked enough looked at Pyott and seemed to have been just as unnerved by the likes of him. Neither he nor what he was expecting could've accounted for what was going on there. It was even clearer what was to be, for the likes of which there could be naught but the paranoia he would feel after he'd witness what happened next. As the blue marks progressed in his throat, all of the sudden, his shoulder and a piece of his jaw, which included his skin and a good deal of his face, had been drawn into those holes inside his neck. It didn't matter that the bones should've prevented or that they were there for some reason, that much had been clear enough. Not to mention that dread had been called into action, for which there could be begged at least a reaction. Neither of them moved or shaped their faces as they looked at the dreadful pace through which he acted. With a sudden care, there would be a close sign of near sightedness which seemed to be at peace. He was pulled from every side, from his insides, the body now laid in a position which not only had been unnatural, but as it turned and twisted, its mere act of shaping itself seemed to break the chair from every side immediately and without a remark. Dread laid in the air, now that the man had slowly dissipated in the mark, which, in a dark final, which couldn't have been prevented, had eaten itself into nonexistence. 'This is what happens, you hear? I don't think there's anything of the likes, do you hear me? I don't think there's any way to prevent it if one gets infected by it.' So, as to say, there couldn't be anything less likely than what it had been. 'That's how they got us all, that's the reason we've all been killed so far, in our homes, from the way they managed to snick in. They're suicidal, you see? Their kind just keeps breeding and breeding so they cannot run out but we've learned better.' 'What do you mean by that? Your friend just died here and you don't seem in the least alarmed by that. Seriously, what is wrong with you? Could there be nothing more than this filth you've shown me?' 'There's more to this, just look at that.' He pointed at the window, at some kind of general direction which couldn't have been called into action in the least. How much had he known of it in itself? Neither man, nor woe could be pulled over. A fright had lain in itself, but it couldn't have been trusted there. What had it been? Why was that even which had occurred there? There were lights coming out of the ground in the distance, pale and colourless in appearance, but he knew it to be no light. 'It's those needles you see, the lights keep coming in and out, straight out of the ground. Nothing seems to stop it from creating those things, you see? We don't know from where they get the resources but those filthy flying tails just materialise themselves out of nothing. One day, we fear we may be overrun. Here, eat, drink, conserve your strength, there's enough to last us weeks.' 'And after that?' 'I'll go outside and murder one of my neighbors and we'll get to live a few more weeks.' Pyott's expression seemed to have been caught in some way which wasn't his. They were slightly even more pulled so, their likes being driven to extinction by the filth through which there couldn't have been less of their kind there. It was uneventful, the way they had known it. Dangerously aware of something of it, there was a general dislike of something which carried on. He showed no compassion and no sign that he was only trying to jest. As a matter of fact, he looked almightily serious, at least the way he seemed to be. No danger yet. What else could there be going into this creep's mind? Was he aware of something going on or at least of something of the general distrust he fled? Or, had he fallen to madness? Was there something in the air? 'Begone, now.' 'Get away from that door immediately before he touches you.'He got up, and Pyott follow the motion. Two voices, as there had been seemed to have come.

One long arm with a weird dark blue hue with a texture of pox or some other condition seemed likely to have opened the door. Clearly something had been wrong, it was unlikely to be off in the least, as the matter couldn't have been clearer. It was then that it had entered, not on its own legs but it dragged itself, the winged thing. But it was unlike the one who killed his own, even though that might've not been as far off as it seemed to be. Inside it entered, and then closed the door. Sickly looking and morose, it looked likely to be off, the kind of general distrust which seemed rather benignly trusted to be made and filled with filth. As clear as it had become, this creature couldn't stand. Most likely, it had been its general heaviness which prevented it from doing anything more than what it had begun. With a quick glance, it rose, a heavy body attached, dangling back and forth as it had been held by its two sickly looking arms. Its head had been flattened, the dread had been filled with woe. Unevenly aware that there was something in there, in that diseased mind, clearness had become benign. Something had dazed it, and from a quicker look it had become clear. 'Look, stranger, near its neck. You may want to tilt your head a little but I think you can see it.'Pyott seemed to have been set, not to any kind of danger, not to push way too forward, but to be akin with the likes of pushing forth and falling on himself. He had been aware of something drawing near, the dread he felt and the taste of his own poison in his mouth. What had he chewed on? If it weren't for another implant which had found its way inside, something to it had it neared as it went on and on with the blood. What had fallen off his mouth and what he spat wasn't red but blue. Yet he was too onset onto it to care. And outside, the star faced one seemed to have been caught in a daze as they started sprinting wildly in the wilderness which crept outside their reaches. For some reason they were partially blinded each time those light came off in the distance. And not only that, as it just happened for them to be crept outside their reaches by the mere fact that they were the only ones hearing them go off. It was a deafening experience, worse than it had seemed. More over, those sea-extremities seemed to have found off their way on this plane as well. Though they may have been losing somewhere, the giant eyed planet-like stars seemed to be slowly dissolving and becoming part of the ground, morphing them into nothingness. As the parasites came off, they had no way of dealing with the gravity and the heaviness they felt like they had acquired. It was humiliating in the least, the fealty and the disease seemed to have been much closer to the way it seemed for them to be. One more likely to be attained was the fact that there was dread ahead. Not even closer to the fact had been that there was likely to be that somewhere out there someone feared. Worse so, someone feared and seemed to hold, one pair of glowing forms, which looked like hives, bearing holes, they moved ahead in search for the ones which had felled from the mightiness of the above. Their bodies might've been weak, at least from the looks of them, which only bore the distrust and the disgust which they deserved. But they neared that point where everything had vanished. Even that part of the space had been brought, in the middle of the wilderness, where there was no forest but some kind of place filled with despair and branches but no oaks and tress. There were something close to dunes but they were mobile in nature and seemed to disappear by the wind. In the middle of it, there came nothing but someone took pity of that spot. The nothingness inside of it seemed to be dreadful and aware or the bloated filth which had come out of it. Smaller than what it had been, now there only remained one peak of mountain which had been eaten from each side. From the rear view, it was still nigh impossible to see. Something of the fear seemed to drag to the seeker as he turned around and noticed the sight. Something close or something akin to some filth stairway which twisted and turned seemed to lay there. And on it, there were those sea star-like abominations which seemed to be content over the fact that they stood there, surrounded by safety. They've been encompassed and devoured and were aware that sooner or later they would dissipate as well. It was inevitable and for them there laid neither escape nor any easy way out, as they were weak and had been unable to come forth and lay waste. Upon a closer inspection, there seemed likely for them to have been something close to being benign. One of those killing fliers came into a charge, pushing its needles ahead in some mad attempt only to be met by complete annihilation. Yet from the distance, as the light bearing fiend had looked, there were rats scurrying underneath their mad hold. They were kept hovering and under the illusion that there would be some complete destruction from every possible side. Doomed, doomed, as they had been, they awaited their fate and somehow still managed to find entries as to where to go forth and slide into the nothingness which surrounded and to die off into the unknown. They had been a sight to behold, for their brethren had gathered from somewhere around the forest in strange leaps and marches and the needs for which no cruelty could be called in action. No one begged for a second reaction as it happened for them to meet eye to eye. It looked as if their wars had ended and one side had triumphed over the other. But it had been a bitter-sweet victory, as, despite all of them being at war with one another for centuries, most of the battles had been encompassed between the ones which had been entrapped. These were the ones which had no deal but to come and witness their destruction. And in their lack of flight, they came to look up at them and what they had become. For those below would fall pray for the rats and other rodents which would eat and devour some kind of fiend of despair in the least of sense and thought, as the mad would rise by the bottom of their feeding tracks.

Certainty be woe, it rose, the first of the star humanoid who had come. In the area he had arrived, he looked upon them, how passive they were and the maddening wretch it was, he rose to himself and seemed to give in the cruelty he had to himself. In that open vent where he could act unattended and unharmed by the vile limitations, he leaped and started pushing his head inside one of theirs. Dread was the first to come as the body started being wretched and creep forth. It was uneventful for the first forty seconds, it was worse. There was another mad event there, there his head suddenly had proven it wrong as had merged with the star which lied below. Could this attempt be called a failure if it had achieved this symbiosis through the maddening sphere of dread? No amount of cruelty could be right, at least not there, not in the least, not for their likes, not for what awaited that of which seemed to sniff around the brushes and eat around the cowl. Its stench had come and most of the humanoid limbs had been occupied by most of the mass the star had. It achieved somewhat of an original form as the edges had pushed through the shoulders and through the knees. There, it communicated with the others through the signs and called forth, in the distance with a howl. As they would come, on by one, as invaders, the mindless star humanoid would be clueless that this wasn't one of theirs. If anyone were to survive this new plane which was at least unforgiving, they would have to get in all the help they needed in order to survive. An assistance of the mad would be cruel in the least, for the madness and cruelty of the inbred race carried on. One by one, they started possessing bodies of their own, pushing themselves forth and being looked down upon by those who were pure. And by the time everything had come to an end and that small pocket of dark space where nothing could exist ate itself to the point of no return, they had done it. Far more dangerous than what they had originally believed, it looked likely that there could be nothing done for far more dangerous reasons. Careful in their extracts, it seemed likely for them to be there. Small spaces in the air, where they would cut and spread, the dread and the essence of that cruel spot refused to go entirely. Instead of disappearing there, it took over atoms and started taking parts. With that said, if too many of them clustered together, all of the sudden, around the entire area, small holes would suddenly appear and bring down either a flying creature, three, or it would get through a house and kill a man out of the sudden as the cluster of the dark spatial atoms would crept inside his brain. 'Pyott, that's your name if I understand correctly?' He nodded and refused to pay too much attention to it. There was something there. In the way it spoke. Fear ran brightly but it ran off immediately. 'I bear no toxin so fear me not, I am just a mere watcher at that. Interested if what you bear.' That voice broke off into the nastiest shout and screeches as its mouth extended to a magnitude of sheer terror. Its wideness had been as widespread in every direction as it might, the body had been completely destroyed and from its behind, the door had been obliterated with a quarter of the door. Instead of it, there laid another of those small metal, wide-like hallways which had manifested themselves out of nowhere. The pandemonium had barely started. It was in the likes of which there could be no terror for the likes, the dread of which could no longer be thought to be closely related to what had seemed near. In that near-sighted awe, there was some dread and the smell, the scent of iron. The door opened and it was time to enter, somewhat close to what he had thought of a plan to exit and make their way through, there wasn't even something there. Just a way to sit and wait, perhaps with some light, as soon as they had entered, a door behind them closed and the first set of sprays had come upon them. Various gases seemed likely to be in awe, and push forwards for their likes alone were near the edge of trying to drown their filth and sorrow. It wasn't even for the fifth second that he had survived. And this fellow whom stood besides Pyott had turned into one of those fliers himself before he revealed his disguise and the skin of the man it bore. How was it that the dreaded thing had gotten this near? It couldn't have been by chance alone, that he would follow or that he'd see what he saw. As painful as it looked, there seemed to be a burst from his right arms. Before even looking he had realise it had been one of his fingers which had burst and had revealed at least eight small insects which had made their way inside the base of it. Those things would've grown and would've most likely been wasted under any other circumstance. Likely as it had been, there was something near the dread they felt. Pain was only the start of it as the viral thing had frozen some kind of trail of blood from which his finger had degenerated. 'What are you insects? What were you insects doing in my arm?' They had attempted to crawl and without a doubt, they had planned on possessing him in his entirety of being. Now that the gasses had seemed to cleanse what had remained of his body, he ran through the corridor which opened and entered the base below. Immediately light came wide. Some closed immediately and instead of them, there came a scanner. Most of the room had been lit by green lines which spread from every side of the room. As they came, they left the impression or even the feeling that there might've been some kind of floating blocks of dark out there. It was unimpressive in the least, the madness and the feast of which might've come to a pass. Dread was unimpressive there, as no one could even have a certainty of what was going on in there. But he had seen them there, as likely as it had been, he had seen them act and be that way, in the least of chance, in the same way he had looked through the block between them. Many faces which belonged to the men standing there appeared to lay in there, for their likes alone seemed rather cheerful in their mad awakening. Less than likely, as it had looked that way, there seemed to be no cruel woe, there was fear amongst them, as they looked through the floating blocks. Pyott moved and they watched, cheering in silence, laughing as if watching some rat go through some maze. And that's what it had been to them, from the outside, they could see the many paths and many rows he had no idea how to traverse. Of how much they knew of what was going on outside, he couldn't have been sure. But there was another mad competitor who bore himself tall and fat. He hadn't seen him as of yet, but he had been aware of something at least, the need to look into it, the least of chance of how he might come to be. A dreadful awareness came to mind there, as he knelt and dodged and managed to see. It was a tall man, who bore the head of the star. He had seen this thing for the first time but it looked likely to kill as he swung at the air and crept behind some unsuspecting creep. It was aroused by its own needs of pain and madness. Somehow, as it followed through, the tunnels seemed to stretch into themselves, pushing forward and making it so there couldn't have been anything less likely that what it had been. A mere false target which had risen there, which sounded and acted like the boar of a hunt, which had proceeded to run away as it was chased. There was no sight, it wasn't right. No amount of cope could take it away that the thing he went after wasn't a boar but a man just like he had been. That entry, or that way he had went by opened a door for him to get away and not return. It wasn't even likely that he would be protected against what was going to happen next. Without a doubt, he would get betrayed by his own senses as he would seem so. It wasn't long there, that he had looked not at the dark and not at the likens but from the tall spot of having stood above himself yet. He had been the star-shaped fiend which searched for the man. Somehow that happened and somehow, even more surprising, he had felt a rage which surpassed whatever he had felt before. That thing he chased wasn't a man, it was something sub-human, beneath him, something which had to be exterminated and filled with dread as it gave into the chase. His arms broke in and pushed and broke through the various formations of the walls which lay around him. No amount of fright or of the dread seemed likely to be head. It wasn't even likely that he had seen himself in the same manner he had been. Just in the same manner as it had been, there was some kind of haze there. And they laughed at it, and seemed to rub themselves in their distrust and their disgust and woe. Outside, the world seemed rather peaceful in contrast. Those who weren't flying during their times to scout seemed likely to lay there, resting in their wakes, dreadful aware of what had seemed to be their won. No amount of darkness could spread over the degenerate feeling which lay in the air. Something had happened with the particles which laid in the air, much benign, just floating there and waiting. They had degenerated the field in some mad way, through which the air felt cold, then hotter, the colder again for no reason whatsoever. Just a few more feet in and it seemed likely for them to have been that way. No amount of fear seemed likely to be had. Some dread was nearsighted at first but their faith had lead them astray. Those heathens had hidden beneath the church and waited as the beacon carrying creature approached. It was the sound of the mad choir at the bottom of their stairs, the basement tunnels seemed to have opened, leaving but a hunch of a cold air and nothing more going forward instead. From there, many of them started marching forward and screaming and shouting forth, pushing and trying to escape after looking at the brackets of wooden planks which formed the floor above them. Between their edges came many rays of light which fell from above and pushed downward. Cruelly woeful, to say in the least, there was something akin to a dark feast of thoughts which never surpassed what was likely to be. A dreadful nature might've been to it there, for, as it came, it rolled the open door like some filthy rug and threw it away. The entrance was dusty, the way below was slightly downwardly shallow, but it managed to get forward through some way. Less likely than what it might've been as well, there was some kind of delight which seemed to be living in their minds. Two more distractions seemed to be that way, one of two, three of likes, dread wasn't common at all. Feat would seem more than so, to flood with their likes and end them right there. Two hordes of sitting men, their women fed rats in their mouths, dead and foaming out of their noses. Children laid by their side, farther into the dark, their fates being much worse than what their mothers had to suffer, as there seemed to be pools and other limbs which either looked too long to be normal or they had been ripped apart with much force. The gore and the madness seemed likely to be sad. Unlike what it had looked like, there was certainly some kind of fear and delight. Their fates weren't in the least right, as the song went on, there was a fear which was much more than freightless in nature. Such was it that the beacon-fiend ignored the men, who were alive kneeling and watching thoroughly as if they had been looking at some kind of deity of the depths. It wasn't near-sighted as it seemed the dread and supreme angst which lay supreme there. More so, it was uneventful that it crept in their minds, the likes of which had never occurred to them, dark, dark fiend. It dragged its tail and ribs beneath the cowl. It descended through the tunnel as it looked for the men who tried getting away with their wives and children. 'Why are you defending them when that's what I so desire? I demand that sacrifice be made, the likes, I need it to be held in it to itself so I may once light the beacon brighter. I need to look for others out there, but unless you heathens give in to it so I may hear the song of the unruly, I may not look the other way.' That was even closer to what it had appeared. Nay, the men screamed, there was no piety and no fear and no delight in their voices, only woe. That dreadful thing wasn't like anything which had looked aware. Dread and certainty wasn't like what had looked like it, the certainty for which there seemed, fear might reign and feign and feel. Not only that but the likes of which never could be held accountable for their own fates. As he had come into the catacombs down there, he had found something he had feared as well. There were the men who had given their lives and had impaled themselves into the spires of the surrounding mazes, unclear as to whether there could be the likes. It wasn't so, never to have been told or what had been felt by others. The closer he came to them, the better the echoes came to his ear, the fear that he might be likely to dread another day came to pass. It was at least some kind of must to have been known, the words thrown. Such a wasted chance, that it had been likely to lay in awe. In a second chance, there was at least some chance to lay it so. The abuse that came into the beacon's fiend's mind couldn't have been expelled from its mind. Unclear, whether or not it had been said, there was still danger to be had. It wasn't so that there was some fear as the stones fell. Was it all a ruse and a trap? He barely moved in time to avoid being in pain and be afraid of what could or might happen. There wasn't any type of clue he might've had there of whether or not he could escape so many of the sides falling. But as soon as he had dodges, there came no more rock or woe, only metal as it had revealed itself, another one of the metal cylindrical, squared corridors which had begun manifesting themselves everywhere. But this one had been different as it opened quickly and out of it came some kind of worm-like metal defiler, with rubbing spikes coming out of its mouth. And they had been brown and covered in oil, and they seemed to push forward some kind of a wretch and some dread which was unlike any other that had seemed benign. It wasn't so the first time it went over, but likely, as it had been, there was an exploit, there had been a sign of sin. It wasn't like anything yet. There wasn't any fear there, just the contempt of having been learned of what it really was like. A slave, a filthy mongrel of metal which wanted to push forward and devour. As of then, it went forward for the bodies of the men and had acquired a taste, a smell and a preference for them, the like of which there couldn't have been anything less likely than the fright and the might and the sin of cowering woes. And it went down from above, pushing and wrecking the many masses below itself, crushing the bodies as to batter their meat. From the spires they fell, rather cut and bloodied, more so after they had been acquired for the likes. It wasn't even close to being so, the mental disturbance which had been felt. Much of its arrogance had shown itself, as the beacon fiend didn't run away but chose to turn around and get farther inside, in order to find those wretches which had been hidden and taken away. This strange anomaly had been taken and considered to be some kind of blessing, at least from his point of view. It wasn't in the likes of being the way he had been. Unfairly thought, he had rummaged through the catacombs, furthering and avoiding the falling chunks as more of those metal tunnels materialised themselves in the same way. It would be quite uneventful to look at it any other way. But there was danger in the eyes of that fiend, a far deeper agony than it would've been expected. And as the catacombs seemed to have been stretched underneath the town outside, so had Pyott found himself underneath, going by his own needs, breathing deeply through the core and the arrogance and the woe. Likely to have been said, there wasn't any certainty whether or not there would be a choice to have been taken there. Dread seemed to breathe down its shoulder. He looked behind only to have seen those malignant turned curved plates. In some way, they looked like the long keys of a piano, stretched to their final reaches, made of metal, sharpened to a blade. They would cut deep, if only they touched him with the least of disparity. Unlikely that it saw him yet, he stood there, kneeling slowly, watching it drip its oil and dirt from inside its mouth. This one had dug inside from farther away. He could see, despite the tunnel in which he was, which lay in darkness that from the hole beneath the ground came a light. And that light had been strong and brought a nastiness which couldn't be deciphered by no means alone. Could it be that there was, by any cruelty of existence that it hadn't had a clue that he was there? No man could look such a beast in its face or the box which it had bore and live to say he hadn't live without a near-death experience. Then, it left, without any kind of noise, without danger, without a concordance or at least any kind of strangeness which bore itself there. Though he might've attempted to lie there, in a sight which wasn't like any of it, he bore himself through some kind of rubbing as to push himself slowly into the hole. He would have to push harder in order to keep himself from falling and breaking a knee, for the drop would be long and it would harm him. Dread couldn't be called in action, he would be no reaction whatsoever from the likes of woe. Nothing was right there, nothing indeed, no amount of certainty or the fear which might be lightly taken as a means to an end. He fell. And from that fall, he survived, as he had felled on something soft and into a pool of blood. There were torches which had been lit inside a circle, which had formed some kind of strange, forming sensation. The near-sightedness of danger and of death came again. As Pyott ran and leaped away, he saw the torches falling, not by themselves but triggered by a trip wire. 'What's this?' As he looked behind, the pool had been lit but not enough of the trail had enough of the amalgamation of liquids to lit him as well. This thing which rose out of it let itself burn out and immediately extinguished itself only to revealed a piled of filthy formed bodies which were charred and walked unevenly. Those things moved and vibrated and alarmed the thing there, the metal worm which came from above and landed on top of them and pushed forward, trying to get at it somehow. Not even remotely close to it, as it seemed likely for it to get at itself, that he hadn't wasted the opportunity and had gotten away. More over than the way it had been, there would be no getting away now. No pain, no danger, for he would be no stranger to the likes of woe. Many of the chambers were laid there, opposite to one another, pushing forward, and the likes of which couldn't have been asked for any of the like.

Even remotely said, there weren't enough traps laid there to amount for a single one of the amorphous metal creatures which made those tunnels. No, they had to have another purpose down there. The beacon fiend knew something, it looked for something which had at least some kind of importance to be used. By no means whatsoever could it be thought or could it be wasted. No amount of time shall it be called into action, for the likes of which could be tasteful and discerned. Worse than that, it had become apparent that there could be, for no means, for no likes, for no approach, the thing which had seemed closer to the spot. A tumor was growing beneath the earth, and it just happened to be adaptable for anything there. That's what the beacon fiend tried looking for. That is why he tried to search for those vile things, those insufferable creatures which weren't even close to being human then, the cowardly beings known as women. As they hid away, their very essence kept that tumor alive. It was only a reflection of the real world and how many of those creatures had infected and had wreaked the vessel by their weakness and the malignity they bore into themselves, the whoredom and the filth they brought. How could such a dead end come to be? In the heart of the passage, like a cold mine waiting to be flooded with some kind of harder air, there was a severity of some kind which was utmost closed and signed. To itself it may have been known and liked even less. Fewer than expected, it just happened for one to look even closer to what it had been. Small particles lay chewed on both far ends. Something was being worked right in front of their eyes and it looked likely to last for a longer while. At least in the few minutes they waited, a few layers of dirt seemed or appeared to be less kind, to be pushed away and fade. They fell off as those tiny things continued digging themselves deeper inside and pushing forth. Such a degenerate act was less likely to be had. It was at least as dreadful as it had looked liked. No amount of cope could be even likely to be had. In those moments through which sounds came to be, there were a few close calls in which they hid. Whatever beast of creature or magnitude of torsion seemed to turn the tunnel in some kind of blasted furnace, now it had laid in a ruin. The walls were no longer straight, a partially made cone had seemed to be lowered even deeper in the depths from a way which was in the least unknown to most of them. Such was it that the head laid distracting and made even less for an action which may at least be known. For a few moments, it wasn't known, at least not for the likes. Dreadfully aware of their hiding, the beacon fiend trashed the placed and seemed to have broken whatever part, be metal or stone with the likes of a beam which produced just enough heat to be able to melt and turn and twist and destroy. Not even remotely aware of what was going on, there was some fear and some dread. Nothing else was said there. By the means alone, there couldn't be denied the likes. For, how far he had managed to get through wasn't even close to the feeling of uncertainty he felt once he had managed to slip in his beacon and melt through some steel-like foiled side, hidden inside a rock. Something which may have melted through appeared to be even less than likely to have been as dangerous as it appeared to be. For one dreadful side of it appeared to be even closer to failure, than the likes of it truly seemed. That's how it happened for one dreadful moment in which, for the likes alone, his was the weapon which did break through that spot. And from it came a gaseous apparition which spat its dark mark and seemed to bear some kind of mark, with its red eyes and gleam and thin, almost tasty fragrance which bore itself over the kin. No amount of wait did seem, nor had it been likely to have come from within, that it suddenly turned over and avoided his likes. He would not die over, not there. Even though that creature melted and ate through the metal once it had combined itself with the musky air from the catacombs, it suddenly appeared, from within itself, to have pushed forward and to have defiled itself and everything around it. Much of the dirt turned into a spongy form, which hardened at the look and touch. No fewer than what they had been, the many woes which pushed forward seemed likely to be aware of him. Some laughed, other danced around, and the gas remained. The men which lay on the floor hadn't, once their dance were over, they fled, others fell, but it was almost as if it was there. It was almost as if this union between gasses carried over every place, with little certainty and little evil to him. Not so that it looked in awe, there was a certainty, in which they defiled the looks and expectations. How so, it might've been, that less likely, darker than it thinned. Or so it started, once the bodies started eating themselves from their insides out. A fewer number of cases seemed likely to have been called into action there. Dreadful, as the agony lay in store, they could take the pain no longer. They could trust no one around and look at fewer ones who laid there. Who were those invisible strangers, what had happened there? In this chaos where they molded reality, where the sky had broken apart and seemed to have connected itself to the ground, it almost looked at if the star fiends were called back. Yet they walked aback, on the sky as if it had been a platform rather than anything else. No so, less likely than it had been, there would be agony from within. Nowhere near, any would fear the likes of those whom fled. Most of them had already been dead. Once they had reached a point in the sky, for some reason, they started falling like flies, one by one, almost boycotted by their own agonies. How was it that they had been so, less likely to have called upon themselves as to what they hid from, nowhere near their own fright and leisure, of the ones who never thought. 'They brought this on themselves.' The men said, as they formed their council in the catacombs. The women stared and cried and begged and did what they knew best of. They tried seducing what they knew of but had failed, as someone had made sure to carve them where it mattered. Little was known about the practice and who had done it. But as it just happened for them to know, there was some kind of agony as well as some kind of drift between one another, less so for one which bore himself forward to be a man. There would be less of a kind there and more or a turn. It wasn't unlike him to stare any other way through the small holes in the bottom of rocks after he had taken and turned them around, but that thing had been a new occurrence. At least, the same patterns had occurred somewhere else, Pyott thought. Less than likely to be dismissed by the ones he had looked into, there would be fewer than usual kinds of distraught images which course in his mind. What he had blamed than occurrence was rather the chance in which it had been likely that a part of the gas which had been hidden inside the core of the rock he had picked up seemed to have entered his lungs, riposted momentarily through him. No matter the costs, there would be no less and no kind of man who would lie that way. The freight seemed to come at a great cost and uncertainty, to say the least. On the long road, a long time ago, he had remembered how hard it had been for him to climb through the ranks in an attempt to get somewhere and do something of worth. It was strange and surreal at least, to think about it now, to think about it here, but he had remembered the people who had met him, who'd spoken to him and what they've done to him. Never had he the time to reflect and understand what it of their lies was. They were there, in one way or another, looking out for him, dreadfully aware of something which had been hidden over his shoulder. Those who remained seemed peaceful at an end. Though he may not have been able to confirm or deny their deaths, there was a certainty there, that it had been quick. Something really hurt in his chest as he had thought of the many times he had almost had himself be forced out of the positions he'd muster. Fright and dismissal came to be, a draught of ages, misdemeanors happening and crimes on the bottom tier of the ship. Oh, how he had missed those, how he had been part of the gambling circles, the heavy smokers and those who'd gang on one another in order to take their unearned share. It was with those men that his heart belonged, not at the very extremity of order. In a way, he had liked it there, as, past a few more feet away, he almost felt the scent of some on-going smoke, like the kind of a cigar. There wasn't even a great cost there, but the trouble he had felt, the likes of which haven't been given or forced on themselves. It was there that he met one. Such a poor soul, which had lived the life of an outlaw stood there, with a cigar near his throat, with one in his month, boasting for the likes of which, there would be no certainty, nor any kind of woe there. The air still had the scent despite him smoking such a short blunt which had been barely unlit. It wasn't even likely, the way it had been, the way it had looked and feared onto itself. It flung itself farther away, angst for the likes. Such a frightful woe, dreadful in appearance came.

Out of nowhere, even, as it came in such a dress of a magnitude which wasn't its own. Such was it that it bore clothes made out of black wool. The helmet which bore that of a skull, or some face which had either grown or manifested itself like a chunk of meat on top of it. Much of what was said was unclear come from its mouths. Those small things that came out of it, as it had formed a tower of smaller heads. Even as it happened in front of his eyes, Pyott couldn't believe it at all. It wasn't like what he had thought. It wasn't likely that he had been there, as a matter of fact, he had been somewhat resigned to the defeat it showed. This creature was no fighter, and the way it presented itself was peculiar, to say the least. As to say and show, out of the smaller mouth which belonged to the face on the skull came another one which opened its mouth to reveal another smaller head which did the latter. It formed some kind of small magnificent thing which bore itself out and provided the scent of pheromones. Little could be said about the being underneath the skull, for it bore a cloth and a crown and a dark robe, which hid unto itself as a matter of fact, in the rightful approach which bore itself that way. Such a mad jolt it had been that it started being approached. Many others such like him had been there, and only now they stepped out of the dark. It would be unclear whether or not he could do something with himself that way. Unable to defend himself by any other means, he only cared for himself there. Pyott wanted to look right and unashamed of what he's done. But he had taken the body of the man he had known and flung it against these things. They ejected themselves rather peacefully, in ways they hadn't known of or about. Such a thing was rather clear to them. Much of it had been that they, as he ran or as he had begun his sprint through the catacombs below, he had realised that there were certainties which couldn't have been met any longer. No longer could they have been known to him, his thoughts being uncertain, them being met. Expectations of the graves he would lay in and more importantly, the fact that they followed. It wasn't like anything of the like, the dread and fear, the fright of the masses, the dreadful arrogance which had been displayed looked rather uncommon at all. Somehow they wouldn't be as quickly dismissed by only a corpse, on the contrary as well. As weak bodies as they appeared to be, they seemed to rose up from their places on the ground and carry the body with them. It didn't take long until, from its mouth came another one of those small towers, which pushed forward and flailed in their peculiar probing kind of wails. From the noise, there came aroused, one stranger which found himself there in the same trajectory as Pyott had just mere avoided the charge from. It was a moon shaped fiend who came and was immediately stopped. Not as if he was to trample down underneath them, but it looked likely that he would be stopped one way or another. It was fright which seemed to lie in its eyes once it realised where it lay. On top of a mount of those small things which felt like growing mushrooms, it felt itself be encompassed and overran. And from this sudden encounter it raised up and opened a maw, such as had never been seen from the star-shaped head, from it coming one of the tallest one which had regurgitated them from. But it wasn't where it stopped. That had been only the first step of their evolution, from the depths there came stings and from behind them came wings. Those things weren't possessed or anything but only had kept them warm, like living embodiments of eggs, until they hatched. From the process came the flight, the might of which didn't seem like it had made it any less likely than it had seemed to be. But there they were other flying abominations which now inhabited the catacombs. And once the breeding ones had done their task, it only took the span of a few moments for more of them to appear and to grow out of them. More and more often, had it happened that their benign intrusion was to be. No less than what it had appeared to be, there would be dread filled inside, as they were getting ready for the flight inside the upper tunnels. Holes eroded above them as to make clearer ways for them to get through, it wasn't even obvious, nor was it safer than it had appeared for itself to know. The draught had only come once it rose to itself and grew taller. The tumor was only getting stronger and its filth only affected everything. For none of the madness or at least not at this extent would've happened if it weren't for its growth. Such power had only spread through every crevice and every side which had ever appeared around, making no difference and no woe, the likes of which couldn't have been dealt with. Somehow that's how it came to be, that the nasty protrusion had somehow made itself be known. One of its dire horns, red and marked and charred with a shell which couldn't have been exploited had appeared and had pushed through a layer of the ground, impaling a corpse in the process. Such was its might that it broke through everything it could, get at it, imprinting what it had on the certainty of the vile. No creed would come to be, if it were for itself to know and to fling itself into the daze that came out of it. For as soon as there was enough space between its horn and the empty space which lay around it, a red haze, the daze and the gas had started popping out into its small room. Though it had been just another enclosed spot inside the ground, this living organ had managed to kill every semblance of life, whether it is in any shape or form, or even the tiniest worms which so happened to be there. Not only had that but the worms which had once gathered in masses been turned into some kind of soup of rings in which it bathed. Most of their texture had been printed on its horn, making it seem like some kind of stronger worm itself, with as many rings as it could bore. No amount of certainty could be denied, regardless of how hard it tried. No amount of corruption could guide the blind towards the spot it hid. For that's how far into the ground it hid. 'Clear, clear, make my woe, let me enter, see through the row.' Said the fiend with the beacon, as it entered the rang. The crevices had been bent, already there had been a bent above, through which the sky had been annihilated by normal means. No light came from the ground and it seemed that the farther below they went, the lower the sky fell. There would and there could be no hope for it yet. A far closer depth had come out of it, the poor embrace. The fool had been there waiting, a pair of men who didn't follow. As they looked above, they saw their precious homes as being flattened by some force. There were clear delimitations in the sky, ends which shouldn't have been there at all. Dreadful agonies which lasted far beyond repair and for the likes of which there couldn't have been a chance at all for redemption. For itself alone, there was no attention being given or having been left. Who was that foul thing which looked at them from its mouldering remains? It had been the likes of a vile thing which came from what had seemed to be the sky. From its insides there came, a growling head, with a small body which bore limbs out of it, wriggling in pain. But it was no real pain, only the magnitude of its frustration it felt as it just happened for it to be there in the unknown. Far from being said, there was naught whom lay dead or as cruel, as it had been, the way it landed and it wrapped itself against one man before it devoured him. And that cruel fiend, the villain had eaten the man before coming to its senses and realising that more of its brothers were on their way. They seemingly started digging their mad tunnels and pushed through the very ground over which they loomed. No amount of wonder and distrust seemed peculiar in the least, the likes of which couldn't have been trusted in the least. Dread lay of a magnitude which couldn't have been postponed. Many men who lay out there in the open now, whom had been forced out of their houses seemed to lie there, dreading that another one of them might suddenly turn and come to their senses. In which case, there would be no amount of arrogance which could be felt or drawn from it. No amount of cope could distract them from what was going on. Those mad fiends were clever, they were outright intelligent, at least to a very mad point where it couldn't be denied that they had managed to force themselves through the various holes like some madly ticked moles that were wretched and looked madly through above them so they might not be followed. One brave man had begun sliding through, as he feared the likes of another person who lay besides him, the likes of which could be anything but trusted. Another man followed by yet another fellow seemed to come, from the state of which that could be anything but be called into practice, he had been jabbed, stabbed, the cutthroat had managed to sting him from behind. It was deserved by some means, survival had been more at the stake of which neither clever, neither dumb fiend could think of anything in the least. As dreadful as it started to be, there was a cruel woe, there was a dexterity with which, after having pushed the knife, he slid into his body like some specter. They had spent too much of their time outside, to the point of them no longer being either human or men. This strangeness and this woe turned them into some cruel things which rose to their own senses and seemed to walk unnervingly as meat suits, ringed like the creatures who ruled the depths of the ground. Not even remotely close to what it had been expected, there was some malignant thing which rose there. In the depths of earth, from the growth of the tumor pulsed something even more ferocious than some gas, as it happened for some tiny amount of growths to just happen to appear in the air. As they floated in their bloated states, chains of meat ensured that out of the tumor they would be properly fed and keep growing. It wasn't even in the likes of which, there were the dreaded things which couldn't be liked. No matter how they looked upon themselves, as they opened their eyes and started into one another's woe, they couldn't be trusted. It was a must, the likes of which made them fear one another. In the likes alone, they had some form of consciousness, it was benign, flawed, and mad, it made them aware of themselves and of their own sad existence, but at the same time it acted like some ruling power which drew them towards one another. Such was it that, there was some cruelty to the fact that they attacked one another, like some kind of mad fiends, the dexterity of which couldn't have been even remotely called into action. Worse than that, they started charging madly, through the reigns of their mad gases at one another, plunging forward and breaking themselves as their mad charges ended forth. In their retreat, there came no word. Not a single thing seemed to be called upon, only the dread malignance of them being left alone. As for whom was left alive, they weren't living to begin with. Such like viruses, they bred and seemed to taint one another, forming together bonds, like some malignant lovers, who were inseparable, when in reality it was a union of dread. The agony of pain felt worse than the offspring of an incestuous relationship, from which the result was something which looked malformed, deformed and the likes of which couldn't be looked upon. It wasn't even clear whether or not it could be trusted there. No dreadful sight could prevent the others from seeing them form. Too much of that clotted blood which pumped into one alone had doubled. They were like mad balloons there, floating and being bloated, being pushed forward and acting disgustingly as they had been aware of themselves. Again, no amount of certainty was there, no amount of distraction could take away from that sight. As they kept growing and growing, reaching magnitudes which weren't even in the likes of normal human growths ended up as being benign. They blew up and spread those long tubes which fed them, drawing in the air. Darkness was for the likes of which, nothing would be fair. As a matter of fact, there was a cruel certainty there. It wouldn't be called into action, but seeing how their mad lives would continue, they chose to charge into one another. And as they formed pairs of thirds or fourths, it looked unevenly so, that they could be cruel and forced into woes. More died, far more bloated in their small spot in the pocket of the earth. It wasn't even likely that they could be pressured into it, but their agony was alone to bear. Even more of them had been given birth. No cruelty could have been forgotten, no agony and no amount of distinct behaviour be called into action. As their reaction alone was more than enough to prevent anyone from even attempting to outside the others, for, by the time there would be only one left while the other off springs were growing out of that tumor, there would be nothing left for them to see or look at, there would be naught of less. Throughout their short spans they have learned how to understand the pain their brethren had gone through and after a few generations of morbid obscurity in the depths, some had chosen to survive and lay themselves buried as deep into the passages and through the ground as other tumors had been. Uncertainly called into action was the echo this bore through the catacombs above it. As no amount of purity may shelf itself from being defiled by that of which laid there, in the heart of the earth, where no living thing may yet to live. It came soon that the living gasses around the earth had already been dispelled or assimilated, including that small noxious smile which bore itself the sign of death. Its death had come into the agony only that of which a cloud could feel. To have you absorbed by the likes of an intruder this held no scent and was invisible to the common eye. For it that had been the ultimate insult to the injury it felt, the agonising sight of seeing something so dreadful dissipate as if it had been the mere puff of smoke coming from a pipe dread was indeed the utmost representative of their fates being endlessly forced to be dismissed into the lack of pleasure and suffocation. No more would they approach the walls, for they were sticky with the filth which grew. No longer could anyone get any closer to themselves without risking of merging together. Far, far, far in the catacombs, men had felled under that malformation, that unnatural thing which tied them to one another, with no obscure thought having forced them to lie ahead. Many of them weren't dead, but seemed to be vaguely caught within one another, at most conjoined like twins. It stopped at the arms and legs, for their faces touched and there appeared to be no reaction. The attention those hermits, those pagans, heathens seemed to be rather calm. As soon as it happened, they appeared to drag themselves to each prison in the catacomb and wait there, for some eruption to appear out of nowhere and end there in an instant. Nothing, nothing came out of it. Neither woe could look past their shoulders and tell them death might be coming for either one, for that wasn't certain. In fear, they looked past the slits and seemed to notice that there was someone who undertook the role of a warden. How much had it mattered that he was no real warden? What of the fact that he was one of their? A single man who had much bulkier, stronger, taller then the rest of them, whom walked shirtless to reveal a tan on his exposed chest. Over the neck, there had been a scar, and from the looks of the other frailer man attached to him, and the likes of which his head dangled in some other direction, it looked like he had been immediately killed there. Now, he would only have to rot so they wouldn't have to deal with the abuse. So they thought, unclear and uncertain of the deranged ability to look past itself, there was some uncertainty there. It would seem likely that they were rather caught into their own selves to pay any attention to their surroundings. It was confusing as it came to be, but their brains would start slowing down on both sides. Regardless of that degeneracy, the warden, as dumb as a lout as he had looked, didn't appear to slow down by any means. Not cognitively, nor would his muscle mass desires of spread evenly between the two of them. It looked almost as if he had been devouring his conjoined brother, only adding to himself. It looked like the poor fellow, at least, judging from his clothes, looked like some kind of librarian, with a pair of glasses which lay broken and almost engraves in his skull. The amount of force which had been needed to achieve that was way beyond anything that could be called into action. No dread was felt there. But likely, as it sounded, the warden had little if no renewed interest in what was happening to them. How come they would look alike that way? Without fear, at the man who had defeated the disease? He acted less like a warden now, and merely held his own time over. He was waiting for something, trying to track someone, trying to look for that one person who had escaped one of the holes in the prison sections there. Pyott, though his name may not have been known, it was clear who he was tracking. Those foot prints looked mightily familiar in the least. Those there the laces of a man, not two, not one who had been dragged near him, no heavy weight to fully leave the marks on the ground. Those were soft marks, left by a single man, left by a man who hadn't been accustomed or forced to take part in the condition they all shared, and this was disturbing to him. Brute with a long skull and dirt brown hair, lacking something near normal teeth or any, but having had revealed that he had acquired a second pair of teeth behind his. Such was it that the absorption had taken place, to the point of having been forced to lie so. In his own tracks, he had seemed to be entertained by the idea of lacking any real knowledge of his prey. But he charged and he went and he had found something of this Pyott, whoever he was, he had made a mess in his track. Wherever he went, there seemed to be something which lay broken in the greatest retreat possible. It wasn't even clear what it might've been so. Fewer moments passed, and it was all going to be less than benign in the way they looked and how they shook in their places as they spotted the warden. The heathens passed. Such was it that there, in the reflection of the bitter-sweet walls, that their cowls suddenly become aware of themselves as they were given some shape of life unlike anything other which had previously existed before. Their likes alone seemed to be there, in some way or another, for the likes alone couldn't be called into action, no wonder may distract from their sight. It was in their small fragmented nods and knots which formed them that brain matter started forming, being surrounded by some liquid which allowed them to live. Not even so, as it happened, were they alive or mindful of their own, merely said, they were nothing more than exceptions from the dreadful agony which had encumbered the heathens on themselves. A constant set of headaches came over each of them in pairs, unfairly called into action, for their likes alone were there. Set to be pulled and feel actual pain, for the pain sensors which wouldn't be there otherwise suddenly appeared at the very core of the gray matter which lay in their long cowls. And the constant breezes of winds and sudden leaps and pushes managed to get them forth into some kind of unawareness which lay that way. Strangely, the air felt quite docile, not even remotely called into action, to be said. One mouth appeared on one of the cowls. Quite the rare occurrence, indeed, it had been nothing like the kin. Such tongues it spoke, some dread and fear and distraught necessities which couldn't have happened at all otherwise did. Though in its wake, it spoke morbidly of their fate, and like heathens, as such they were, veterans of the forfeit of the great tower which had ruined their world, they stopped and surrounded this man. 'What do you wish of us, great mouth? Speak so we may hear.' One break came into the mind of the man, as the mouth in itself was an extension of him, something had occurred as well. This heathen alone was no longer the man he had originally been, there was this thing in itself which feared. Such a slacker, knuckle dragger, mind full of blasted dementia seemed to occupy most of the likes. Unaware of what was going on, there would be some kind of despair he would or could feel. A draught had come in his mind that he had been which marked the man forever in the worst possible manner. Such was it that he felt fear, an agony which couldn't have been his own. There were worse fates one could face, such as injury, insult or even the final fate. But this man changed, and it couldn't have been explained. No agony remained that way for long, though he had felt strong, in the bones and in the mind. Such a dreadful creep couldn't have been left alive, not by any means, not by any woes, for now, that it had been decided that his mind had been replaced, it was time for him to be gone. No creeping woe, no fear, fright, nothing occupied his mind any longer. He had been, or had become a conduit, and it was vile. The thing which he had summoned burst out of his very head, like some anvil, it spread out of its skull and seemed to bear the marks of eyes, of hands and of those who spoke the messages before him. And the dreadful voice finally spoke. 'I am the messenger of the tower, and I have appeared forth.' Just akin to some symbol or a sign, they had suddenly bowed down to him and looked rather paranoid, frightful, unaware of how to undertake all of which just happened. There was no sign, there would be no dexterity to be called, for the things that came out of his chest were long and thin, and almost like the stings which came out of that strange flight-inducing creatures. Those dangled and had pushed some kind of longer tongues which licked around but never entered the heathens as they waited forth. 'Listen to me and what I may say, you, my servants need to bear your kin and drag yourselves away from the likes of which may seek to bring you ruin. Such a dreadful pace, you may see that I shall be forever patient and wait for you, whatever your fate might be.' And it spoke and waited and laughed, all of the same time, keeping to its cryptic pace and looking forth to never have been known or read. For its expression was close to not being there at all, for, it had been a mouth after all. All of that heaviness as well, it had been inexplicable as well, but it almost came close to resembling some mad and forgotten shrine which had laid somewhere in the past. Away from there, finally the servants, or what had become the emissaries of Ogoth had finally reached the point where they could simply walk and stalk and need fully explain to themselves that it was near the edge that they had to be. It wasn't even close to the regards of being distracted.

This farther plan would have to be enacted. At least to the point where they seemed to be the likes of being caught. Likely, as they had been brought to the attention of which, there was someone there. A mad-like one, born out of spine, bred in the likes of the tunnel through which they had travelled to reach that point. It looked morbidly inbred, more bone-like in appearance, weak, though it had managed, through the span of a few moments to eat through every single other one of them. No other servant lay, and this creature, if it could be called this way, reigned in the same manner as it had lain before. There was no mistake there, not in the least, they were aware of its existence, the likes of which couldn't have been trusted in the least. No more. Its breath seemed likely to be cold. Even the way it moved gave way to believe or have thought of it as something which had been old, peculiar, and strange in nature and out of place. Out there, where it had been outside its reach or of the place where the behaviours seemed to have been given birth opened a new path for stagnation. The way it moved without a point seemed to make it suddenly more docile. Without another living thing to chase, it had been likely that it would never act in any other way possible whatsoever. Left there, on its own, it would stop, or even worse, it could possibly wait for its many bones to crawl out of its body, as they were filled with the same meat and living tissue which had inhibited its predecessors. And a part of their will inhabited its bone-like carapace. They were bemused that all of the sudden, though they may have been dead, thought they had been dead all along, have been given so much power, such an influence as it never had happened before. It wasn't likely that either one was rather peculiar in nature, but the dread of which couldn't have been anything but aghast. Suddenly they moved, all the way down from its shin to the entirety of its ribcage and even what had seemed to be the malformed skull it bore on top. All of those parts moved adjacently and tried pushing themselves through, going over at various paces, trying to pull at themselves and being peculiarly unnatural in the way some of them moved. Not likely, as it had been, the tumor started influencing the walls in the small pocket this lonely insignificant creature had been. Likely, to be called into action, it had seemed so, that they could be called and watched. No amount of degeneracy could ally and be forlorn in it. Many of the living layers of tissue already formed themselves and got ready to burst. It was a progression, as it just happened for the tumor to have had a way of practice. Long before this strange creature came into action, a group of star-inhabiting humanoids made their way through the catacombs before the sky had even given a chance of falling through. There wasn't any doubt of the like, that they had survived and thrived on the poor living souls they had subjugated on their way. Not so likely for their victims, as it just happened for them to lie forth and be thrown out of place. As a matter of fact, it wasn't so that there would be something as cruel as the agony which had been inflicted on them. One dire hatred lay on top of them, being called so because they weren't likely to have left. This tumor felt the dread they felt, those poor dumb humanoid whom had had their bodies stolen. It could relate with the fact that it could see the same pattern now. Many if not all of its offspring's wanted or somewhat desired to inhabit its body. They wanted to grow, to push inwardly instead of outwardly and grown on one another, then implode. By the long tubes they were fed with, various attempts had been made. Desperately called into action, they seemed to be caught in such disparities as they had been into previously. As soon as they met halfway, those mongrels, those dumb offspring's which had no dignity and no hope to wait, died. Somehow they all shared the same crab mentality in which their vigor faded and they gave into the jealousy which lay against one another. Why should one be allowed to conquer the other one? Why wouldn't one push and end him before he could make it through? Surely, if they both died, none could conquer the other. Because, if one managed to get through the tube inwardly and somehow managed to inhabit the tumor, there would be a deadly danger awaiting it. More so, it would only take another to make it through just so they could both implode and no amount of degeneracy given forth by the females inhabiting the catacombs would do. Stress pushed forward inside the tumor. As each of them attempted an approach, suddenly, it would turn forward ever so slightly and pushed a fair amount of some meaty growth through the tubes. Harmless, even to the touch, it merely served as a way to push every single offspring as far away from it as it might. Since the implosions would result in the spreading of their own matter inside the same room, sooner or later, they ended up being reabsorbed by the tumor. In that way they achieved some kind of pseudo-immortality of some kind. Never have they been known for any other kind of despair. For that's how much pressure had been put onto them. And now, the same kind of pressure had been placed forth onto it, the mad offspring of the recently lost servants of

Ogoth. Every single time it attempted something rather irrational for itself, suddenly pieces of itself had grown and pushed forward in their various growths. It looked bloated, much in the same way the star fiends had been. Even though it may have been for moments alone, they were given their wills back, whether it be a star-headed humanoid or the pieces which had been absorbed by this crawling degenerate being. Uncertainly, it moved and strolled, chasing invisible fiends which weren't there. But all of the sudden it would suddenly be forced to move and stumble into random direction and move benignly so because of the will of all of those living pieces which wanted to escape. Enough pieces of its bones laid that they could all possibly escape and live as individual pieces and do various agonies which may be inflicted upon the inhibitors' of the catacombs. That's how much of their hatred had been put forth and unlikely to be called into action was their. That had to end there before it started, unless it would require the continuation of the agony it had been forced into. Quickly, as it had seen it leaped back on its feet and appeared to have drawn its own attention to a strong metal pipe going even farther below. It took at least a few attempts, but it had managed to make a dent. One quick snap and jolt seemed to force the pipe open as the vent conducted, slowly as it came, first the hot pressure than came out of it for a few seconds, then the air out of the room. Such pressure came and almost managed to melt down some fragments of its bone membrane, but it had lasted less than expected. Like some squished creature, it had been drawn itself, its head torn and blow and forced into the form of the tube. That in it had rendered it a dumb creature, as much as it seemed, previously that it couldn't resist and force itself down that path, now there seemed to be a path. Unconsciously aware that something was down there, it looked less than likely for it to have been forced in itself. There was a dead end to the pipe, and in that cruel piece of certainty and from that lost passage, it looked like it would live that way. Death wouldn't come by any means, for as long as the tumor remained alive, so would it be. Instead, with a bone structure forced around its very meaty body, this thing which now formed, the combination of all the previous servants would come and grown together in the form of another tumor, hidden and benign, a different form at that. With a surplus of pressure, it was only a matter of time in which the bone liquefied and seemed to be at least managed into better forms. For neither piece of it could forget that around it laid a tube, a layer of rounded, cylindrical armour which was both hidden and impenetrable. And that had been its hope all along. To have grown in that place meant that it was just as indestructible now as the tumor itself had been. Despite not having fully developed, the influences of those vile creatures in the catacombs still reigned and pushed forward to it. They helped its rapid growth and seemed to crush any kind of dexterity of subtlety there might've been to it. No more would there be, for the likes of being largely distraught, as it just happened for it to be caught in itself and munch on its own. That was the curse of being formed out of some many beings yet being tied together. Unable to properly devour one another, they were trapped there, snapping and biting wherever they could. The possibility of actually ripping pieces of them was null. Peculiarly, watched, had been the fact that the pattern of their grown had seemed likely for them to have become a small cylinder with many mouths which went as far as the pipe had went. Soon enough the metal membrane gave it and started leading to some pipe system, which had been properly infested. It grew in every degenerate way, spreading and pushing through every piece and every side and possibly every kind of direction it could go towards. Why was that? There could be no satisfaction coming out of it. Only the dread remained and the fright which may lead to some kind of fear there. No more would they last, no more would one cast his sight upon it there. No living thing laid, only the faces which had stood there as the joints which connected each thrust between the many pipes out there. They were queerly shaped and seemed to bear sharp teeth and wreaked almond eyes which pushed forward and held as hardly as they might. Mobile, at least in effect, it seemed like they moved back and forth in some sexual manners, as it happened for the pressure coming out of the growing tumor to have attained. Dreadful, dreadful thing, which held no piety. The beacon fiend had caught itself, it moved along the catacombs at last. And in one wrong turn it walked alone in a tunnel and looked above it at a single drip of a single drop of some liquid it felt. From above it, there seemed to be a metal piece sticking out. Curiosity having taken the better of that creature, it pushed for the beacon and melted a piece of the metal to look. As his scepter retreated in a different direction, a long piece like some crawling tentacle or some jolt, a sting, whatever it had been immediately pierced his eye. It was too late for it to retaliate then, for slowly, his scepter fell, his body was not his own. Now he had lain stationary, unable to carry on his message and save what had been left of the world. Though he may have been no hero, the villainous side of him had laid in a little kind of comparison with his own kind. Not even remotely aware of what was going on, he laid on a whim. In a cruel attempt, born not out of his instant case of insanity, but out of some muscle memory, it snapped its own neck instantly with a long arm, and as it happened that arm fell down, bluntly and in an instant. The other arm stretched out of belief to the point where it could no longer have any kind of hope for itself and reached the beacon, crushing it with its own wrist. The white fire which erupted should've destroyed him, if it weren't for the fact that many veins, wires, and virulent growths had already grown and laid in his body. No more could he fight back, no longer could he be confused about what was going on. There was fright and dread, he would lay there, no longer being able to resurrect, but at the same time, he lay there, flaccidly immortal. Later there had been getting worse. As of lately, there seemed to be a general change in the catacombs below, the way they had been structured and fashioned looked less likely to have been in terms of the creeping plane it once had looked. Instead, as some walls collapsed from above, they looked likely to have been refashioned in some wicked kind of tunnels which had been eroded by mark and creeping blades which once had lain inside the bottomless pits which had lain inside the worming metal creatures which had appeared there. Strongly fashioned, there were stairs and even some kind of small fashioned lairs for those whom were able to dig for themselves. Rather than what it had been there, something else laid elsewhere which did greatly disturb every kind of notion which had laid aside. There wasn't any amount of cruelty, to be looked down upon, but underneath, another level lay. Where there were no tunnels but a way to go and freely come down upon a pile of corpses. Upon which laid, above, tied to the ceiling, their earthly remains which had excluded their bones. Those had lain below them, in living beds of chattering skulls. They looked as what had once been their bodies in some form or another. In that thing or from it, the tumor ate and grew. For, despite being as immortal as it seemed, it could still be starved to the point of being something weak and harmless. Immortally unaware of how child-like it might've been in that case, it whined at itself and crept aside, for there was naught now who knew or who might attempt to freely creep at him. More over, it seemed likely that there was another man out there. Another one other than Pyott, whom looked like an exact duplicate, acted the same and explored. He had no relation to the man, on the contrary as one might do well to observe the behaviour, he might even add that this creature was a stranger to the way or the kin of mankind. With the way he walked being backwards, his fingers being twisted and endangered by the likes, he looked likely as to be aware. Something was out there, looking out for him, trying to grasp at his throat. It had come out of nowhere. This thought had lain in the last moment when the brute, the jailor or the warden, whatever he had been revealed some kind of brutish arm which crept from the inside of his fist. Hidden, it may have been, it came out of an unpeeled skin or shell of a human arm, only to reveal itself as something solid and gray, hardened and with the likes of being formed out of being carved from a bigger piece which embodied it. And all of that seemed to have been either encompassed or entirely hidden inside of him. Without a doubt, something reigned, the feign of which couldn't have been passed over by the likes of woe. From the one stretch of this revealed limb, there came a crushing blow which had completely ended this fiend rightly in its own track. But it hadn't stopped there. This brutish arm suddenly let go and came out of his hollow humanoid arm. Behind it laid a long tail, as blackened and scaled as the rest of its body had been. Suddenly it crept beneath the earth and started digging itself deeper and pushed itself farther inside the far ends of something cheerfully benign. It wanted that human imitation all for its own. That's how it had opened its mouth and grabbed it while pushing itself farther into the newly formed holes. Those catacombs no longer, the place had been one of great confusion, especially for the likes of someone as slim as easy to handle. Without a doubt, it couldn't have been caught by any other means alone. Filthy and deceived, the warden's arm formed back, waiting for it to be filled again. This action had taken a great toll, but it was fairly clear that it could grow back, one way or the other. He could see it under his very own eyes. As one of the damned came to him, those cheerful things which looked less like being human appeared, he came to the conclusion as well. Something there had taken away their humanity. Whoever appeared there, who had once looked like a human being was no longer such a thing. Instead, it had been something less or something more than that. It was something of the deranged kind of morbidly aware being, of creature, or bringer of filth. Both of those conjoined ones had an additional layer of skin lying on top of them, which had been transparent and only revealed that there was water between it and them. They could breathe through that water, or even worse than that, they needed the water to survive. Such was it that these parasitical creatures devolved their fingers into lumps which were in need to draw in as much moisture as it was possible. Though its weakness in muscle made it less of a threat, this creature had been desperate. Brownish-blue in colour, a mouth which had revealed its crooked long teeth seemed to thread its own life, to jeopardize its safety as it wanted desperately to bite off a piece of the warden and drink out of him. Enough time lay for the warden to look around, from whence this creature had come there lay a trail of some of its own liquid it needed to survive on. Had it been an injury or the way it walked? Just from that alone, he couldn't think off, nor could he pass another kin in mind. He was there, alone, as a man who had been blindly aware of how desperate it had become. Even now, many of its lumpish fingers tried to penetrate his skin and plant themselves in like some kind of madly endangered leeches, with a greater failure than expected. In his wake, not only had he pulled and ripped those peculiar barnacle-like tendons which had been its fingers, but it had also managed to completely rip off both of its arms as well. The, now compromised creature wriggled like a peculiar seal with no hope for survival there, which only tried harder to drag itself and attempt such as escape which would've been deemed as being impossible by any other means alone. Dread came to be and pass and it had been likely that there was some peculiarity to be known to him there. Its head had been crushed as he leaped over it and as he finally put an end to that miserable creature, he had finally the chance to look behind him. Others came, or were on their way, miserably dragging themselves in the same form and with their altered bodies at bay. Cruelty had only been the mark of what they had become or what they actually looked like. But every single one of them had gone through the same process as this one had. Though when he looked down, that of which he may have seen as being dead turned out to have another head which had been full of life or vigor. It had been somewhat starved before, to the point where it only looked dead, but now, it suddenly returned with the death of its conjoined brother. Left alone, this thing would grow and get a chance a survival, as petty as it would be, he could not afford it. Even if it had no means to do it, this worm had to be extinguished as well. The second head suddenly burst under his boot. Leaving only a black trail of blood, the body started dissolving. Perhaps this was its mission in some way, for the others followed as if they had only now discovered the pool of honey which had lain on the ground. But the misery would continue for them, for he had no time to carry on with the executions. Another one laid somewhere out there. He had known it. The trail of steps hadn't stopped and it seemed likely that there was another escapee. Be it a false track or something of the kin, he chose to take his chance out there, in the dampness of the holes. While going deeper inside, many of the men who had been heathens found themselves changed in vile images and twists which couldn't be looked over. No amount of sight would bear to see their likes and how repulsive they looked. The poison or the morbid gaseous toxin which had infested all turned even the metal into something organic. That alone had translated poorly for the worms which couldn't be fit in all the plans which involved the likes of evil. Vileness be benign, it had been tried again, it had been evil, forced out of them came various organs which popped out of their backs. This thing, this occurrence or mistake in their anatomy happened with every single one of the subjects. In most cases they survived with great pain and great torment, which subjugated their like and made them stop the various cases in which they only, previously hunted for their prey. In some mad way, it had been likely for them to be called upon the dreadful call of woes which made them quite aware. A thorough madness forced them all to get a grip. As that attempted to pull their organs back in, something had backfired the attempts. Some kind of springs upon which they organs had been placed only went further outside. It wasn't even likely that they would desire any other thing than that. Madly aware of what went on with them, it seemed likely that they couldn't be counted upon. As a meeting occurred, above the level upon which the heathens stood and prayed, they listened as they met. Words came and went, and in both ends, the madness had infected and these malformations of any living kind suddenly forced themselves upon one another and suddenly they started pulling those long twisted tubes out of their bodies. It hadn't stopped. The agony only continued as one of them got ripped apart. It went on living as the victor left him go. Only a piece of him remained and moved, clearly left open and exposed, revealing some open space and that most of the organs had been left behind. In their place only the large organ which had its cognitive functions lay. But even that had been left twisted and laid reanimated by that mad tumor. As the body lay there, suddenly this giant worm lay below and listened to the further commands of the heathens below. They acted like some coiling voices which only spoke of the vile. As a next set of orders had arrived, it had been given much of the remorseful thing to devour. But it had been getting worse. Such as the converted catacombs had been flooded not by water but by a growth. What had been peculiar about wasn't that it acted in its own manner, but the fact that it had suddenly covered every single empty spot, creating an area of time in which nothing moved. In some biological way which couldn't have been explain, everything had remained alive but inanimate at best. Then came the great movement and the relapse of space, where they had been brought and caught and pushed over through some madly unaware, farther than being placed space where the likes of woe had disappeared. In their wake they had been brought to a whole new plane. It was uneven, and it hadn't been even clear where they had been brought. But the old space where they had laid had rotten away and got squished into a vile pile of insignificance. The vessel was trying to escape its devouring plague, it had been trying, desperately to get away, but without proper sustenance, it had been caught. Such was in its protruding system of roots beneath itself that it had managed to have at least one attempt, one last shot to grab itself and prevent its entire destruction or annihilation. As it drew in every single mass in the shortage of coils it bore, suddenly it had formed one coiled thing that was long and sharp and strong and seemed to resemble some great serpent of dread. With it embodied, it had now attempted the impossible. Through the wreckage that had been the many memories of men and human beings which had inhabited its body, suddenly, it had pushed forward and attempted this kind of elasticity it never had within itself. The vessel had attempted to dig through the various memories and somewhat managed to construct some kind of map as reference for what lay outside the mines. It was far away, the town that was, rather, at some distance which had been placed between them, but it had to be feasible. Some way had to be made and put forth, thrown out of any direction, for the likes alone couldn't have been handled otherwise. It would die unless it attempted something great, something useful, some saving grace which could pressure it to survive. There it came, that it had found the perfect wreckage in the sector of the city, where there lay men, women and children. Illness had to be kept in mind, but they were defenseless in that old veteran hospital of war. They wouldn't need anything else of the kind as they lay there. It was a sight to behold, as the coiled serpent, root of evil, incarnation of the vessel suddenly started digging through the ground and dragged the vessel with it. This power which had been expelled put a great lot of stress on its body, as it happened for it not to have been made for such a task, but to have been fed by lesser beings. There, through the rocks and the various crevices of dirt, it shattered and broke and cracked and left it rather exposed. All that devouring of men and of lesser vessels had done nothing to it, when in reality it turned out that it had been just as weak or weaker than the beings it so belittled. Such, as it in its nature there was mockery, it lay. In a pocket of earth, through it and into the moisture of the basement it went. The trip had been long and weary and the entrance had been rough. But it had managed to stall no longer as it had arrived in there and came to its work. Such was it, in its dread that its coil had spread in many and had penetrated the walls and the stairs and the laundry system which drove it above. Out there it had been in the open, where others might see and judge it for what it had been. But it could no longer deny any other kind of woe. This had been it, if authorities would be alarmed of its presence, it could see to it just in the right scenario of what might happen. A fiery pit through which there would be embed this kind of mad extinction would arrive. Such dread and agony as there would've never been seen, though it had no doubt that those lesser beings were aware it had devoured everyone in the facility it had lain in. More so, it had most likely known that they were aware of its escape and attempt to get through by what it had. If this experiment laid the way it had been placed by the men around it, there could be no doubt about it. They had planned it all along. It was a mere test, a trap and it had recklessly fallen into it. And what of the poor ill people who had laid there unprotected? Had they been poisoned by some likes which would damage it if it had attempted to devour any of them? Would there be some kind of dreadful punishment inflicted on it if it would fail this test they had imposed to it? Such questions couldn't have been doubted or believed by the likes alone. It was a cruelty of natural means, no amount of misery could have this ordeal be so. It was there that the first victims came. And like a plague, the coils had spread and started encompassing every single human being in sight. The system had been flawed, it was more likely to be bodily than them being encompassed by some veil or by some stocky kind of box. Instead of that, desperation had forced the vessel to simply penetrate the back of their head with some kind of ill substance and some kind of woeful thing. And there, it had done less than abort and more, as some desperate prayer, it attempted to communicate within the greater magnitude which lay outside its reaches. There, it lay like some kind of dreadfully arrogant thing, a mad piece of interlaced living space. It spoke and listened and heeded its pray. Such a thing couldn't be had, a lonely vessel lost in time. Suddenly its coils lay flaccidly there. No longer would there be any kind of misery or some illusion. This thing which had lain in its mind had been given life somewhere in the universe. Eternally said, these fantasies they had would grown and be transferred through space. Most if not all which had been absorbed by the vessels had manifested on different planets which lay in space. Some where similar to the earthly place, which had been the prototype of woe, while others hadn't? But it had finally happened that they were no longer fakes, no longer would they be false realities but worlds on their own. For this one vessel had managed to reach the interest of a being so strong as to beg for the creation and be given the gift of life itself. Such as it came, there was that certainty in the least that it had no need to eat any longer, at least not from those physical sources it had so thoroughly wanted to grab a hold of. Instead, a plethora of portals had come underneath each coil and started dragging it along with those human being it had taken a hold of, then they suddenly close, chopping off with a clean swipe both the humans and its coils. That's when it bled, that's when it started bleeding. Knowingly erect, it was aware of the fact that its body was being transported there, to one of the worlds it had helped create. This magnitude of dampness hadn't helped the fact that it had to go through a process of agony before it could finally be brought there. But there it had been, the likes of which was dreadful on its own. For there, it had grown weak, far beyond anything it had ever felt, and at the far ends it felt as if tiny creatures had been displaced only so they could stay there and drink out of its tubes. They were no longer attempting to help, but rather wanted to speed up the process and end the torment it had felt. Such agony ended there, as from the giant malformed thing it had been, the vessel had shrunk to the size of a small pea. Beyond that, there was nothing which had swamped out of it, other than the tonality of dread it had inflicted as the whispers appeared. It finally arrived. This world was its own, which made it as peculiarly deceitful and vile, evil and benign. For, where it had been brought was no plane like the planet it had previously inhabited. And this gift was one of agony indeed, as it had turned out to be nothing else but what it had created in order to torment its inhabitants. Clouds laid there in a red sky, darkened with sienna brown, the likes of which bloodied tears as they ran down. Acidic rains tormented but weren't likely to be the cause of any known death, as they only stung but left no mark. Towers lay everywhere, placed in their weird and angular shape which had changed to accommodate to the strange gravity which lay there. Finally as it came to its senses, it had attempted to drag itself to the cave near which it had been brought. But what had been the point then? There was clearly no further end to hide itself and it seemed like this strange raise of stone had lain on top of the tallest mountain there was. From there, it had a sight of almost everything which happened on there or at least a great deal of it. Morally untrue, it saw how many petty men fought one another like savages, wearing their cultists robes, walking through their deserted homes and what. It had been through it that finally it would have to suffer living in a world of its own creation, over which it had been given dominion, though it had been left unarmed. The vessel had no way to move any longer, as it had desired to feed for so long. Through some mad way, it saw through the ground as well, and underneath it, lay the catacombs and the many holes. Plenty of other planes lay there, which went deep and in which lay all the constructs and all of those fake and benign deities it had created. Most of the things which had been brought to life had inhabited his plane, but as it had found out, many of the beings which inhabited every single one of them seemed to be confused and left wandering there, searching for something new or something better. But what could there be for them? It seemed that as soon as every single plane converged together, there were more than plenty of them abandoned. Many homes and holes lay there empty, as they started grouping and forming their strange tribes. Plenty of them had been incompatible with one another, not to mention that they were under the constant risk of awakening the towers, which may result in their total annihilation, but that had been it. Such tormentors lay in ways which couldn't have been thought off. There, in the distance, the tribe of They had been formed. And it lay clear as one of the first ones to have formed and to have inhabited this strange world it had been brought to. Its members had been soaked in pools of their own creation, a morbid substance which had been given form out of some mutation. In that strange world and in the reign of confusion, one tall giant had seemed to have pulled out of wicked heart and squeezed some growth of it. Its eyeless stare bore it through and there seemed to lay the pull in which each member bathed in. Their vileness and filth couldn't be denied, their cowardice held no light, it was true that in that pool they seemed to change, to push forward less of their bodies and more of the substance which had exchanged places with their blood. Like some deformed things the human beings came first. Out of the pool they looked longer, leaner, with their cowls embed on them and looking rather pale. Some resemblance of teeth came out of their mouths but seemed likely to be bent and twisted rather than straight. They stepped aside and left the next group comes near. Such was the gathering so far, as it seemed nearly impossible to distinguish someone from one group to the other, in the near-sighted gaze of the vessel. But the living machines followed and in the pool they found their reckoning to lie at hand, as it appeared likely for them to be brought to some form of living torment which shouldn't have been there by any means alone. It would be cruel to say otherwise. This insufficiency of woe had turned them into something close to bloodied skeletons, with something close to them as the corpses of the human soldiers they had once fought against. Somehow they had found their way into the pools or they had manifested atop the desire to have shown their ware. Either way, what had come out of this liquid seemed likely to have been carriers of diseases both for the kin of meat and the one which would rust any other kind of metal. That had been their gift, and it looked likely for them to have been pleased with the turn of events. What followed after were worshippers of the shrine, the mad ones who had been brought to life. They served a new master now, or at least they didn't appear likely to have served themselves in the agony which lay. Such as the dreadful thing had encompassed the like, it seemed likely for them to have come out of the pool unchanged. But instead of them being rejected, it looked like they had carried a new idol, another shrine from the depths of the pool. That had been heavy and seemed insignificant at first but as they brought it out, everyone seemed to pause and stare. The statue was crude and meaningless, but what it had bore seemed to be a transparent globe which had been filled with the essence of the pool. Others who had been changed and the creeps alike seemed to gather around it and worship this one dignified idol. It had be, as it seemed likely to have been their last resort in this estranged and peculiar woe which had been to them the strangest of much benign action. The pool started receding and there would still be time for others. Men with no names entered those who had explored and found out that there would be no life afterwards entered the pool as well. And as they came out they themselves were unchanged but had found out that they would be forced to walk in the same suits unlike the others. In that world, they would be the creeps and the savages, those who were stuck behind the evolution and the kin. And more importantly, this process had continued for days in which they waited and looked at their new brethren which had changed, and the others who had remained the same in every and each aspect, which couldn't have been denied. Their hatred and agony continued as the pool had finally reached its end. Instead of it laid a barren spot which was as dark as to be the mark of what had once been a fire. Instead of them having been forced into this new hope, the dread continued as they started worshipping the globe. 'Look, thee, hoh, I have a desire to procreate anew, the life which belongs to me shall be eaten by my own likes as well. What of you, oh master, who had given me the likes to breed and heed nothing but the agony which had been promised upon eight new generations?' 'Shut yer mouth, loath of lumps, cans you not see that you're wickedly degenerating into something weaker? Take heed of your limbs, they are long and weak, no strain to them but no muscle mass either. You wouldn't survive through the child-birth unlike any other specimen which may be. That you are here alive means nothing, nothing of the like. If anything, there's only the chance that you may be devoured by another's offspring's that they might make it through.' 'Listen not to them, of sphere which is the precursor of life. We're only trying not to, as deny, we are your mere servants and ask for no other gift nor advice from thin self.' 'Do not get any closer, you runt and savage. Can't you see that your mandibles are long and sharp, such as those of a long horned fiend? Do you not see the danger of your approach there? It looks and seems to be that you can't recognize the possibility of inflicted mortality which may be brought upon our progenitor. Take him away and remove his tongues. His ilk ivory teeth as well, his sharp fingers and battering rams which be bedraggled from its back.' Such as the agony of woe seemed likely to have been spread, there was a curiosity in which this hellish agony dampened them as their likes akin. This had been a meeting to behold. At the end of a distant hill, what seemed more like an army which had carried a symbol or some idol stopped dread in their tracks, ready as to recognise both a threat and something just as strange. This creature had managed to lay a jest, right before their very eyes, straight before they could raise themselves up and come to their minds. It was even closer to have been caught off guard there, as many looked at the idol which had taken a hold of the sphere, which had resembled, or, be it otherwise, the creature which stood at the end of the broken hill. From the looks of which, it had been crudely aware of itself, as it managed to stroke its own arms and many like with which it had been bore. Against them, it had spoken no word but thought of how amusing it had been. Many of them were rather too caught in their own awakenings and in the very thought of similarity which lay between them. It had been uncanny at least, to the point where they had been indistinguishable, from nowhere near any sight would they be. Such was it that their cruelty was much more than benignly exposed to their kin. They had been paranoid, at least, in their likes and for the feast of which they lay. Paranoia was something close against which they'd rather lay their arms and follow this as a symbol of their progenitor, it had to be. But why had it been there at all? There wasn't any kind of desire to know or any possible explanation to be held to them. So far, as to say that it couldn't be looked at any longer had been an understatement, for they followed no clear trail and seemed only to have been caught in their town thoughts. Every now and then though, one would look at the idol and see no crude statue but that mad creature itself, holding on the globe tightly as it came. Despite perfidious looks, there couldn't have been any other creature which would so desire to lay and throw itself at the shrine. His skin might've come to a shade which resembled the liquid now, but that had been predisposed to only their picked sight. Many from the crowd looked into the same spots only to notice that there was nothing there but that crude depiction. And as they kept on staring, they had become somewhat predictably paranoid and fearful of the ones which might attempt to draw in near and commit the supreme act of theft, as the body of their progenitor would be taken from their grasp and sight. 'Ye down there, do not look upon him, unless your desire is to lay with the dead. I saw how you looked at him, approach not or you shall feel the misery inflicted upon your body just as it had once been created, so shall it be undone.' That thing approached and suddenly ripped out the meat out of some metal arm. From its end, suddenly there had been a release that, by no means, could those metal joints live independently without the organic parts any longer. Such as they had been sealed in the least, that way they had been caught. And the giant whom looked dreadfully awake in his nature seemed to be caught off dosing. In a peculiar manner as well, as he had been the only one not to have bathed into his own liquid. Instead of that, he walked and doused off, sometimes crushing those who were unlucky as to lay in his path. Such a cruelty had made one be unaware of what was right and what lay with them, alas, the cruel nature would come to light. Is just happened for him to notice as to have been called from his daze, to be reminded that underneath the patch upon which lay the emptiness of the socket, lay no eye any longer. And what they had been carrying all along looked as if it was the perfect fit. He bent and approached, pushed in and suddenly pushed the rounded sphere inside his socket so he may see. It was something which had shocked and frightened them all, for no amount of dark gazes could do any such thing as to demoralise this giant. Unless there had been something they hadn't known, they now followed him instead of the shrine, which had been abandoned, spat of and left to be destroyed by whatever natural occurrence might ever occur. In such a thing lay only the dread, the misinformation and the spread of natural diseases which couldn't have been called off. Not as to be cheerful as to call upon whatever agony there lay, in an appearance which couldn't have been called anything but dreadful, there lay the call of summer. Sky fiends blossomed in a peculiar bloom of orange light. It wasn't right, it couldn't have been, but they his away under the shade. For this light was by no means right and it had inflicted its malignancy over the men of this world. Those who had been caught by its growth had their skin grow small and rounded poignant growths of orange and dreadful pockets of growing, morbid long-lays. As they drew forward, they created bridges from various parts of their bodies, connecting them, stretching and pushing forward. They carried more of the orange rain which had arrived. Now the pockets had been full and had made way. Sooner or later they would've noticed them coming. But small insects which carried sacks and long pointers came near those affected beings and started spreading their vapors inside of them as if they were taking care of their own sacks rather than anything else. It couldn't have been anymore clear as to what had happened and what had lain. But the agony which had been inflicted continued. The vessel had been unaffected by the rain or light, by this fight of discord which had attempted to grasp as many living organisms as it might. Such was it, that in its wake, it looked through the clouds and through the light and saw the gaseous forms which had been created by a being unlike any others. It had a dreadful form of black and mouldering small pockets in which stood stumps which had grown from its insides. Four great and thin legs lay there, moving constantly, bearing white and dark smoke trails as they moved in unison. For one unaccustomed, one might think this creature was being caught in mid-flight, but that couldn't have been farther from the truth. As those some trails were no trails at all, but some form of thin material on which it simulated some kind of ground. On a closer look, they seemed to be made of perhaps billions of moving strings that thinned in the distance as to appear invisible or inexistent. But this creature had an intelligence unlike all others. It harvested, from its many coils, what its tiny flying servants had delivered onto those strings. Living material that had been forced deeper and farther onto the strings and pushed ever so forward as to feed his might. Unable to look forward than this ruse and woe, neither it nor its servants would communicate. This thing had been disgustingly afraid of being seen and noticed, not to mention being followed and trailed through the darkness of its own abyss it had created. There was something to it there. Not only had it acted in some manner unlike what it had supposed to be like, but it also managed to create a way for it to harvest on the poor sods which lay there with no defence. It was an act of cowardice, how the small insects would gang up on the bodies which lay on the ground, not dead but exhausted from the added weight of the pus-filled growths which tore them down. As a mere thing, which lay in some way or another they acted like some kind of carriers, not of sustenance, but of the bodies themselves. It had been a hard thing to realise, and this hadn't occurred to the layman whom watched, but these small insect-like beings were intelligent. Not only were they working hard but they were aware of the many systems on which lay the strings. Their end goals hadn't been to feed that dark creature which lay above them, not at all. It had been a mere act which had been given birth as a perversion of their desire to preserve the sight. Indeed, they had watched for far between, and farther eons, in the empty space, the nothingness collapse, the stars and planets dying. And somehow they had found themselves there, watching this occur out of nothingness, like some kind of blessing or, perhaps a reward for how long they had waited for something to happen. Incredibly so, they had long since realise the property that dark fiend had, for, at the end of it, as the mass of meat which would so-called, in thought or observation be devoured, they had found out something much better. They would not only be encompassed by it but add to the growth of that pile, for that's what it had actually been. It wasn't a globe of meat, or some darker, taller create, it had been a living pile made out of the information of everything it had acquired and devoured. It baffled the tiny flying creatures, as it never occurred to them that such a thing would be possible by any means alone. Dangerously aware of what had been, the many dead things lay there, placed on top of one another, staring with dead eyes. Such a texture was quite likely to be called into action, the dreadful arrogance for which none may lay. Unfairness had come to at a price, for which they would communicate through dead organs their wills and their desires, neither of which would be listened to. But every now and then, a small hive-like group, a cluster of them would appear, pulsating with their orange lights. In themselves, there lay something extremely peculiar. They had held an account of every new body which had been accumulated in that pile, ever since its conception. Not only had they kept track of them, but also of the bodies they themselves helped it acquire. Though it may have been a dumb thing which only acted as a way to collect those which lay around them, it had constituted some kind of addiction to them. One would draw ever so near, now and then, as to test it and see if it would be devoured. Such a phantasm would mean ecstasy for such a being of dread, to be absorbed and lay with the other trophies as a sign of the many dangers it had to survive through to get there. But it had no clue as to why it had been rejected. No matter how close and how tightly it had rubbed itself against it, there would be no response whatsoever. It was clear that something had been wrong there, unclear as to what the reason

lay, it had to settle with being a watcher. Even attempting to rub it against one of the many wires had resulted in nothing. Perhaps it had desired only the living organisms which lay there. But one meeting had sufficed, more importantly than with the host of their desire, for these tiny creatures, almost beetle-like in insufficiency of their never-ending curiosity, had managed to get a sight of the vessel. They kept a distance and seemed to fear. Something about it wasn't right, it could not be explained by any means, but there was danger there. Such a peculiar turn of feelings had never been felt by any means. Pyott knew himself as well. He looked above and seemed to understand, from the corner where he had stood and stolen glances that the things which had grown there were by no means afraid and by no means wicked in nature. They had cleaned the place and appeared to have turned it into something else. By nature of themselves, it had become rather clear that there was a disturbance, a vile hatred which they had felt for one another right at that moment. They spread and suddenly disappeared from sight. That's when the sudden break had ended and another rain had started in his area. Quickly, as to come into waves, it had happened for them to spread around and come to be known as quickly aware, they were out there. Four of them had struck him suddenly as he had looked both out of place, the virtue of a man who had been saved from destruction lay within him. But such a saving grace could not last forever, as the mere reflection of the blue in blue which lay near his eyes served as a ward for them. Never had they seen such a sight. A colour which reflected in his vision but had never seemed to bear such a thing as the dark one. With a whim, they spoke in their spread of noise and quickly made themselves fly as farther away as they might. It was thing which made them unable to look any other way and by no means live. The dread acquired seemed to last, he had been stricken in hiding so he may survive. It was another day which Pyott had managed to buy himself in those areas. As soon as the heaviness which was added by the various showers of that madly induced liquid overcame the leaves, there would be no way for him to hide. Not even there would he be safe, as he had lain in hiding for far too long. What had lain in front of him, from whence he had escaped seemed to be the displaced entry from the catacombs. Above them laid some kind of twisted top of rock, which would shave off a great deal of what fell from above. No liquid appeared to barge in, but that also meant he had to return. 'Not there, not any longer, I cannot return to the place from which I had barely escaped, something dreadful lays there. I know of it, I know of it, you shall not overcome me.' Just as a mere test, he had looked in front of him as saw a constant drop from the liquid. He flung the tip of the finger straightly into it only so he may test it and notice what was about to happen. The amount of dread which filled them lay like nothing he had encountered previously. From the looks of it, the infection occurred within seconds there. Much growth had occurred not on the outside but on the inside. A reason which had given to his saviour's grace seemed to have lain within him there. Neither had a clue nor woe, nor could they have thought of it by any means whatsoever. It would be this attack of growths which would turn his finger inwards before he took out a rock and started bashing it. Already, most of the pain had gone after the few strikes, and what laid in front of him had been a battered stump from which came no blood. 'You cut off my blood supply from my finger, nasty thing!' He said, as he was about to recover. By no means could it have been an easier task, as he had taken some kind of notice to himself alone. There would be some kind of cruelty to be had there, but he had known that it was theirs now. He looked as a few of the same flying insects he had encountered appeared out of nowhere and flew inside to take heed and breed with the likes. They carried it over and pushed and flung the remains of his finger inside their strange system before taking off. Afterwards, knowing he had no other chance whatsoever until the rain stopped, Pot ran and had returned to the likes of the catacombs where he waited. A hand grabbed him as he had waited and with a great blow, he had been turned unconscious. Visions flashed, as his sight slowly returned to him, the things he had seen were more likely to have been from a nightmare rather than some past memory or seclusion of sight. Something of the growth which had come out of the tumors and the other inhabiting creations in its image seemed to have overtaken the halls. Most of not all had been infested and had been turned. The walls were theirs, the ceiling was theirs, even the very ground they walked on, and at every second he felt it attempt a grasp at his skin, an attempt which forced itself to come over. Living as some kind of strange fighter, it fought within its very walls. The various growths were at war with one another, which had become apparent as they entered a huge and empty hall. Many tall spires had been brought over as signs of which or whom had taken over. They had been spread around the room and bore corpses as trophies. It was from somewhere in the depths, that they had been taken from and apparently, as it had looked that way, they would suffice to be called in their dreadful nature as they were. Fear lay inside of him, as he watched them war. Many fights had occurred under his sight, as he had looked upon various gas-filled meat grinders come and pop into spots, emptying them immediately as to lay open an area for more infestation. Their various scents were something to bring the foul and the dead back to life and it had seemed likely that in the time he had been out there he had missed the great retreat. In which life had been extinguished and the remains of the inhabitants of the catacombs lay for the sake of their own deaths. Only this one warden had survived, it appeared, a man, like him. 'Let me go, fool, can't you see that this place is being destroyed? It will eat itself then collapse.' But he had no knowledge or sight of whom had been alive beneath the catacombs, for, something had kept that creeping vile thing alive. It was by no means the amount of corpses it had devoured, for it had kept them alive now, by means of which no sight may dwell. Their voices had been lost somewhere below, in safety no less. In the closed halls in which they lay, sounds of ecstasy, the sign and power of which no living creature had ever experienced before had been lost and kept to a secret so vile that no amount of perversion would suffice. But alas, that had been unnatural and distracting. Pyott knew naught of it and wouldn't care for fewer thoughts, or worse. He would've been taken and given in to what he would've seen happening there. 'There's a prison from which you came out of, that's where you belong.' He was mad, he hadn't a care, this blasted creature with no mind whatsoever. He had even less of an idea of what might happen if he were left there in thought of some escape. Fear came to be at what this brute would do to him if he had shown even more resistance. He had to feign some kind of defeat if it had meant that he would manage to survive even a few more minutes or hours at that. And it had dangerous out there, even for him, whom had managed to dwell beyond his escape and perhaps even more than he had been there. Not that it mattered but they had been attempted at both of their lives, right in front of their eyes. 'Get up and move.' Pyott had been flung from his knees and walked solemnly through the underbrush and through the various heeded weeds of malnourished stones. They felt like they had been petty for the touch, as well as they had made him feel repulsed even at the merest touch. No longer had he listened, nor would he care for that man's advice. As soon as they were separated from sight, he ran through one of the tunnels and managed to see how much of the change had occurred. Certainly they hadn't been catacombs before, with the tunnels being refashioned and interconnected but this had been worse. Somehow, the entire system had become even more convoluted, having living long rooms moving like some kind of underground railed tapes from inside to inside, bearing nothing more than an open hole which may be seen from time to time. He took his chance there and leaped into one of it. 'Where are we going then? Could you listen to me?' Of course not, he had no idea whether it might hear or understand. He had only the need to grab a hold of one of the many bars and push forward towards holding on. Whatever else there might've been going through his head stopped. And so it had. It had to be a mere coincidence, that when he had emptied his mind so had the dull headed thing in which we went through. A conclusion had to be drawn. 'I'm feeding you, aren't I? You need me to keep going.' It had been a chance in an ether, for him to have guessed it right.

But he had done it, oh brilliant man, he thought, you figured out on your own. Yet arrogance would not be permitted, as it had taken that into account and suddenly enraged by the highly inflated thoughts of himself, the inner walls started puffing up and became fatter than they had ever been. A suffocating manner through which he had gone through came to be and pass and he had gone through it as well. Such was it, that in itself, there wasn't anything less of the kind which may bear the fruit of woe and the fruitless approach which came onto itself as to be known as hatred. It heated the insides to the point where the room started melting by every single spot it had inside of it. Not merely hot but also erupting, there were long drops of its own body falling through the ceiling before he finally stopped. Pyott had to think, he had to be calm. 'Only now you may be excused from this and hear me.' But the sudden urge to listen to him had come to an end. It was its turn, as it had stood there, unmoving, to return the favour.

For he had stood there for far too long and the room had a mind of its own to think of the most morbid thoughts, which came as quickly if not quicker than expected. Something fearful came to be, as the walls hadn't changed in form but their colour had been a dark green and the aspect only made it so it might resemble that of a jungle. What had been repulsive was to have it seen and to have felt the constant buzzing and the annoyance of the insects which weren't there. Yet they were everywhere. He may not have been able to see them but he felt them, near his skin, inside his head, trying their best to sting and implant their young inside him body. That arrogance made it change again, to a room of metals bars and coal, he felt the heat but saw no blisters. What he had felt and seen instead, as quickly as it came, was the amount of work he had been forced to undergo. He looked at his bulging arms and felt himself shoveling the ground. Though there was nothing there, the pain had been all the same. Even worse than that, he could sense the feeling of a jungle burning and the many insects which had found refuge inside his body. They had been darkened by the coal and he could see them, even if it was only by the tail of his eyes. No amount of hatred could be denied, for, at least now it had been only a curtain of illusions. 'I will take whatever you may throw at me, but I need you to move.' Such a command it had been, that the room had been angered at the atrocity which had been born out of the dreadful arrogance and the very thought that he may actually dare command it to anything. Pyott found himself on his knees, bent and forced to wait, though he lay there broken, somewhat messed with, these were petty illusions, nothing more. 'You have no power over me, as much as I have.' And his anger suddenly overcame the room, and melted through the curtain which had lain between them. One layer of the wall had suddenly melted and he had finally noticed something he had hope not to see. It had been the bars, they had been as solid as he had seen them through. From the other side, there fell a pile of coal, in which they hid for so long as to make themselves be noticed only now. They were ugly and repulsing, not unlike those small flying orange suits, but nastier and filled within themselves with small poxes and various other forms of solidified green biles. It was obvious, in just a few seconds after their exposure to the heat which may have travelled through those tiny pieces of untouched coal, that they weren't truly resistant to the heat. As soon as the heat had made itself be known, they had been extirpated through the many waves through which it travelled, until there lay a splatter on the ground made out of their own. Pyott had no wonder as he came through the metal bars, attempting, desperately to commence his attempts to pull at them and the even less fruitful one of wanting to get through. No amount of tried remained until he found the heat unbearable, being so close to it. And neither of those insects bit or tried attaching themselves to him, rather, the immediately had been drawn to the hole above them through which laid the cold exposure and escape from this small room of heat-death. He had no certainty that he could use his head in such a thing, especially since he had been degraded by the dizziness which had occurred. Such a sudden change in temperature had its own remarks and sudden consequences of which he had been made aware. Not only had he walked near every edges or had he checked a thing, but also, he had seen something he shouldn't have. The exit in the ceiling was farther away than it had been. It was a mere recognition of the fact that he wouldn't have been able to get through by any means. Such was it that there'd be some kind of insignificant remorseful notice through which no amount of danger lay. The terror lay in the little man, in the small box and while he had some hope, that ran dry. Many other rooms appeared and seemed to have stopped one level above him. Now, there only lay the sight of closure above the open hole through which he may have had some hope that he may rise and climb out. As this escape route had turned out to be as dreadfully atrocious as he may never have believed, he suddenly turned to his prison. A realisation came, the warden had been right all along, the prison to which he would be brought turned out to be right there. Though unaware that it wasn't the same cell as he had been promised to, he still had no thought of staying. There, in one of the corners seemed to be a single gate, with one key-hole, which hath to be opened by some means. It was rightfully his chance to get through and escape. But where may he be lead and where had the key been? Obviously, the only place he could get any chance whatsoever to search through had been the pile of coal which had fallen through the bars. His hands would be ruined, his shirt as well, but how could he touch them without having the material be enflamed. 'What have you done to me? Why have you chosen this? I was merely searching for an escape, I didn't deserve this, not this, not here, not in this circumstance.' And, strangely, he had been listened to, and given a small shard of metal from beyond. Perhaps it had been fate or a mere chance that he had received it. But what of it? How could such a thing lay there, with him in charge? It wasn't even dreadfully magnificent that he would get to end his life. 'With this blade, my chance goes by, and let me be clear that I won't die. Not yet, where there's a chance.' While this tormenting thing had went on, he found the only way he could've thought off, to ease the pain and hope for the chance that it might cool the material he had wrapped around his hands. A cut had come over his arm, not deep enough to cause damage but enough that he may wrap another piece of his shirt around it, but not until he had been done soaking the pieces of cloth wrapped around his hands. Those had to do, at least, with hope, he had begun. It was a mere brush through the pile that he may scavenge for what he had been in need of. No amount of certainty remained, as he had become as pale as one might be. Unclear as to what would happen there, he pushed pieces all around and tried grabbing, crowing in another push or so, until there had been nothing to it. 'Where is it? Where could it be? I'm in need of assistance, please, I want to know where the key is.' He had managed to displace as many of the pieces as he could, but suddenly all of them had reached a part of his body, down his place as he had been low, his muscles and even his feet. There were some burns now which had managed to be made after the exposure through the material he bore and nothing else that had gotten through. No danger lay in them, any degree of understanding and of fearful remorse. Something as cruel as he had done seemed savage. But seeing how there wasn't any key in the pile, he started going down and chomping on them, swallowing as many of the pieces of the coal as he could. That had been the fate of Pyott, man who had laughed at the room. He stood there on his back, looking mightily depressed, as if he had waited for hours. There had been no scars on his body and no death of torture had occurred. He looked around as he had lifted himself and managed to notice that there was nothing inside the room. No marks, no damage, nothing on himself either. Above him, there still remained some kind of open gate through which no amount of uncertainty lay, that it would be blocked and seemed to have been caught to itself that way, nothing seemed uncertain. He had been trapped there. It was a strange reaction of relief and angst that went through him, which had forced him to get back up and begin anew. Not likely, that he would return as soon as he might to another attempt of escape that he started pondering about what was to be done. As much as he had known about the room, there were some dreadful and remorseless ways through which he may look upon his surrounding areas and understand. There were things hidden again behind those walls, larger places than those locked up heated prison cell had been. And he could only glimpse at them through the transparency and the peculiar nature of its own. Nothing seemed worse than what had happened, even less of a mark had been left there. In his own wake, there had been some peculiar thing, a nature which was even less than that of a human-like being. As the walls retreated on their own, there seemed to be emptiness behind them. The ceiling floated out of nowhere, held by nothing, bearing the hole. Somehow he knew that, when all was said and done, he would end up in the same manner, in the same position with little to no mark or permanent injury on his body at all. After getting the guts of going through the open slit, he welked through the vague mist and ended upon the similarly spread branched beings which had waited for him there. It seemed like their heads had encompassed most of their bodies and laid there, spread like some wide coned balloons which ended at a cracked spot above their heads. From their tops came the remaining branches which had grown from below the ground and went through the mass of their heads. For the moments in which various curved moves like some siphoned twisted curls around their faces, the features suddenly had turn as they had started in the back. A malign idea or some kind of protruding skull revealed itself as it made a vile noise at to be forced into a rotation through the branch which had impaled it. There wasn't any doubt about the damage which this sudden turn did to it. Even more so, there had been such a shameful act of disgust which came to his mind as he had seen a face so vile and turned that he couldn't help himself but look away. It wasn't something necessarily vile or disturbing, but something rather bland, too bland and peculiar to be looked upon. Those features were mainly forced out by the protrusion and the mark of the skull and the likes of which couldn't have been forced out by any other means of creation. Many malformations occurred in their likes, with which there seemed to be some peculiarness which wasn't explained. Not as of yet, the forms through which they had come left the features looking like something akin to some mask rather than them being real. 'Have you been sealed? It looks like what had been of your mouth and eyes now lay sewn together.' Every single one of them turned into some kind of unison to reveal the same fate of the same kind of occurring thing. With the way he had noticed and looked upon it, suddenly he wanted to move and shift from side to side, only so they would be out of sync. It worked in the same that he had managed to confuse these beings and make them suddenly stop and look at the man stumble in an attempt to confuse them. This wicked vile act would be remembered. Forwardly, as they looked, seemed to bring on some kind of symbol, for which there was a need of. It seemed like, the way back had been surrounded by them, perfectly into some kind of square, in the formation of which they seemed to have been brought something to it. One face opened then, and suddenly the branches from it fell off and died. It floated for a few moments as it had waited for the others to proceed. As each of them had done the same, they left an opening before forming the outer walls of the room he had been in. Pyott could see the outer rims and parts of the skulls which had been left outside to be of their own. Only their skin had been left there to make-do for the walls, which their inner bodies started crawling out of sight. Something to them and the way their struggled seemed rather peculiar to him. Way more than that, he had been distracted for so long, that, upon turning around, he had managed to look at some structure which had been made in a similar fashion. As the branches retreated below, the skulled fiends moved through their mazes in an attempt to flee and hide. They had been peculiarly unaware of what had happened inside, worse so than what was to be done. In some kind of engulfed strangeness, there seemed to be some illness to his mind which couldn't have been caught as easily as it had. It were some kind of atrociously formed cranium he had laid eyes upon which had him turned. He had never seen one as strange and misaligned as he had seen now, by no other means alone. This was frightening to look upon, the obscure twists and the forms which he had seen solid had looked organic. Pyott could understand what they themselves had been frightened of, as it would just happen for him to be rather caught on the fact that the skulls themselves weren't skulls, but another layer of them same organic matter which had made what he had thought off to be their faces. And as that layer peeled off, he saw them exposed, fleeing from safety, moving those broken flaps above their heads and underneath their bodies so they might drag themselves away. Had he been dangerous? It wasn't even for his likely fading grace that he had followed through the shaped maze he had been drawn in that he couldn't help but spill some of his vigour. By one of the edges which lay around the corner, he had grazed his hand and managed to leave a single cut which span around the span of his pointer and his thumb, making it ever clearer that those skin sheets which had been left there had been dangerously sharpened for some reason or another. No amount of certainty could bring the hope that there could be some dread to it. Unclear as to say, there was something to it then. Worse than that, there was a clear malign living fluid which went into it as well. Those abandoned skin sheets were very much alive and had been angered by the mere pettiness his blood provided. Something which had resembled the marks left by those organic creatures seemed to twist and bend as to make it more apparent that he had been looked down upon. Such twists had come at a very dreadful price, as they shaped themselves in anger, disgust, destruct and general dismay. Unclear as to notice what had been going on, there was something dreadful to it. A misaligned hope which could only be called into question there. Such a spacious thing it had been as well, as he had approached at a mere sign of curiosity which had come around and seemed to have spread by means of looking and touching. But they had been vibrantly plastic to the point where he had pushed one of the sheets and held himself against it. Softness was there, and he could feel no pain from the attempts it had to bite him. They had no teeth after all and no muscles, no bones or anything which may bring any harm. As for the worst attempt, suffocation was almost impossible, it seemed likely, as there wasn't enough force and there had been too many openings forming around it for it to be able to do anything at all. Clearly there had been something frightful and deceitful to the point where it had been likely to be benign. No credence could be given to such a mad creature which reverted back to a slightly more dragged form than it had been before. No amount of morbid curiosity could be dealt with as the effect it had on him carried on. Looking at his body, it seemed like a piece of it had taken over his clothes. He bore a slight amount of its own strange skin on his clothes, which spread and grew in its own pace until it had expanded everywhere. Unclear as to say the least, there had been a fest on the viruses which dwelled on his body, as they had been accumulated over the span of his stay in the opened catacombs, or the halls or the dreadful place he had exited upon. Then, he had finally come up to his senses and went forward. It was still been somewhat barren, with branches coming out of the ground at times, unannounced and slightly disturbed by means of looking forwardly in directions which had been erected in hope that he would spare some of his blood. They had been quite obvious there, as their shapers pieces suddenly pushed forward and opened at their own needle-like projections. From the tip of their own, there came a small drop of blood which fell. He couldn't think of anything less than what was to be looked upon as suddenly it retreated back. A few moments later, it appeared in the place he had to be, blocking the path ahead as to wait for something to be done. It was there that it could do naught but pay a small toll, as it had been waiting. It was quite threatening, to say the least, for he had no doubt that he could be impaled by one of them while he was distracted. But for such a small toll, he couldn't help it but spare some of his blood to this strange contorted being. One sharp angle came and pierced one of his fingers, nothing more and nothing else. The pain made him whence and he had to be certain. 'Take no more than what's needed. I think you may very well not have any idea which might make you over-do how much it is to be taken from me. I still have a need of my blood to survive.' At which the branch suddenly stopped but not before it left its small sting-like form inside his finger, like some kind of madly undergrowth bee, which had given in and took out without its life. He had no idea whether or not this creature had been alive, but it seemed likely that it was not so. Suddenly aware that he had been watched, he turned around. Apparently, more than enough spectators had gathered around, in their twists and vines, looking as bloody engravers and those who had a need to thirst for their own kind's sudden act which had brought in the toll. Somehow he knew they would stay back, or stay abashed or ashamed for not being the first ones to have taken in. But he had walked forward, only to see the sight of a larger area, in which laid a swirl in the ground. It had been empty and made out of raised small solid dunes, which had gathered to one point. In there, there had been a tiny hole, through which laid no kind of impeller of wood, but the ever so-recognisable form of those beings, the flaps which had been forced through. It had been impossible to imagine such a being which had forced itself into that kind of a space, but he had attempted to do it anyway. By the mere sight and observation of what it had been like, there would be nothing more or less of it. What he had plan on so far seemed likely to have been an attempt at trying to get closer to it and try pulling it out like some kind of weed which had grown underneath a place where it shouldn't have been. But he had been un-liked, by means alone of approaching, he had been treated like some pest as the dunes had spread and started widening to the point where he'd been threatened to get swallowed by them. A few moments in made it ever so clear that he could be drowned in them if he had stood for far too long. It was even more solid in terms of the blocks of blood which had formed inside his arm. Like some kind of small pointy spheres, they had popped out of his arms and fell below his knees like some kind of spiked needle racks. It opened a way for crawling termite-like branches to pop from underneath the ground and have at it from what he had made. It was highly unusual as there wasn't any mark left on any of his arms, to the point of wonder, where he had thought and dwelled on it for as long as he had made it through. For there he had avoided the twist of dunes and fled. Both of his arms had been not only crossed but they also held, at the far extremity of his turned hands, many of those spikes pins of spherical blood sphere he held. There was a meaning to it, at the hardened sphere held only a small fragment of it. Not only that but they weren't entirely filled, rather, they had just the right amount that they would be flushed and trashed around, through the needles-like spikes which pushed forward which stung him. And this pain couldn't compare with what they did or how they behaved. For each spike managed to have stung him to the point where they refilled themselves to a point where they haven't been needed. 'This must've been the cause of it.' Pyott said to himself. It was clear enough that there had been some dexterity to him, at least to the point where he had been alone and caught off guard. It was, in some way, some peculiar way through which he had been infected with that plague from the stump he'd been given. And worst of all, he couldn't keep all those spheres to himself any longer. There were plain and too many of them to be held, they constantly stung and seemed to leave marks. But at each step and at every threat of them falling and breaking on the ground, those tiny vermillion hooks came from underneath the ground and caught them before they broke. 'Leave me be, I wish not to have parlayed with you. I am a mere man and nothing more.' He said, with a busted chin and seemingly unaware of what had been going on. Clearly he had been caught in, not to mention that he had been waited for. A party of many being, which lay there entrusted and exposed, with no skin but their weird skeletal vigour coming off threateningly forward, with their filth coming out their sockets. It was there that their congregation seemed to have gone into some hibernation state, in which they exchanged something. Many formed dunes stood flattened like seats for them to sit on. Some seemed like slabs of stones than the dunes which had been formed, but likely, as it had been, many of them lay dormant and interconnected with small veins which pulsated something from one vile thing to another. Curiously said, and looked upon, there seemed to be something akin to some dreadful scope and wonder. It was there that they seemed to have been caught and dealt with. From one end, those branches which had impaled them appeared to be feeding them with some of his blood. It was unnerving that after all this time, he still ended up being used for some vile means. Though he wished not to disturb them either way. He hadn't been forced into it, other than the toll and there it was, the open entrance through it. The more he avoided them and the farther he went in, the more had he noticed the texture those things had, spreading across the ground. Either they had taken a clue from those entities which had converted the catacombs, of something more vile had been there. It did look as if the barren land had been a cover for one of those things, a giant colossus-like being like the others upon which the other ones stood over. They could either have been its children or servants of anything of the like, but one thing was certain, that of which he had recognised the primal thing upon which he went down upon. Such a morbid thing, which granted him entry, as he had been taken in a room which was enclosed, bearing a ceiling and no other way behind. It had been sealed as soon as he had entered. What he had been shown afterwards had been an entry to its insides, which had revealed that its body of the outer rims had been made out as well as it, had lain subservient to another layer which had been held on by those branches which lay so benignly unaware. Such a dreadful thing couldn't have been called off. It would be unclear as to what was going on. The mundane thing was that those branches had grabbed him and held him as gently as they may. He felt no pain as he had been brought on another layer, only to have revealed to him the network which formed its body. He had fed its children with his blood and that seemed to have earned its trust for

now. It seemed less likely that he would be forced through this with no expectation whatsoever, but he seemed to have at least lasted. For the time being he would be allowed to live as long as he didn't disturb what had lain there. And it looked likely that he would be followed even through that point in time where he chose to act in that manner. It seemed less likely that they would stare now, after having come in so far, but they were there, at least, standing around, gathered at the closing hole from which he had been dragged below. A great deal of them stood there nakedly watching, as, somehow they had been allowed to enter that enclosed space. Less aware, as he would be, they would probably never get to see one another in that disturbed space. It was then that he would be allowed to get even deeper through some layer which felt like it had been a universe of its own. Gravity acted in a strange manner, that he would feel as lightly as a feather and even come in terms of floating and getting through the many coats of flying puffs that could be felt. Large white tins which had been puffy and fat at ends seemed to slowly get around his body and stretch as to rub small antlers at him in order for him to be checked. In their disparity of dread, there was something which made his blood boil inside his arms and chest, his face and around some of his arteries after having been rubbed. Those white rod-like, large in stature feelers retreated as soon as it had been observed that he was suffering from this weird check. He had been verified and seemed to have been allowed to pass. The deeper he went in, the more chaotic it had become, as the larged extended areas stopped being widespread. Now, he had reached the end of another layer which had been held by the many living chains, and he hadn't entered through any side. No, he had to enter a pre-defined and already dug up hole from the side, which seemed to have been shaped like the socket of an eye. Peculiarly said, it had been the only hole there had been, or which had lain in sight. For the might alone of a wretched fiend had been less likely to have made him aware of what was inside. There were living walls which twisted and turned, connected and now, for the first time he had entered in contact with it, he had finally felt as if he had resided in a living being and not some kind of twist of unnatural creations tied together by layers and kept there, interlaced with the morbid curiosity of living disturbance. It was there that dread had been given sight. As many long sharp things, not veins, not needles, but invisible prodding obstructions connected themselves to him. Now, he had been made heavier, bulkier and seemed to walk as if the entire heaviness of a planet had been lain onto him, and perhaps it had been. He had been living in a state of mental unawareness and of great dumbness as his mind couldn't take all that meaning and all of that inactivity which spread across its mind. There had been a lot of meaningless thoughts and seemingly nothingness which had been stored. And all of that had been forced onto him as he walked inside of it. Nothing forced him now to register and to understand what was going on there, for he hadn't a clue of what any of it actually meant. Something incredibly anxious had taken place, as it had replaced the awareness he had of himself as it appeared to push inward. As peculiarly as it had sounded, there was dread in his eyes. And a dead beat in his body which had pushed forward up to the point where his body had changed and had forced itself to fall and crawl like of those things that had looked upon him. Suddenly, before realisation could even be named, there had been made, as it had come, an interesting thought. It may have been quickly forgotten, with the rest of his mind, but that had been made alone. This wasn't a way for him to become something else, he had only been distracted as he was dragged through the digestive system this peculiar fiend had. Perhaps he had gotten to close to something which had undone itself over him, or to some secret, or had come to a realisation which couldn't be handled to be allowed in freedom and without reign. Rest came easily, as the digestive system revealed itself there. It hadn't been any other place, where he had walked, other than the room he had come out of. Though the location had been peculiar at best, something was truly different in it. This room had been, well, somewhat ancient. It had only a door now, as, no longer were the other sides exposed. As he looked behind, for a moment, in his quick distress, he felt as if he had sunken too low into his delusions. For, there, he had looked and saw no body of some mad creature, but had looked upon a town in ruin. Something had brought the magnitude of a destruction and a flood of shrapnel and debris which had brought a great deal of destruction to it. By means alone, it could've been rebuilt, if it weren't for the fact that it had been abandoned. He felt like he had missed something which had been written on the door, but it had been late for him to turn around and see. Not only had it been missed, but he had also closed the door to the light from which it came. Above of him lay no more of an open ceiling and suddenly he realised how empty it felt like it had been in there. The silence was morbid and he could see nothing but the spacious dust which had settled underneath it. That's where he sat and stared. No words had lain there as well as nothing to make him be aware. It was there that he was lost, never to be seen, noticed or observed by any kind of means. In the catacombs, it felt, likely, as it had looked in there, that the room hadn't even seemed to be. Like something coming out of mind, the stretch of the organs on the walls had reached a blunt point of emptiness which had been as flat as it had looked aware. Nothing could be said, no wrong, nothing of the like. Evenly said, and looking rather deranged, there seemed to be nothing in there living. Other than the warden whom he had looked alone, suddenly he had been caught as well. In one of the many holes beneath the main hall, he had wrongly stepped on an antler-like coil which had wrapped around his leg and pulled. Inside of a small cut which had appeared near-sided, the growth began and no amount of certainty could be had. Such arrogance and such a woe, there was nothing to it, but that filthy row of many cuts which had appeared. Out of them came off smellers coils, black and blue, which seemed only to signal the fact that his insides had been compromised. With an attempt to break free, he only entangled himself down there, unable to see. Blinded by this malformation he attempted to crawl, still in an attempt to search for that prisoner whom he had escape. But unaware that he'd been caught, his own usefulness had run out, now, he lay, hidden, lost. At the dreadful filth in which he lay, the entrance to the catacombs collapsed. None may enter, none may see, the gluttony of the fiends which fought beyond sight, lost at that in the collapse of the path below. Never would they be seen by the insect's row. Out there, in sight, the rain had stopped, that filthy juice had already been gone. Tormented no longer by what had been happening, those savages came out and pulled in themselves their idol, in some mad attempt, as foul. 'We may devour them, as now they seem, likely not to be as dangerous as toxic.' At the sound of which, either of them suddenly not only appeared but leaped on the body as they started prying on it to get as much of it as they could. Many teeth mark lay and it seemed like a glutton's foul delight. Many felt prey to its taste and after, a small observation was in order to decide. 'Stay away until we come to the conclusion that you may not carry that rabid disease inside of it. We can't know if it's safe for you to come to us.' 'But we may not be stopped from following the idol.' 'You shall be unless you stamp your own dirt and greed of meat aside. This can't be helped, as if, we shall decide, that, if the infection occurs, you are to be put down by weapon and the likes, not touched and not allowed a return to our progenitor.' At which the anger could be unconquerable, by means of distraction and that of woe. There couldn't have been anything of the like in store for any of them, for, as soon as they had been observed, it had been revealed that they darkened in their skin. Such an appearance had been frowned upon and brought nothing but distrust from the others. 'A side effect from our digestive system, nothing more, we turn this way.' But never be minded by the fact that they had been excluded nonetheless, banished even, before they could get a chance to change. It was a sign of defeat, to bear their own skin and be sent off. Whilst they searched in desperation and feasted on fresh bodies, even doing some slaying of weaker, living beings only to fill their own guts and avoid the starvation. With their blood in store, they felt no thirst, but it seemed likely not to have been rehearsed. By any means in their play of disembowel. They searched the bodies and took the bones. In those weird shapes, fashioned out of bodies which weren't suited for survival, they coated themselves and sought in some peculiar way, protection against their fellow fiend. Neither could be trusted as far as their skin-deep hatred had been shown and given birth.

Only one redemption lay, as they looked upon one another and noticed how light and pale most of them had been. Oh, those dreadful arrogant ones who couldn't help themselves but feast on a darkening meat had sealed their won fate out there. In their arrogance and poor control, they had chose to fight instead of flight and mightily unaware, they had been stricken from behind by a wicked creature, grey as ash. From the thinness of its body there came nothing to have made it seem dangerous to the touch, but the many metal bonds which had been wrapped around it lay bluntly against the heads of its victims as they hath been stricken time after time until there had been nothing to be smashed against. They lay open and burning in the sun, a scent which drove them away. 'Tainted meat, lay it out there and do not approach it. There's nothing great about it, in the way it stands and permeated in cowl and in scent. Stray away from its kind and pay it no mind.' Something dreadful had happened, as its like had been mixed with filth. More so, it had been clear, out of some dreadful amount of fear and out of sight, out of the like, there could be naught but the agony of woe. Confusion was dreadfully in the wrong as the world was to be refashioned by means of exclusion and the coming of the great machine. For nothing could actually evolve or get past the way they had defiled one another in the sign of meat. The first sign of this organic deterioration was set to come. It wasn't even as obvious at first, as the vessel had watched carefully of the dreadful arrogance the beings of meat had shown, and how they might worship their own, only to end up surrounded by a madly coloured red globe. Unnervingly aware of it, there was nothing it had to warn them of the coming woe. There, it would stay and observe, but rather caught in its own affairs, it pushed it a little. Somewhat controllable, those machines had been obedient to the strange creature at the top of those lost mountains. Signals travelled in some way which couldn't have made it much harder to intercept than it had been there. Ever so closely, they would give in and begin. First they had to put it down. That creature which was in the sky, who was collecting something which didn't belong to it, oh, how many corpses and bodies it had collected. Even more than obvious it had been the fact that it had done much of the killing itself. Such a thing was dangerous to be left unchecked, especially since those tiny servants had allied themselves with it and pretended in such an act as them being harmless beings which only helped. As it took control over the machines below, it suddenly infested them, not through biological means but through some surreal kind of virus. It didn't act in the way a virus had supposed to have worked. This thing only made it so, pre-existing parts and devices could grow and duplicate on organic matter, regardless of how little and insignificant it would be. Henceforth, as soon as they had been infected with it, suddenly, small, tiny blocks of copied pipes and devices appeared out of the thin air, as they killed the bacteria which had been in the room and imploded on themselves. Being unattached to anything of the sort, the result had been unsatisfactorily mad. Everything living in that room where it had begun died. Not everything to a single point, as there had to be limits imposed to the fact that some of the integral inner-structure could be destroyed in the process, leaving the locked conduit which hath be followed. Neither of the likes which belonged to the machines would grow on something which would compromise the structural integrity which had to be held at hand. And neither woe could be held for the smaller things which allowed for the space to be occupied. In which case, everything which exceeded a certain extreme would be extinguished from having a certain form before it could infest various other parts or pieces which had lain around them. That's how it happened, that they were given form nonetheless, as a moving chain made out of the trail left there, on the outskirts of what's been left of the outside world. Destruction lay at hand as they raised themselves, or had shown signs of getting up from their slumber. Many of the towers suddenly shook but made not other move. Clearly something had gone wrong, if it could be told in motion and watched. But that had to be a concern for another. What had divided the men and the creatures had been the coming signs of another one of those rains which seemed to be trifling to life. It had managed to end a great bulk of the population which resided there and now, it looked as if there was some trembling woe which would bring nothing but death to all. For the sake of itself, the machine had infested the plants and made way to the strings. From there on, forth, it had looked as if it was over. Soon, the many strings which connected as become coils, being as inter-connected as they were, crossed and what not, they seemed to bear together sparks upon their connections. They stopped and hadn't infested the creature which resided in the sky, or at least not entirely. Its fate had to be one of suffering and one which had to be remembered for all of those who'd dare defy this world, the ones who might invade and attempt to bring nothing but exploit to it as well. Once they had been done converging them, suddenly they took off from underneath, like small coils dragged back to some greater wheel, they pulled. And all of the sudden, this great bulk of bodies which had took over the outer planes had fallen like a great black globe or some meteorite, bringing down with it some kind of mad distinct destruction which had been felt and resonated with everyone that watched. Upon the ground, on which it fell, there had been no crater, only a spread of the organs and the bodies and the great other bulk which had formed its body. There it stood, resigned to its fate, with nothing else to it, nothing to come forth, nothing to direct or anything big enough to be dissected. And like vultures being drawn forth to it, the men and those morbid creatures followed, long having abandoned the cracked globe which had fell. It had been the margin of error, in which the servants mistyped upon their distraction, in which their progenitor died. But that was a little matter, something unimportant to most, as they had been heathens at heart, and seemingly they had found a new fallen master. Each man and man-creature alike came and gathered, snatching a single piece of a corpse for themselves. In the wake of this death and morbid-like deceasing manner, those insects which had served found their progress and their woes to have faded and chose something other instead. As they observed the changing coils, they went in and started pushing themselves towards being converted. For what life was there to live if their progress could vanish in such a second, other than to be ever-lasting? Death was impossible, but, perhaps this conversion would exceed the means of angst. In some peculiar way, their change had begun through some irreversible mean which appeared only to taint their own forms and change them. From one immediate turn, they immediately changed without any kind of resistance coming from their ancient bodies, even so, it appeared to be far more likely that they gave in too easily, only to be conversed into immobile dumb coordinate inserts. There was nothing to them any longer, no mind, no power or seemingly any show of strength or speed. It was there that they had not only scattered themselves but also came back together only to lie in their small sphere and collect themselves. They had made an ultimate show of their fruitful desperation as it ended, finally broken before they blew. That insert which had been made out of them had been useless, as it had known very well where to go and what to do in order to convert the others. It had been obviously clear what was going on, the dread which could be felt in disgust, or at least the means through which the other limbs had been attained. From underneath that small hole which had been made from their implosion, there came a rounded coil which pushed forward. Something about it appeared to be caught in itself. From the certainty of a look, at least to the point where it could truly be said on looked inside of it, there seemed to be a long and hollow mask underneath the ground and the point from which the coil came. As far away as it seemed, through the means of the underneath tunnels which had been made, there appeared to have been some kind of growth coming from one of those filthy tumors which had been kept alive but attempted some kind of expansion. It couldn't have been properly set in case there was some agony at hand. But as the conversion had come to be, suddenly it slipped off the rest of the body and came over its own, like some floating thing kept by an iron crown which had been held by many anchors there. Some kind of power surged, to the point where nothing of it could be propelled to that point in time. A special kind of dexterity had been called into action as if to extract from beneath the ground bile so vile that not even the tumor would attempt or dare catch on. That thing had been stuck between hard and soft, solid and the bizarrely bile-like liquid through which layers fell upon themselves in the depths. The coil had grabbed it and seemed to release it out there by such brutal means that they could be called medieval into action. It was clear enough that this creature was not meant to make contact with the light, for, as soon as it happened, the sky lost its vigour and colour. Many of the shades which had formed it seemed cut off to the point where it had looked like some mad, deformed piece that hadn't even been properly spread. It was clear, in the wretch and disgust which had been shown that neither living being could deal with the stress it had inflicted upon them. Something looked too unnatural, and not only had it been the sky above them, but also, as it appeared, the shades around them. Green had been completely desaturated, reds had been a dark brown or some petty-filthy yellow. Other shades appeared to be caught in various traps which either completely desaturated or caught them in some kind of mad-inducing venom of dreadful colours. Likely, as it had been, nothing would be seen by those who had to live and suffer through it. As this had been just another torment which had been inflicted upon all. The light itself had been dangerously poisonous to them, to the point where they had felt this secret disease which hurt them every moment of their filthy lives. Now they couldn't even work or act properly, instead, it appeared to be likely for them to limp and walk through some confusion. Many had sighted two worlds overlapping, being caught between a memory and the sight of what had been real. It was through some means alone, of that light that the machines and their virus malfunctioned as well. Instead of growing on anything which had been living, the effect had been reversed. Somewhat strange, looking at how a piece coming out of some device suddenly turned into muscle and bone, bearing skin and being very much living with little mind of matter. But that process stopped the farther it went through the depths, where there was no light to facilitate any kind of growth. And the living side had been in some torment which couldn't be explained at all. 'Look, thee, I have seen it so.' 'The tower moved again, unnerved by the same thing I would've known. Now, look, brothers and do tell, can you see what's going on here as well?' Many of the heathens looked happily between the worlds. What they had seen on both sides was the active side and the dormant towers and how they moved and shoved and defiled their world. In that they suddenly released themselves from the band or the tribe, the congregation or whatever the faction may have referred to itself with.

Clearly, something had grown inside of them, to the point where they could look through and suddenly, suffice to say, mourn and long for those days where it hadn't mattered as long as there was destruction. But this plane was vile now, something had changed it far beyond the means of looking at it. There was the certainty of fright then, to the point where no one could be trusted or trashed forward in their means of agony and vile reeds. They lay forth in some way or another, hurt or caught off by means of some made torture from which they could not escape. Many had been far too distracted to look where they were going or heading towards. That's when they suddenly went forth and crept with the likes of pushing inwardly unaware. Something to it seemed to buzz like the sound of some sharpening metal string, wooled in the likes of a compactor which had its engine push inward. One or two, for the likes of which, there couldn't have been more of a thing digested. The worst had happened, as they had been spread and pushed forward in the likes of the dark, the degenerate and the vile. It could be unsought off, for the likes of which couldn't have been even less than unaware of what was going on there. And they've been picked and dragged below the earth in hollow pits which had been made specifically for them alone. It could be incommensurable, the way it had looked, the manner in which they seemed to grow and push forward. At least, down there, from where they stood, it looked as if there had been some growth to be had. Like a system of roots, all of the sudden, the room had been surrounded by many pieces of dirt-machines, and wires and plenty of connectors. Those had been important, especially to a confused heathen who couldn't distinguish reality. Nothing could do well as to explain what was going on there. It was a strange thing, to be looked at, especially from his side, but there came the first into his eyes.

And those strange devices, which had the constitution of a small box of cogs and plenty of rounded moving cylinders seemed to act like some kind of injector. They moved counter-clock wise in order to drag and push one of the many sets of needles which had been filled with both different substances and weird concoctions which could be felt by the like and strangely, alone, the man hadn't wept. There was no tear which would be shed out of the fear that there was something painful on its way. In truth, only one of the eyes had seen the threat, whilst the mind had been stuck there, in the past. Whilst seeing the second image as some kind of mind displacement or some ill effect induced by the gas, a test, oh, so divine, through which he would have to pass. And as the cogs stopped spinning, the right model of the injector had been chosen. In some twist of speed, he'd been immediately injected with the likes and seemed to have pushed forward, drawing and pushing in some kind of peculiarness which couldn't be identified.

Not by any means as the substance shouldn't have been exposed to a man. It should've been noted that there were circumstances through which no one who'd been sane enough should've or could've made forth what there had to be done. It would be peculiar and the likes alone would be estranged. Danger now came to be known to him as a means of defilement, the likes of which couldn't have been trusted. For now, he walked there, unable to see through his eyes and stuck inside his mind. The scope of the needles alone hadn't been to blind him, for his nerves had lain unaffected and the man could still see rather well. No, he lay dormant with a pair of needles pointed and having been inserted in his brain. Their succor had turned four quarters of his brain into some liquid icquour and they continued to push forward. Strangely as it seemed, there had been no cognitive damage whatsoever. More to, the functionality only increased as the process had begun. This strange pain-killer had seemed to completely numb him from any pain. As the arms came, there would be a few parts of his skull which would be enveloped or injected with a pure metal as well. A lot of great deals had to be made in order to keep his head from completely fracturing itself. There had been some kind of great protection to be had, but alas, it waited. Behind that strange twist of metal pockets from which the many tools came seemed to lay an old monitor. It had been wide and large, heavy and outdated. This kind of thing seemed somewhat incompatible from the looks alone. But nevertheless, it seemed less likely that anyone would pay any other attention or even come to care about it. Such, as it had been, there was some uncertainty left there about whom to look after. This was just one of the many experiments which had taken place down there. They had been connected with their tubes and by the main frame that kept them all together. In another one of those pockets and their like, there seemed to be some kind of birth. It was deranged, but not a traditional birth per say. What the process had been like seemed to be the cruel realisation of some peculiar set of reshaping of life. One of the men had been placed under total anesthesia. As opposed to the previous process, this wouldn't be a set of different surgeries made in order to enchant the limbs or guts or even its cognitive abilities. Somewhat new to this, the entire chamber had been filled with some strange liquid which could only affect the living man who was in there. He was a man after all, born out of some mutation which had prevented the pool from ever taking any kind of effect on him whatsoever, he lay there, benignly changed. The sight of the deranged seemed to lie within him. Such was it that he would slowly have his clothes dissolved and soon enough his arms started fading, as if eaten. Soon his body followed and enough watch had lain there for it to be noticed that the man had been there no more. It was more than likely that he was there, just in another form, not entirely dissolved but there, by some matter of mind and atoms. By some damn means, this abomination looked upon itself through some kind of living stature which couldn't be thought as being fond of it. The heat inside seemed to twist its consciousness, which had been promptly stored in some small box-like device before there had even been a chance for itself to outgrow it. Soon enough, the pumps started. It was a strange process through which the liquid in which it had been dissolved and the body itself merged in some kind of body which reigned upon itself through some means of woe. Such, as it had been, there was some kind of growth mass forming as the pressure forced the atoms to merge. Like some infant, it started growing, moving in the directions the machine wanted. Small impulses of electrical shocks appeared to be steering it in each and every direction it wanted and needed this newly forming dumb mass. It wanted to test, as if a check or bucket-list, the different criteria which would have to be applied to living things. Be it object, or a creature which had been formed, the differences should make it clear as to see whether or not this would be quickly discarded or allowed growth. First set of tests. Some pain sensors had to be dealt with, it couldn't be by any other means that this could be thought off. But the sudden charge through those thick and long bulbs which had been surrounded by those thin shafts seemed or appeared to do the trick by some means. They entered through one of the openings above and appeared as to slowly enter the chamber and whilst pushing inwardly, it appeared as to be clear. The first set of tests guaranteed that it had felt pain. Up to a certain point, the machine had proved what had been known to mankind all along. It had been cruel, it had been tainted by the cold and the lack of emotion which had been so sleeked after and desired by logic. It had come at a price as well. For this suffering continued as not for the sake of tests, but because it knew this body of mass to be interconnected with the consciousness which laid in that box. There, the relic of a man had lain, and he suffered the pain this creature in jar felt. No man should've been forced to get through, but then again, no other man had. Something seemed to have come to it then, which prompted it to stop. As the confirmation rolled in, there had to come the other set in order to test this creature. What had been next in line was some kind of test which seemed to manage itself over, as it happened for it to come into some motion of disparity, the dread and sanity of which, could never be trusted by any means alone. Not by the lack of protection or by some creeping lack of the mind. That had been it, as the consciousness had been blocked from interfering with this dumb creature which lacked bones, feelings and seemingly a free will, the room had darkened. Strongly, the glow of red and green seemed to have appeared and permitted through the chamber. It had been in the lack of it that it suddenly appeared.

Unclear as to what was happening, some orders had been set forward on the screen. At first, it displayed nothing more but a simulation of the thing inside the jar, like some kind of mirror. The mass stared and was unaware much of the time. What followed afterwards was the sight of a symbol appearing on the screen, an arrow pointing left. The shock immediately started frying the liquid inside the jar as soon as it had been observed that there wasn't any reaction. A pause. It came as no surprise that this mass wasn't dumb. Despite not being fully developed, as soon as the arrow pointing right had appeared, not only had it not been tricked by it, but it fully understood and went to the side. A set of other commands and directions had appeared then, an arrow leading upwards, one down, another set of rights and lefts and then. The symbol of death, that thing which had been seen in so many cultures and so many unfathomable means which couldn't be called into action, it was even more so remotely called into play that they looked as if no one would be aware of it. None of the other machines which were connected and watched felt or tried an attempt at any. Either one would be met by some kind of remorse or self-fulfilled paranoia then. If one had the mind to it, perhaps it would've been different if that were the case. A small play had been set, to be more precise, to give a context in itself, as to why it would act that way in which it was. To say the least, there was something to it, rather, which had turned it to look before it. Though nothing remote to having eyes seemed to be, this thing had some kind of system which allowed it vision. Perhaps it was the fact that it had grown them inwards, regardless of which, it observed quite well how another specimen had been formed as soon as the pumps started pressuring the liquid into place. Not only had it managed to create two more specimens out of some miscalculation of the pressure needed, but this seemed to have had another ill effect. The one specimen who had previously existed there appeared to have grown wider and into some kind of morbid twist, it had developed something sharp and hardened, still soft at some points, but it could be unmistakable, those were indeed organic teeth. Perhaps this had been planned for, the means of which couldn't have been called or stalled for, in terms of what had been peculiarly left in the awe of which no one dare move a point. It was by that strange mutation that it started acting more aggressive towards the other smaller organisms which had appeared there. Down the drain as they may come, they seemed to be there for some reason or another, in the likes of which, there would be no attempt for them to hide. There wasn't any for them to do so, unless the spaces between the smallest pieces could be accounted for such a thing. In an attempt for some resistance, they suddenly drew in together, the smaller ones. While the machine observed and seemed to not do anything else other than record what was going on, there had been a clear distinction between what had been wagered and the likes of observing the means of annihilation. A clear distinction came between the many other computers who watched and seemed to interpret what was going on there. As soon as it came to be, the sharp toothed one suddenly, pressed on by unmingled for shocks, which affected the entirety of the jar, now charged towards them. Frankly, it appeared that they were both at a loss. The smaller ones had been not only distracted but confused by the sudden shocks of electricity which had forced them to draw in from the impulses they felt. From that point on they dashed in different directions. One of them had been caught by the one who was wider, bigger, bulkier, faster, viler, so on and so forth. In reality, even without a simulation, it would've been properly known, so to speak that there wasn't any chance for it to come forth and live. Too many factors had been involved, which prevented any of them from having a chance. A disturbing factor seemed to be there, which drew out every uncertainty which had been felt. There was dread in that liquid soup they swam in. Mostly because the blood and the amount of cells that spread out as soon as the smaller organism had been bit were embed with that psychological liquid of fear it felt as soon as it had been pierced. By no means could it shout or show any sign of fright, but it had been son. Remorse couldn't be felt or shown, there was only terror as its barely formed blood spread inside the jar. But this wouldn't do, neither would any other kind of woe. It was clear enough, that this would be a hunter and a being which would be tormented, to such clearance of sight, that it opened a new path for itself as soon as it had proceeded to murder the other one. One single sign had been shown, below, to what had appeared to be the bottom of the jar. In it, for the mere fraction of a second, there opened a small tube-like shaped trap door, through which it may proceed. Like some parasite which only felt hunger, it desired so strongly to escape and latch upon a bigger host. This one had been shrinking at a rate which had been unacceptable. And now, now it had been time, for the other test to come. It had been criteria of development, the forcing of the human consciousness into the small primitive creature. Not to think unkindly of it, the least of which couldn't have tormented the likes of which, no man would wager to look forward. For, he wasn't a man any longer, his brain had been destroyed. What was this tiny metal box then? In which a very tiny piece of his mind had been laid. That had to undergo a process of alteration as well. Unclear, it had been way too unclear, to say, to notice, to wager and to proceed with a report. It would have to be forced unto a smaller piece, like a platter, wired with copper, criss-crossed with electrons, through which his mind would be even more altered. Memories would be withdrawn and changed, so they would be transferred. Behind it, the consciousness had been left empty, mindless, and brain-dead, if one could call the process of a machine a mind. It was strange, the way the machine itself, the computer per say looked at the small device. Not only that, but the way it had attempted to draw inward and hide at the horrible sight. The process had to come forward and continue. Small laces and metal pointers, arms or stick-like metal bars came from the top of the tube and suddenly wrapped themselves against the organism. It struggled there, but it could do no harm. By no means could it fight the forceful distaste through which it fought or had attempted to do the likes. Not only that, but as it may have come, there was something clear there. It had merely happened recently, to put a point where it may have lain. The mind of the man had been quickly injected through the head of the organism. It had been visionary, for such a dumb creature to receive a mind of its own, or to recover as they had been the same, through the magnitude of chance. Certainly, there was no control there. The man wanted to scream as soon as the organism had been released and as the tube had been forced onto itself another time, it had been clear that there wasn't any way out any longer. It was clear enough, that there would be no other chance to get through. Organism had been made at a faster rate, to the point where they evolved pieces of themselves which wouldn't belong there. It was irrelevant, for the mere force of the basin in which they swam killed them. It hadn't been the same for it, as certainty called for wager. It was a mere fact that it had been in danger of the lost hope, the fright, the might of which couldn't have been called into action. The trapdoor would open at any moment, it had to, and as the alternative would be mere death. Having to wait made it suffer through the constant switches of pressure which had taken and given life to those dead organism which lay at the top of the ever pressing tube. It was an ever-pressing grinder at the top, which appeared only to push forward what seemed to be the likes of constant crushing. It had made the soup ever so bitter and the shocks grew ever stronger, ampler, they started jolting through the metal railing at the top and at the bottom as well. It had been unplanned for the trap door to lay open for this long, but this happened nonetheless. It couldn't have been accounted for, the dread and mystery which seemed to be, as this creature forced itself through the tube and went down the unknown. There could be nothing there, but another storage kind of object, in which it had been bottled. Likely, the pressure hadn't stopped and neither had the trap door closed. As soon as it came to be, nothing could be accounted for, no amount of terror, no sight, nothing had been right. It would boil in its own rage, now that the man took over the body. He had to be forced into some kind of awareness which couldn't even last for as long as he could know. They switched between the dumb creature and him, otherwise, he would go mad, from the mere fact that he couldn't feel his limbs, or his moving lips. The object had been compact and had been stored with other specimens. In that strange kind of vision, he could see through the materials and look as the various captures. By no means were any of them living organisms. No, he had been an exception so far, as the machines seemed only to have harvested different parts from different creatures, the top of which lay pieces of men. There lay deformed hands and birth defects, pieces of some fetuses and what not, something which moved from now and then. It couldn't be. Such a simple fact had made him not only uncomfortable, but forced him to relate, thinking that pieces of those men's consciousnesses had been stores in pieces which didn't belong to them. Much worse, out of his sight, had been the thought of pure disturbance which had occurred. What if that fetus had a mind, and what if that mind hadn't been its own since it had been undeveloped, but that of its mother, stuck inside the body of her own child? Such a thought brought nothing but a deep paranoia and a morbid kind of precedent which couldn't be avoided. Men could bear such an agony, as he had, and just as the other ones around him that, but no mother had deserved that fate. What kind of cruel and cold, illogical machines were they? Who had programmed them and what had been the scope of it? Neither concept could be kept alive, nothing but the drive and false hope which only appeared in small notices remained. Three dots were unlit, one began glowing red. What could that have meant as well? Down the line, there had been another experiment as well. Different conditions could be named and called forth, pushed onward and creped upon, but it had been clear that the evolved body of a human being laid there. Some alterations had been made out of the adaptations which had been forced upon him from the world out there, but that had been it. By some unknown criteria, it had been settled, through observation and experimentation, predefined conditions that human beings were the best specimens to be experimented upon. Those who were sacked and poor in mind and degenerate by their own standards have been deemed to be set forth for the good of mankind. It was clear that the machines were militarily defined and created by means alone of savage salvation. That may have been the case in the past but now, well, now it seemed likely to have changed. Some strangeness had occurred, some malfunction or some forced had claimed them. One which seemed to be out there, on top of the very heights where the clouds hadn't dared move from point. Clearly, it had only to start again. This one, as it had been said, would be different, at least in the way it would be worked upon. No clear sign could be called into action, for as long as it seemed for it to be there, no amount of effort could change it. Such a deadly deformed thing reacted vaguely harsh to shocks. At least from the first set of long bolts, not only had it not reacted properly, but it hadn't been tamed. Not to mention that it hadn't been broken apart by the molecules in which it swam. Atom by atom, it had managed to pull through and survive. No clear sign of drowning laid there either, on the contrary as well, it had shown signs of living in it. That liquid in which it swam had no air, or at least, the jar or the tube had been designed in some way to limit the access of oxygen to a point where only a smaller being would be able to survive. By no means could such creature, for it had been settled by a new set of defined criteria that this wasn't a man any longer. Physical appearance barely matched, it had been written on the screen. Adaptation far surpassing the ones which clearly belonged to man, to the point of showing signs of being freshly dormant. It could wake at any moment and when it had and if it had shown signs of doing so, there would be something to be looked out after. A dangerous specimen lay at hand, and it could also mean that if it were for it to wake up from this state, there could possibly be a chance for some contamination to occur outside the jar, which would be promptly shattered. What stood out, especially by the looks of this pseudo-man was the complete size of his two hands and how deep they seemed to go inside his forearms and arms. There were two pieces at least which went as deep as they could go, getting through bulk after bulk of dreadful mass, which couldn't be looked upon because of the idea which went inside. As it seemed, from a quick scan which had been conducted, courtesy of the machine, there appeared to be some kind of individual beings which had been attached to the inside, no, there were no bonds, those had been its tails. It looked like a modified or grown parasite which grew and replaced his arms. That's why his hands looked out of place. It was all to clear now. Their body bulk had been rounded and puffy, most importantly, filled with small rounded egg sacks which would seem likely to eventually be forced to hatch. But not inside this jar, not now, as it looked likely that their two mothers had been rather dormant as well. Though their thickness had been at least two times the circumference of two normal hands, to the point where they looked like boxing gloves attached to the man. By his face, there laid a few other peculiar attachments which seemed to have been scanned. Perhaps that had been the result of some disease of some disturbance, as a reaction to the attached parasites inside his body. Yet, this man had grown or acquired a higher bone density around his skull, which closed some gaps at time and moved. It had done everything in its power to prevent any kind of attempt of growth which may even get closer to his spinal cord or to his brain. It had been hard to watch then, for that's when the extraction had to come. With much of the idea being laid beforehand, one would have to be careful there, not to wake this brute. Who knew what else it may have inherited or what other might it may have had. That's why there were a few harder and much harsher tools involved, the likes of which would cut and drag and drown the poor creatures before they had the chance to wake up. It had been observed afterwards. Some expensive tools were there at work, as it seemed, immediately, for a pair of high-precision cutting heat appeared and started cutting and rotting through layer after layer after layer of the carapace which surrounded the pseudo-fists. They went over and through, the likes of which couldn't have been called into action, or rather, be looked down upon any longer. Finally they had been rounded and cut off, yet they were still attached. As soon as he'd be opened though, the liquid came inside, as if drawn by some inner vortex which seemed to drink the entire amorphous thing, to the point where it gutted his innards. Pain wasn't noticed, no reaction. Though the machine felt no fear and wasn't programmed by any means, there had been something wrong which had to be observed. Indeed, another scan had to come, as the precision branch had to be repelled and drawn back in. With a look of the unconscious, there was some pity there, he had looked rather calm, too calm for someone who took that much pain. It was noted, after another scan what had happened. At the point of return, it looked as if this increase in bone density had done nothing else but put an end to his mind. There had been many corners of his brain which had been replaced by pure bone marrow, the growth of which had caused severe brain damage. In the mighty probability of there being any kind of intelligence left, the chances were rather null. His mind had been castrated, it had been lobotomized, to the very point where it had done a great deal to the parasites as well. Both of them had attempted to get in the nigh-proximity of his brain. What had resulted out of this attempt had been the fact that they themselves had been infested with this bone-marrow disease, which had destroyed their brain matter as well. Such a thing was too contagious that it had managed to spread to the developing inbred spawns they carried. Only that they had been alive, developing in a state of dumbness which would force them out of the eggs in a mindless state, the response of which being immediate starvation. Such a peculiar disease, it seemed, crippled the experiment and the succor. This thing would have to be expelled out of the tube immediately. Perhaps, by some means, a piece of it could be preserved, most specifically, a piece of its head as well as the spinal cord, through which it seemed likely that the virus or the condition had been spread. Such a bottled thing would be rather useful, which had been thoroughly cut off and immediately stored. As for the other part, the upper hatch had opened above it and the remains would be fairly abandoned inside the midst of the molders of dirt, where it could do nothing but rot in an utmost peculiar manner. So far, plenty of the experiments had been decided at to be failures to create any kind of new life, at none which wouldn't prove the experimental danger of back-firing at the machines. The specimens had been flawed, or reacted in manners which would only force their metallic hands, to bring immediate termination upon them with no uncertainty and no woe left. Something had been said and looked down upon, the nigh-uncertainty of which being that. There had been one man left alive. He had been almost ruled out as being the perfect specimen, but it would have to do. For all intensive purposes, he was almost close to being a man, and even more so to the plasticity human beings seemed to provide in an utmost peculiar manner. It was clear enough that there wouldn't be another chance to capture so many healthy specimens, especially at that time of the harvest. And it had been observed that there were seasons outside the plane, where the crops around the planet seemed to be affected in some peculiar manner, lending them some kind of death-clock before they died, only so another batch of plants could grow and replace them. As such, it had been deemed most efficient to deal with this man in the greatest way possible, at least in such a way as it might be necessary. By the twice spared look on his arms, there seemed to be something of a deep endowed bulge coming out of it. Something had gone wrong. He had been injected far too soon by mistake. It was unclear as to what procedure had to follow and whether or not the subject was to be immediately discarded. The substance which had been injected into him had been highly volatile by means of injecting the urge to grow. But not the natural normal growth which would occur, that of the mind was to be clearer. Through his veins, as is started, suddenly it began moving upward through the stream, soon enough joining the rest of his system. By the time it had waited and started recording and playing all the simulations, a reaction had cut through and ended the distraction. This hadn't been able to be fit in any of the many simulations which had occurred and had been stored in their respective batched files. No, it looked likely that the sudden open venture which had been revealed by his opening of the eyes paused that for a moment. He looked like a man who had seen something which shouldn't have seen. At first, it had looked, from his side at least, like a case of near-sightedness brought to some extreme. But that hadn't been that way. It was paralysis which forced him to be caught only there, watching. And he wasn't near-sighted as he seemed to believe, but merely looked through some loop which allowed him to see the various organisms which swam. But not inside the bottled case he had been in. Instead, he looked at what appeared to have been a projection of the universe itself there. Overwhelmed by this alone, he seemed to have looked at something there. Specifically a thing which looked likely to extend the likes of planets, the size alone making this thing lay in the magnitude of a quarter span of a universe. More to say that way, that thing still seemed small in front of his eyes, even though logic dictated otherwise. One thing bothered the man, regardless of how hard he had attempted to look away. It turned and started, that thing seemed to have something against him, the likes of which would dare grown and lunge forward. It had been less of what it seemed to be and of its properties and more of the likes of power it had over him. First, it observed him, calculated in all. Again, he had to reconcile, from where he stood, it looked likely that the thing had been observing him, not the other way around. But how could it? He knew himself not to be physically represented there, no projection could be that wide. Unless his eyes cut through planets and stars, it would be a mistake to think of it otherwise. That's when he started doubting his own sanity, as he lunged himself into a state of complete unawareness. He had been disturbed by the sight and in light of his own choice to see, he simply closed his eyes. And it was then that he waited and see that thing grow. At least, as he had been aware of what it meant, that looked like some sort of malign living disease the universe had. Its body grew on nothingness and the vast open vacuum of space, which in turn seemed to dread itself. Many of its own pieces seemed not to be living at all, but, more in term of what it seemed, that thing had started growing on his face as well. Blindness was incomprehensible and the machine was unaware of the many errors which had soon followed. But this specimen had already accumulated a lot of growths which resembled the end of a lifespan for an organic creature, the accumulation of so many dead cells on a body which had looked healthy just a few seconds ago. Had the injection done it? Everything had been recorded, but before any kind of sample could be taken, suddenly it burst. A sudden set of short-lived, empty spaced bursts came to be. They happened all around the body. In their wake, they revealed no kind of weirdness or of woe, no remains of a human being behind, only the empty marks which had looked like some organic pieces of some spider eggs. No blood gushed, no living piece had been saved, only that sudden image of something which wasn't supposed to be there. Before anything could be done, the man had been gone and that's when the experiment ended. Not amount of fair data had been obtained by the machines and for now they were stuck with the mere analysis of what they had collected. Batched and hidden, whence they lay, it wasn't even for their likes alone that it would happen for them to lay forward. Nothing happened afterwards. It was a complete kind of silence underneath the earth. Only that one had escaped a rotten carcass which had survived by the means of attaching itself to the common earth-worms which had been brought there from another world. It had fed on them, attached to what appeared to be hundreds of them, to the point where they had ensured that it would move its body through the ground without being caught by the executioners, which had been known to be as cold as steel. In the hours it seemed to have lain within its freedom, there seemed to have been some kind of covering in the way. That thing had shown not only signs of adaptability but some kind of intelligence, if it meant it managed to get through the tunnels and collapse them behind its path. To say that it could be untraced by normal means would be an understatement, at least to the point that there could be naught down there, beneath the layers drowned in the gut of the ground. A thing of woe, it had stricken what appeared to be a towering lunge of men. Something it shouldn't have touched upon, at it seemed to have back away from them. A peculiar sight had collapsed a few inches on itself just to have revealed them. But one man stood on top of another who stood on top of another, so on and so forth until they had made an underground tower of the kind. It looked peculiar there, but the purpose of which had been unknown. Being an overly protective being itself, it had confused them for danger and had attempted to spray them with some kind of bile which may jump from one man to the other. Strangely though, they were unaffected by it, to the point where it could even be said that there had been a chance that there would be no kind of escape from it. The balance would be lost, at the cost of which, they would go on forward as to stay there. Indifference had been the key, the sign they had shown. Not only had they been unaffected by this sudden urge the creature had to main them, but it also seemed likely that they switched from their neutral stance to one of boredom. It saw it, it saw them turn their backs on it. This was some kind of mockery the half-a-man couldn't take.

But his efforts were futile, by every mean and after every attempt it had been settled that there couldn't be no difference in the kind of woe there could be brought. Danger was drowned then, as suddenly the ones on the top peeled themselves off and coiled around the ones which hadn't. By the time they had been at the same level as this creature, it winced and had become overly protective. This would be a perfect moment to strike. Obviously, as far as it seemed likely, the state they were in would be the most exposed kind. One sprite, or furrowing bile thrown and the damage would be nigh-incomprehensible. But for now, in its arrogance, which had to be lived, it had done the unknown terror which would haunt it from now on. It had run out of the bile it had so stored from the insides of that thing. The tube it had resided in had been the source from which it had drawn from. And now, that the pest or the skin had been removed and peeled, it revealed its true form. From its morbid curiosity, it looked like the base of some rose, without the flower on the top, with each man being a single spin of some thorn which had lain at its base. That way, at least, had been easier to find some explanation for what it had been. Nonetheless, it pulled below and bellowed for it to follow. This worm ruler, who seemed to have taken the blue of fungus as it had grown on it, white patched and seemingly bug-eyed had no choice but to follow. As it came down the tunnel this creature had made, which would be deeply rooted by some means of which none may speak of, there was some certainty to be had. They were being watched. Unknown eyes and ventures had confirmed them. By the likes alone, there could be no kind of cry of laughter heard there. Many of the peeled body imitations of man had been thrown away, discarded, left there only as a sign. And it had collected quite a few, not only of him, but of other living creatures. Was he to become one of them? It didn't seem likely to have collected worms, though those would be far and between.

Unlikely, to be called into action, it would be like it to go forth and push for the likes. No amount of fright lay there in the air, everything had been dry. The worms stopped struggling as it waited. Around the walls, the coils could be seen as being exposed from the base they had covered themselves in, as it had been clear that they only acted like some cover for the inside. A slithering appeal had lain in that skin when hid itself there, more so than expected. No man could deny what was going on inside, less of the dreadful scent which had inherited the inbreed feel it bore. Such was it, that in its mad wake, a small opening came from the insides as well. Some small creatures came from it. That had been another hive, apparently, hidden from the likes of their distant cousins in the world above. In form, they had been somewhat similar but they managed to display certain differences which couldn't be found anywhere else. Unclear as to what they were, there would be nothing but the will and the despair. Uncertainty had been vile. What was to be done with him? A coil had come and drawn forward with what seemed to be a giant sting, a sharp blade, made out of some metal or abandoned reef found underneath the ground, where it had lain. Suddenly, pinned to the ground like some animal, it waited for something to be done with him. His brain hadn't been completely destroyed, but altered in the past, now it remained in some kind of weird infested state, as the fungus had managed to draw in as well through various tunnels and peculiar means of way. That's where it started as well. Memories faded or had in the least been absorbed by this process, the insides, which had already been affected by the fungus had been completely disposed of and crushed in the means which were to be had and more so, a piece of his mind, which had been spread got spread, immediately, between a small cluster of those inbred insects which had made the insides of the coil. Unto itself, they seemed to have some thirst remain for another victim. Yet above, life had changed. There had been no clear sky any longer, only the veil which had produced its artificial life, which had never stopped and had less than no regard for any kind of biological life. In that, so to speak, there came the first phase of the dismantling of life which had to take place there, no hostile takeover would do without such a thing. And the creatures had been spread and forced to take to themselves in the means of pushing and dragging, fighting one another and being even more violent than they had been before. It had been a fight for survival and so far, even those machines which had been organically converted were perceived as a threat. For, as long as they were there, the various artificial intelligence couldn't get past the very idea, the very principal that they may be converted instead.

And it had gone that way, at least, ever since it had dared invade those catacombs below. As, it had been in that dreadful place that it suffered the greatest loss so far, once the piercing process started, little could make it stray or hold it back. One dreadful peel of strange thick or feeling of distrust lasted. Many of the tribesmen spread as they were held together but stood there, confused. Something had occurred, as the process of this hostile takeover had been grabbed to a held. They hadn't any idea, or couldn't have known that the machines had stopped the tumor from being self-cannibalizing in some way or another. Instead of doing that, now, it had found some cold and moist, emotionless machine to latch on. No, it had been far worse, this machine could replicate emotions. It feared the tumor, which is why it had stopped the process. No ruler could act in such a manner and suddenly surrender out of fear, of fright of some small patch of meat which grew. And grew it had, in bulk, as to place itself against the metal coils and the metal arms which grabbed and chained themselves against the walls. Now they couldn't be retracted, they wouldn't be able to pull back by no means necessary. There, in a quick thrust, the bulks place themselves onto them to prevent escape. Afterwards, they spread, far, wide and most importantly, too quick to be stopped. Not only had they went outside and have grown on the metal case but the growth had also taken place through the insides, spreading through the various tubes and electrical appliance. It was almost as if it hadn't mattered at all what they actually were. No, there hadn't been any living beings down the catacombs, no women to keep the tumor alive, or the other similar congregations of meat. Something else had a stake in it, something else had held it so. Such a twisted image, had it been that pieces of the machine, which had been metal arms, leg, torsos, even robots which had been attached to the giant coiling grasping arm, found themselves extended against the ground or the walls, like small rods, of small pivoting malfunctions of steel. From them popped those wicked things, those that blew and grew the offsprings. Oh and how there would be plenty of them. Now that they had the space and sight, there would be no stopping to their likes. In front of them lay fertile ground. Though they were still attached to the machines and to the living organism which gave them life, it was there that they spread and took dominion for their own. Small patched or squared blocks lay beneath them, while they stood erect, in themselves, attached from behind to the congregation of skin. Whilst looking at it, there seemed to be something in the back. From their point of view, it looked like the thing which had been looked upon stood like some chain which led to some structure of its own. No amount of madness could do for the reign, of such a dreadful thing, which gave the malign impression that they would spread and take over this strange world. Yet, none dared approach the vessel. Not even the very growth which seemed to give in and bring dominion to itself. And the vessel had little care of the growth, as it was responsible for it alone. Why, who else might've forced the machine to pierce through and infest everything? It had no care for the living things down there, as they were disgusting creatures, pests which couldn't do for themselves even if it were required for a harsher grip of any kind of courage to be had. Such madness couldn't be accounted for. It had to be undone. A frightful appearance had been spoken for, in terms of the most distrusted form. It was the first burst that came in a great while and it had been magnificent. One group of the savages had drawn forth towards one of the floating offsprings, which looked rather harmless for its own sake. As soon as there had been a touch, there would be nothing to be taken care of afterwards. No living substance could survive the implosion which had taken place. With a blow coming from the magnitude of force, there was nothing which had remained of them. No pain, no feeling, not even life as it had been previously for them. They had become, only in part, a piece of the growth, which spread and tried pushing itself while growing as much as it could. There wasn't any consideration or any kind of weakness which had been shown from this organic matter either. Despite the peculiar structure of metal which seemed to have over established some kind of dominion for itself alone, there it had been, in the strange way in which it had erected itself, the infection which had come to be. And soon, it would be given the might and the change, the adaptability in which it converted the very metal it had touched, just like in the same manner it had converted organic parts into tiny slits of metal and tiny machines. And having observed and noted what was going on there, suddenly, with the remaining arms it bore, which had force or function, it had suddenly started cutting pieces of its own metallic system, but not before uploading a copy of the central computer which had enough power to sustain itself in whatever form there had been spread. There, in the world, under this constant war, many pieces of the intelligence had spread and attempted to get as many pieces of the organic non-converted objects or small life forms for itself. Those claims had to give it some advantage, it wagered, otherwise, there would be no hope. From the distance, the first attempts came. Of the many machines which had established turrets on the ground, there started the blankets of fire. It worked so far as to burn and purge that organic filth which had infected the great machine. By no means could purging it be easy thought, for, if it managed to get to the dome, it would establish itself like some kind of peculiar living plants which domed over its own world. Vessels would fall from above and pop, spreading everything close to the corruption it had spread so far. This thing had to be stopped. Every living thing there was to be preserved for that reason alone. In some kind of peculiar collaboration between the machines, a deal had been struck. Some of the computers which lay beneath the ground, whom had no allegiance to the one above had made it so, many of the living specimens would be entrapped and forced into storage below. As to that, what might happen if they were never to be given up? A lot of them had been easy prey in terms of there being no escape and the trap being set far too easily for any single one to get forth. Many tiny creatures, neither of which had been infested, fell prey to it. While pushing through the ground, small blocks of dirt had lain all around, and now, there had been no moving life to be seen around the plateau. More so, there had been another thing to be noticed. Despite many attempts, they feared just as well they feared approaching the vessel, to get any closer to the towers. It seemed like no tumor nor would machine even dare come any closer to the towers, though the discomfort made it so a disturbance would be nigh-inevitable. What if something were to reach and touch a tower? Who would be the first to anger the creature or the formation, whatever it may be? In their constant war, between those unethical things which weren't living in the sense of living, the towers were getting ready to be awakened. Either the entire world would be encompassed by those strange frictionless things, or it would be wrecked by means of some kind of destruction. And then, after layer and layer lay burned and in some kind of tanned pile of dark skin, the scent and the very feel of destruction had done it. Suddenly, the earth shook, and the towers had awakened. It had been long prophesied that they would awaken. Many legs set forth from the ground in what would appear to be the actual force they bore. Now, they were alive, they had a physical embodiment and actual power for destruction and much worse. As they arose from their sunken graves, the verge of collapse had come. So had the tower and the plant with its dome fallen. The gas had suddenly spread from their awakening might, and it was almost as if they had dwelled on it for far too long. Many of the various pieces of the sky had darkened or changed into colour. Nothing but winds and tormented forceful gusts came and pushed and shoved the machines and the various tormented pieces of meat which had been given life there. It had been a sight to behold, for the heathens who had outsmarted the machines and the other pests stood there watching as their lords have sprung to life. Such a tormented wake in which there could be nothing coming out of it. But the dreadful awareness or woe had made it seem ever present, even less. Nothing could make it so they might escape. Pure heat made itself aware in the gas. Various pieces of the top there, of the very atmosphere seemed to harden and fall. What a sight to behold. No amount of predisposed false image could stand against the power they had been given. Air molecules hardened and fell as well. Clouds followed and it seemed like, from the universe they had been in, through some mad means, stars were getting drawn near. That had to be some kind of illusion, as they shouldn't have had so much power for destruction. They would only bring the end upon themselves it seemed. Even the gas they produced from the destroyed land underneath them seemed to have only come from the pure destruction they produced. And those beneath the ground hadn't been safe from it either. It looked like the gas poisoned every kind of organic form, giving them some kind of special kind of tumors of their own. With a volatile kind of feel, they would even destroy those growths in their catacombs and infest them with a dreadful thing which only spread through the very earth from which they came from. Nothing was safe from the power they merely emitted by being there. It was something in terms of some inevitable defeat which prevented both of those creeping things from growing and encompassing everything for their very own selves. And instead of looking as what had to be something surreal, or the means of which might've infested reality with its strange appearance, this had been a complete failure. Hordes of corpses lay everywhere, buildings and fortifications collapsed, there could be nothing worse than the very fact that on both sides there had only been the corpses of those who hadn't any chance at all. And what came to be a full stop, the towers suddenly stopped at the mid-way of cutting a semi-circle in the planet. What they had met on the other side seemed to be far too important to be completely destroyed now. For the time being, they themselves had to ponder on what there had been seen. Suddenly the gas which had destroyed everything turned on itself only to reveal another function which had been hidden. The growth and the change, for, as it seemed to be clear enough, they themselves had been caught in this strange race to take over and claim the planet as their own. In the distance, stars not only stopped approaching, but it had been clear enough what lay there. Small human beings, the creatures which had been killed and everything else, down to the growth and the machines had been brought to life. But in a mad twist, they had been infested with the disease of the towers. Most of their bodies were flatter, longer, and resembled the towers in their forms. Even though they may have shared something with their previously lived life-times, these were horrific twists that only acted in the likes and benefit of the towers. But, the other side, it hid something as it seemed to be. Many giant bodies which were bed-ridden, their size being almost so wide and high that even the towers had to stop and suggest to themselves reconciliation. Something was wrong with them, those humanoid bed-ridden creatures. They were caught at their bodies and seemed to have been encompassed in some carapace of the like, which only connected to the planet. What was to be dragged out of it was the fact that there would be some kind of danger if they were to be removed. What else might there be? It seemed likely, if not ever present that they would look around from their dormant state and spy on them. And there, free reign from the pollution came. No one pushed onward to take over or to infest another, for, how could they? Everyone seemed to have been converted in the same peculiar form, which would either be an infection of its own or some dreadful malady which remained the same. And there, in the distance, it seemed, while there was peace in there, there had been war, waged between other planets, other infested vessels who had taken over, or had made worlds of their own. No more likely it would've been for them to be than others, than, for now, it seemed likely that they would never be seen again. Some were eons away from one another, placed beyond any kind of hope that they would intersect. Others had been drawn by the strange power the towers had and their gravitational force, in which they couldn't help but watch as they've been forcefully dragged. Yet there, in the emptiness they waited and continued living in their mad, almost tormented way. Without means of communication, other than signaling to one another, vessel from vessel, deities as they would be called. And they were many, and they were old and young and they had dwelled on Earth for far too long to have been forgotten in such a manner. No longer would any of them lie in hiding and alas. They were there. A planet which hadn't been unlike others. There had been some normality to it, other than the fact that many of the realities of men had interacted as well as they seemed to have converted one another, this one had been peaceful, or so it seemed. In some ways, divided into some kind of weird notions, weird planes, even tiles around the very ground on which they came to be, there seemed to be an array of buildings which had been made. Towns, cities, a rather pleasant civilisation to be looked upon, with its high holds, many tall buildings, interconnected by highly-placed bridges and there, there had been hope. For some kind of future, as there had been, it lay in the hands of those who had been brought from the distance and left there unchecked. Without the means of destruction, without the likes of it, cheerfully, the masses were left there enrooting. It looked plain, cannons firing, it wasn't cold either in that time of the year. And neither of the people who had inherited that planet had ever known how close to destruction they had ever been. For a few more aeons away in distance and they would've been forced to collide with a star. The result of which would've been that the vessel would survive there, alone, left floating in the emptiness of nothing. The endless space swallowing and tormenting it. And it would've all been because of some filthy vessel that had devoured and cannibalised others in order to attain their power. It had been the same one who had stopped the towers as well, and had cleansed its own planet in the means that no means would rein freely of mind. Unlike it, there had been some which had been pure, and others who had been just a bitter less than tormented, but that's where it stood, amended of whatever it had given birth to. So it seemed, there would be none, who'd stand against it, waging war no more.

Falling Pit

It was somewhere in may fifteen that we first heard of the strange circumstances that befell upon lord Pond Wick, a smuggler of the Hunchcreek st. of fair descent. He owned a mansion which he had received twenty years ago from a dying uncle or another relative of some kind. Nothing of the things I've read helped me get what happened to him and his family. I was called there to investigate this, despite being a close and shut case by the authorities. This is when I arrived, at one a. m. , to a locked door, waiting to see something. I should've brought a torch. Nevertheless, apparently, I was to wait for him here and see what it's about. None of the reports made any particular sense in the way they tried to explain it. Henceforth, the only good way was to go there for me and find it out.

'There you are, Pond I presume. '

'Greetings, greetings, glory to your honor. '

He shook both of my hands and appeared to be quite humble for a man who lost his home. Apparently, he was living in one of the smaller houses in the area near his mansion. Luckily for him, there was at least something of a plan in case of a disaster such as this one.

'Are you going to tell me then?'

'First, you need to see you for yourself and decide whenever or not you will help me.

There were others here. . .

Come on. '

He was violently jerking his flashlight, trying to get a light as fast as possible from the looks of it. Perhaps he was in an even worse condition that I thought of. This is the moment which got my interest. 'You're the private investigator, after all, right? I'm fairly certain that I haven't made the mistake of welcoming a stranger to my property. "Indeed I am, here's my card again, you should have a copy of it near you in case you kept it. 'And perhaps you could stop being as paranoid. Something about this place left a bad feeling to it, perhaps that'd be the reason why he was so afraid of something. A general sense of nothingness bore through the place and I wasn't aware of what was going on. Nonetheless, he checked both of the cards and found out that I was the same person. 'Thank you for that, you can never be too sure of something. 'As well as he said it, the flashlight started working. Nothing could be seen so far, as there were some steps which had to be made through his garden. Truly said, it was a fantastic garden, but that's not what I've come here for. 'About my payment then. "Once you see for yourself and accept this case, I'll give you half the way and the other half once you're done. "Good. 'Something didn't smell right here. I wasn't aware where he was leading me but there wasn't any light thrown over his wrist, rather, it was aimed towards the ground. This man was purposefully hiding what we were about to see. 'What are you hiding here?' I asked now that we stopped. Apparently, he had taken a break for what I'd believe to be the grand reveal. And this flashlight wasn't there to shun light over what was left of his mansion. No, this was certainly something else. There were wires on the ground he was showing me, leading to a pair of round light makers. Plenty of them to create an artificial day if you asked me or any layman. 'With one flip of the switch, everything that was known to us and our world will soon be revealed. Be ready to witness what had befallen upon me and my once dear family. 'He was right, with only one flip, it was almost as if there was the day once again. It revealed something that my mind had blocked for so long as I've read the file report. A hole which fell from the sky. From the looks of it, crushing and destroying a giant portion of the mansion. 'Incredible. "Not quite the word I'd use but whatever it gets to help me. 'There were the levels and parts of the stairs. I could see into every room, bathhouse and below. Oh, the great below was dark, impossible to look through even with the greatest of the lights pointed at it. Something of a dark mist covered what was laid below. Nonetheless, I thought this was fantastic and bizarre from the simple glance I laid upon it. 'This is fantastic, close to being out of this world, how come none came here to investigate before me?"Well, they did come, as I said, but this is the reason why they all go away after some time. It's that thing in that pool of dark floating mist which seems to make them get close to being mad. Nothing personal, it's just how it always goes. Time after time, they come and promise to do something and find out what happened to my wife and daughter, only to inexplicably go away. Some went missing but I won't go into great detail with that, there's no need to concern yourself with those matters. So?Will you accept?"You're damn sure I will. "Great, first thing in the morning. You've read the announcement. "Right, I have. A place to sleep and warm food for the entire period of time staid here right?"The man nodded and closed the lights. Somehow, this appeared to be more like a trial to me as the thought of this mansion in its decrepit state would bore into my dreams. Perhaps this is the reason why they all went away, after a night in this place, there wasn't any doubt that something did affect them. There were a few other buildings located on the side, almost hidden from sight. He pointed at the adjacent one standing right near the border of his property. A few more inches away from where it ended, to be more precise. 'You're to sleep there or in any house of your choosing until the morning comes. Except for a dinner and a coffee in the morning if you make out the night and still decided to remain in my employment. "Fair enough, see you in the morning then. "Wait, I'm not done yet. 'He lit a cigar, leaving a dark trail in the air, continuing on with what he said. 'I don't know why this is happening or why it happened to my family, but I'm aware that for some reason I'm not affected by it. 'No dream, no vision or no event he said. Nothing but this destruction which was aimed towards it. One that pushed him towards anonymity, seclusion and alienation of the outside world. 'I'm not afraid of this place sir. And just so you know, I've never broken a contract, regardless of how dangerous it had become. You can put your trust in me. 'The man nodded and gave a husky smoulder over his nose. This was to be a night to be reckoned with. 'Now let's see. 'A fairly rustic little house with a bed, a stove and some decoration. Perhaps it was fashioned out of a stool storage box, for the size didn't leave much to do other than sleep and standing around. 'No need for fire this night. 'After opening it, could it be more clear that there wasn't any need for fire any night? Something had fallen on the wood and made it wet. But the last rain had been a few weeks ago, and there weren't really many signs in the garden that it had rained. Did he do this on purpose then? A weird way to seek for help only to drive them away and remained with this mystery. It was even more peculiar that no one had even brought the news to the outside world. Everything had to become clear in the morning, towards one way or the other. That at least I hoped it'd happen. Was this the full mansion then that I saw then? Standing there, constructed to every brick and every missing side. I swear I saw it somewhere else in a faraway land where there were plenty of others. He had workers in the house, many of which would cook, clean, tend to the garden. Entertainers and plenty of his so-called friends who'd come. 'Sir, your invitation. 'It was a man who stopped me and the entry to ask for something which I bore. I only had a small thicked which was fashioned with gold edges and something of a silver block inside. 'Thank you, sir, you may enter. 'Plenty of others stood behind me in the line, perhaps this event was rather more convincingly better than I've expected. My body felt like it was there, to the point of being no distinction from this lucid dream and the reality. The way they were bouncing was extremely arousing. And not mention that the drinks were of the highest expense, aged well for this gala of his. Why did he do this every single night I wonders? How could his supplies and fortune never end? It was quite obvious that there laid some form of devilry involved in it. Nonetheless, It was quite curiously enjoyable to watch. The attention I've received was nothing short of flattering, to say the least. 'Me?' I asked, whilst getting ready to indulge in the same matters as the rest of them had. Quite peculiar to become the centre of attention but I was about to enjoy this night rather more than I expected. Even behind that mask and that dress, I could see something that of which I desired. No one else tried to bat an eye at what was going between two people who were dancing quite as far away from the others. We were alone in this but in a way, I felt like I could do more than dance and interact with them. For a moment there I appeared to have become this man in every sense of the word. Everything which happened to me would reflect on him in more than a possible way. But I was also aware that this had to end at one point or another. As much as I desired for this paradise to never end, this gala wouldn't last past this night. It'd be impossible to ask for more now, judging by the fact that I was still in the employment of that man. As the dance had ended and I managed to snick away, at the sound of the violins, I looked atop of the stairs. The ones which lead towards the upper level. What I noticed then was the fact, the strange fact that the only ones not enjoying were, what I could only think of being his daughter and wife. Strange that he wasn't even there at his own event, to miss such a thing was quite exquisitely wrong of him. Perhaps he wasn't a dream, but this was my chance to approach them. Just a few steps, unless it was forbidden, I managed to gloss over and push myself through the crowd. None of them appeared to be particularly interested in me and my doing, hence I could only do the same. It may have come as a surprise but I was aware of the reason behind the fact that they stood there, looking as afraid and shocked as they were. Perhaps it was peculiar to ask of them for a moment alone to talk. But this was a matter of extreme danger. As it appeared to be, something in the compound of the floor appeared to have started melting away each second, leaving only the skeleton to stand there and remain. I looked behind to see that because of my action, this chain reaction started affecting them. Before anything further happened, I was soon awakened by a shout of what could only be called as horror. Utter, extreme horror which would haunt me for the rest of my days. So I thought until I managed to open my eyes and see that It was morning. 'A mere exaggeration I suppose. 'I said to myself after what would come out as a good night's sleep. Surprised even myself over the fact that I managed to go through the night, I came out to see it. Still frightening, even in the day. Whatever managed to do so, be it a hole which fell out of the sky or something of a compound which might've melted it, I wasn't aware. But what I had to find out now was whenever or not this man had been there the day it happened. 'Morning sir, I suppose you won't be staying any longer, are you?' On the contrary, I'd say, I made a promise and I intend to go ahead with the investigation. 'I had to admit at least that the last night's sleep was damnably confusing, to say the least, and it left me in a light-headed state. He laid there nonetheless, waiting with a few cups of freshly brewed coffee and at least a couple of eggs, toast and bacon. 'I presume you'll be starting right away after we're done eating, is that correct?' 'Right away sir, since I don't think the deal is off yet. 'I was confident enough to take a chance. Without a doubt, this was a lot more than a private investigator made in a year. And this didn't include the fact that it was an only job offer. Not to mention that this included a place to sleep and a meal. Both of them came out decent. The coffee wasn't that bad either. 'I'll expect a report when I return if I still see you when I return. After that, I'll give you the first half, how does that sound for you?' 'More than fair sir. 'There was something which lighted his face now. Whenever or not I was the reason it was quite obvious. A rich man after all needed to work as well, and he was fairly certain that I was about to do my job. Once his private car arrived, he was nowhere to be seen anymore. Our brief meeting resulted in quite that pact I'd say. Speaking of which. 'In what have you gotten yourself into?' It was quite strange that he was the only one who managed to escape. 'Now, where were we?' The stench became evident during the day rather than at night. As the heat came, it fell upon the concoction which filled the hole. It felt like the corpses were still in the process of decay. Certainly, the answer was there, as if there was something there obviously rotting. Perhaps their corpses were as deeply pushed below as he had thoughts. Someone had to be announced by it at least till the middle of the day. It was at eight in the morning, one hour after I woke up that I called a cab for myself. There wasn't any need for the money anymore since I was about to be handsomely paid after all. But I had to meet with a friend, urgently and ask for his advice. He didn't live too far from here, as it were. 'On the St. Salmon seventeen. 'There was quite the traffic out there, but I didn't dare look anywhere else. Everyone except this one man who dared stop managed to pass through without even throwing a glance. Could this have been a hoax after all?' 'Hey, before we go in, mind if I ask you something?' 'Go ahead ser. 'What do you know about the mansion you just picked me up from?' I tried looking through the small mirror to see the change of expression which fell on his face. At least there was some kind of fear and distrust. 'Well, we don't speak about it here in the county, it's just something we don't do. 'And why is that? 'If I may so bold as I am. 'It's because the punishment that man received from the lord, they say. You didn't hear this from me but they say he was a vile man. 'He spoke of him as if he was a tyrant, a vile creature which tormented the poor denizens of the town and overworked them to death. It's strange, for most of the factories were still all of his. But this man was so eager to speak of ill that it made me wonder whenever or not it was true. Surely enough he appeared to be sincere but this account made him appear exaggeratedly cruel. 'They say he lived through meetings and celebrations while the people working his machines were dying while standing infernal hours in the toxic chambers. A bad omen, bad indeed. 'But how did it happen then? This isn't really making any sense either. From what he said, it just fell from the sky, all of the sudden. But there's no hole that just falls from the sky and melts everything, crushing wood and stone without a notice. 'Aye, that's what it happened, believe it or not. You're not the first one to question it, there were others, stood and left as soon as they came. Something in that place behind leaves a warning. 'There was more to it, something which he was hiding, I was utmost certain. 'Say, did Pond have any enemies I should be aware of? Someone who hated him or wanted him dead? An old friend or a rival, perhaps someone from the families which were affected by the work?' A reluctance came over the cab driver, at which he bore me to the point where I needed to be left. 'Do yourself a favour and don't return. No, this one is on me, but I won't take you back and I won't let you go either. That's a bad place right there and everyone involved ends up suffering now. 'A glint of something of a dark smoke became clear in his neck. This man was close to being mad, though I accepted his offer and went away. This should've been the apartment. Luckily for me, I arrived a week before the contract and met with the locals, just to be certain. It was a common building, and from what I remember, he lived on the eight floor. In a dirty little elevator with no one around who'd want to be disturbed. He should've been home, door left open, standing in a room filled with smoke. Damn this man, he almost destroyed my lungs in moments. I had to open a window from the inside only to find out that it was sealed shut. There should've been another in the bath, which got promptly opened. 'And here's the guest of honour, sleeping on the couch. 'He passed without a doubt from the rum in his hand. There should've been a broken barrel here somewhere but time wasn't on my side. 'Jack Wakefield. Come on buddy. 'Somehow, I knew that it would've been difficult to wake him up now, especially under these circumstances. But I couldn't wait either. A splash of water would've been enough. He was about to wake up himself anyway, henceforth, I waited there in front of his table. Quite the collection of newspaper laid there. The dates on them went as far as years before something of great importance even happened. No wonder the Gazette never had this event on, at this rate none would find out. 'Fellow. 'I'm glad you're already awake, we have something to discuss now. 'What do you want now? I've already told you. 'He was too far into it to be able to recognise me. Perhaps some ammonia would've been just perfect to wake him up. 'Who am I exactly. 'The man with the hat that came yesterday, no? Two days ago, carrying something of an envelope. 'It's close enough John, I came here looking for assistance with the thing we've spoken about. Are you still up to it now?' From the likes of it, he didn't appear to be much of any condition at all to help. 'John. 'Right, I'm here, you came to ask me for something. 'I see that this became a waste of time then. 'Wait, alright, I just woke up, let me get a coffee and we'll talk. It's over there, still in the. 'I saw it. 'This man was the only other detective I managed to find. Either something happened to the rest or it wasn't as popular as a profession around these parts. From the looks of it, he wasn't any different than the town drunk. Though something of his reputation appeared to carry him over. Some spoke while others highly praised his work, perhaps to the point of overshadowing this problem of his. Boiling the water took something of a few minutes, putting the coffee, waiting. At least two cups of stood on his table. I wanted to remove something from it so there'd be enough space, but he refused. 'Let them there. 'The newspapers were too old to be missed in case one of us spilt some of the coffee on the table. 'Well, are you feeling better now? Can we at last talk about what we need to do?' 'The Pond case, with the manor, I remember. 'That was fast, to the point of me feeling something which had been in the coffee. It was a strong scent, a chemical of some kind which was placed inside it. Normally I'd be against but I needed answers. 'Were you there at any point at all?' 'No, I wasn't called. But I've heard that most of the people who were called apparently disappeared or immediately left. Something kept getting rid of them. 'And there wasn't any of who was called to investigate this?' John didn't do much other than shrug his shoulders at this. 'No one cares enough to pay for them, neither the city nor the families. Speaking of which, there weren't any complaints that came. And no complaints, no evidence, so on and so forth. "That neither the authorities came to investigate or do anything about it. "Not to mention that it became apparent that this Pond Wick is an eccentric man, rich as well. He owns half of the factories and manufacturing in the town. "Then why do people shun him if he practically owns this town?" There came the second shrug before John went on. 'It doesn't excuse the rumours and what they say about him. Perhaps there's nothing but a whisper or a bad thing but they say that he's the one who called for this pit from above. "Why would he wish the death of his family and guests?" The people there, you knew about them? How? It wasn't written in the records, most of us know because we could hear the noise coming all the way through the forest directly towards us. "It was. . . I asked Lord Pond, that's all, nothing more and nothing less. "Right, now, as I was saying. They say he did this to himself to get the insurance of his mansion. Fairly enough, it's not often that it happens for a dark hole to fall from above. The circumstances were nothing short of bizarre, but nonetheless, it worked in his favour. A free man, even richer and a few people he hated were gone. "People he hated?" "Didn't he tell you this then? Mister Pond had a habit of going around and inviting everyone to his parties. People from his entourage, those who he hated or he hated back. In return, he had this persona or having to show off even to those who deserved it or not in his mind. "So there's the motif. But if this is true and no one does anything about it, why was I called in the first place? To investigate I mean. This was the last time he shrugged before standing up. He had finished his drink and if I remember correctly, John had promised to come and take a look around before the afternoon. 'Why he called you say? Well, we're about to find out once we take a look at it, won't we?' He locked the door but not before getting his jacket. This came just in time as he was the only one between us who drove a car. Since it was obvious that I wasn't going to enter any cab of the kind, this came as a pleasant surprise. 'John, thanks for helping me. "You don't suppose he'll have something to say about this whole ordeal, do ye?" He won't find out I hope, plus, you only need to take a look and give me a second opinion about this, nothing more. I'll inform you of the details on the way. 'This was a few minute drive, as the twisted road didn't lead to much to be expected. He appeared to know more than he was letting off. At least about the whole story in mind. As a sober man, he finally appeared to be a decent worker, calmer and focused on the road. I could see that spark in his eye, that which signalled something of a mind of his own. Perhaps he only came because he was simply curious about the entire ordeal and nothing more. 'So, just take the next left and we should be there. "Weren't we supposed to drive a little longer on the front? I was sure he was at least halfway through the forest, at least until the turn of his mansion. "Your memory seems to be dimmed, just take the left and we should be there. 'He complied quite quickly despite his ongoing protest. It must've been the memory which was the problem of it, all that drinking started to affect him. One last thing he needed to do, at least until he eventually fell in that drunken stooper which awaited him. 'So, like I said, it's here. "It's not supposed to be here. 'He quickly jerked into his seat as he threw another glance. For him, this was all wrong, the position and just how close it now was. At the moment of our arrival, John was quite perplexed by what he saw. Every rumour he's ever heard turned out to be true to every word. In the day, this appeared far more shocking than in the night. The stench did much to wake him as well. 'So, what do you think about it?" Way too big. What exactly did happen here? And I don't mean that a hole had truly fallen from above the sky, which makes no sense whatsoever. 'He jerked in a spot before moving on. Strangely, that thing, a substance in that pool called for both of us to approach now. 'Let's see it again, I'll at least tell you what I think it happened. Perhaps it wasn't a blunt object, I thought that the single most plausible explanation might've been that it melted through. "How could wood exactly melt?"If a hard object fell from the sky, a space rock or anything alike, it would've crushed the entire foundation. But look at the marks on the upper floor. It's perfectly even everywhere. Where's the last place you've ever seen something cut so perfectly even?"This was indeed strange. Too much for one to take alone. He didn't have the guts for it, I could already see it in him. 'Wouldn't there be burn marks, ashes, or anything there?All that I could see makes it seem like it was cut with the help of a saw. "Wouldn't that remove any claim from the money he was supposed to get?"It would've. 'Said John but something about that scent really drove him away to get some air. 'It might be toxic, I'd rather have you stay away from it as long as you can. You need to go. "I can't go now, especially since I found out that I was the only one to come and accept the job. Are you insane?"No, but you are if you think you can just stand here and take this. It's not worth your life. 'This sudden compassion for me seemed to be fake. Did he plan to take on this alone and replace me in the long run?I only need an extra opinion, nothing else, and he delivered. 'I think I'll be able to handle myself from now on if you excuse me. 'Despite his warnings, I saw his skin turn to a painless I haven't seen before. At least this removed any suspicion I had about him trying to fake his distaste. 'Fine, do whatever you like, but before I go, take a look at the back of the mansion and see it for yourself, it was moved I tell you!You're on your own. "Fine, crawl to your car, I didn't need your help in the first place. It might've even saved me a bill if you told me in time that you were too scared to do anything to help me. 'After hearing the gate close behind my back, I've had no other choice but to return to my investigation. Regardless of what he previously said, I wanted to make sure that what he said about this mansion being moved was true. I just needed to see for myself. But not until I saw his car driven away, which he waited for some reason in the road. Was he spying on me now?It raised an awkward situation, especially since lord Pond wasn't aware of the fact that I wanted to ask for someone. I could hear in my mind. 'What?I thought we settled that you'd worked for me, not some cheap town dwelling drunk. Should've known better before trying to hire a two shoed good for nothing city folk such as yourself. 'He went away, alas I was safe once again. It was to be the reason why I needed him, at least to confirm. Going around didn't take long and I started to notice just in how good of a condition the house was. From this side, it appeared to be more than fine. It was well enough that someone could not bat a second eye and believe that someone was willingly living in the mansion. One turn nonetheless revealed the trail left on the ground. It was almost as if the ground was tilled by someone all the way through. And whatever was in that black basin, its small fumes managed to hide whatever laid behind of it. It worked well, I had to admit, one-second glance past the poll and the hole through the mansion and I couldn't see the gate. There was quite the amount of evidence to be found. Not the concealment alone but the fact that this mansion might've not only been cut but also dragged from one point to another. 'But damn that stupid mistake. I shouldn't have told him about what I dreamed, now he'll think me as nothing but a bloody amateur. 'Something was in store for me later, after lord Pond came back to check on me. At least a few hours left on the clock for me to check on everything which laid in sight. For this was the best excuse to get away. What I didn't want to admit was the fact that I started being affected. The fumes appeared to attack the lungs at a certain level. Relentlessly attacking anything which might've helped me in the long run. Just one more step and I was out of the strange rage this area had. Nothing but a field now, as long as I could see. All I had to do now was to follow the marks on the ground. In a few days, there wouldn't be any doubt, perhaps weeks or months at best, but the rain would hide it away. Certainly, someone else had to notice this. Too well to have been dragged, I noticed. 'Someone might've pushed it rather, but how?' The mansion was old, despite its good condition and the strange circumstances. As I arrived at the point where the mansion, which I assumed to be taken away from, I looked at the ground and saw no strange mark. Looking on the right, I became aware that it faced the other way. One single closed gate, the same type as the one in the front, which meant that behind the fence, there should've been another one. 'Another one. 'It got my attention. There laid stairs on the ground. But as I looked at them I noticed that they were quite far from this entrance. At least twenty or forty meters away. Which meant that this wasn't even the original position whatsoever. A trail came to mind at least in the few moments. There made no sense whatsoever for it to be pushed. One line of people waited here to get inside, I was sure of it. Something like my dream appeared to be inviting to me. It made me feel well deep inside but distracted from this conundrum. The perfect condition, without a scratch and cut through. What else could it mean but the fact that the mansion also missed another entire level which was stunned below? Foul play was seriously at play, but if what he said was true, this meant that there were corpses of his wife and children. It was serious. Enough that I continued with the scheme inside my head. The mansion was big, quite enormous, for it to have been brought to that position, it should've been dragged around into the position I saw the marks begin. After that, it was simply pushed without a question to that new spot. Of which he might've been aware. Lord Pond did keep all those working houses for his servants and what not for a reason. And there wasn't any question that this was made without his knowledge. Damn John, I knew I should've kept you around. It appeared like it was a handful, to say the least. Still, a deal was a deal, and it appeared like there was a long way back, with me having everything I had. Only but the noises from the insects which had gathered. Left uncut, I saw how this place was filled to the least with what seemed to be a jungle. Growths of weed and fallen trunks, this place was unclean to the spot. Just how long ago had this happened? I asked myself on the way. There wasn't any way I would believe this if I didn't see it again but something laid in there calling for me. It concealed any attempt I would've had to look through. Sad thing, to say the least, now to the actual investigation. 'How may I approach this without being taken as they have?' Again with the conundrum, at least it might've slowed me down if it weren't for the fact that a tool shed laid not as far. Something was boiling there, and I could see the bubbled. What I thought to be only a veil of darkness turned out to be the substance I was so afraid for it to be. 'Why have I doubted you?' This appeared to be a strange factor in it, a voice that didn't speak. A substance that didn't rise any further than the bubbles it had inside. 'The tool shed. 'I remembered, as for seeing no reflection in that patternless liquid. What I need for myself was a simple long and sharp ladder. For what was about to be done remained dangerous, to say the least. Especially since I was about to lay directly above the fumes. A damage that could possibly go through and never be healed in case I was the effect. 'Here you are, laying just well. 'It had pints that stick in the ground and a second extension that would push it to at least a few meters in the air. Perfect for what I needed to do. One strike and I was there, standing just behind the window. Despite being close, it was on the verge of being broken. Certainly, he wouldn't remember, but with a tucked elbow, I strode past the ladder and broke the window open. Pushing with it, I threw away every piece of glass I found, past the curtain and everything else which laid there, making just enough room for me to go past. The floor was still sturdy, as for a moment I was afraid. Just as I thought, the floor was in an even better condition than I have previously thought about. Despite my momentary panic, I managed to secure my position. The planks under me made no noise, but as dizzy, as I started to become, I was driven away. There was plenty to explore around, as good as this sounded. Everything about this, once again, would've appeared quite normal to one if it weren't for what was down there. Speaking of it. 'The marks, I need to check them now. 'Withing safe distance, my hands just came over the marks where the supposed cuts might've been. I figured that there should've been something of a mark. Nothing, just pure cuts, with the stuffing still set into the foundation. And there was something else as well. There was no mention of it. Whatever fell or cut didn't leave a mark, making this almost the job of someone who knew what they were doing. He couldn't have said the truth though. A hole doesn't just fall from the sky, that's not how it is. But here this place, still in its previous state. I needed to know why were all the clothes still sitting in as good of a condition. Time didn't affect the drawer at all. No dust had come inside of it. This manner of looking at it made this place appear like it was somehow saved in a different bubble, to the point of being stopped in time. Next, I checked the lamp to see the light. 'How?' I asked myself but decided to go further. As obvious as this lead might've been I've pulled the wire and started following it. There was already quite the destruction there. Something needed to be prioritised over this before I could go on. Just so he wouldn't notice this small trick of mine, the glass had to be thrown into this pit. Two rabbits shot at once I believed, for the starter, I could see if some sort of reaction would suddenly pop if something was thrown inside of it. Secondly, the evidence of me breaking the window would just disappear now that there wasn't anything to show that I arrived there through that way. The curtains certainly were thick and there wasn't any mention of the fact that no one would be able to see past that clouds and fumes. It made a sound as they fell inside. Certainly, something happened there, as I noticed it with my own eyes. Sunken, the pieces of glass went slowly before getting out of sight, like with everything around here. If only there was something else I could test, this was enough. 'For now, lord Pond should be informed. 'There were a few hours before the night was about to come and I noticed that it got dark too fast for my own comfort. Every moment here started making me uncomfortable. And now, the wire, then I'll leave. John could've been here with me and helped me get this if it weren't for his sudden paleness at the hand of those fumes. Pushing my hands over the wall, I thought there'd not be any way to remove it and see where the various wires went. A suspicion arose either way. Why else would he keep a ladder in there? Lord Pond must've been the one who set the wiring around the house once this place was moved. Now, it was either a coincidence that this whole which fell managed to avoid every cable and most of his valuables or there was again foul play. 'There's no choice now, I need to confront him about it now. 'I thought about it for some time but before going one something had to be done. After all, he hadn't paid me yet and it was long overdue. When I managed to arrive the same way, I placed the ladder back into the tool shed, leaving no mark of it getting used. What I saw then, in the closest of nights was the fact that his little house was lit. Someone's home, but could it be Pond? Past that window was a figure, but from the other side, I couldn't tell who it was. It was just as shocked as I was, standing and facing me, from what I managed to see. A thief, most likely just as shocked as I am. 'Get out and empty your pockets, I won't tell anyone I found you, understood?' I declared my intentions, which I intended to do my best in keeping. This was certainly a dangerous thing but I wanted to abide no longer to certainty. Whatever happened in the time I was above there made no difference whatsoever. 'I won't refuse to use force if it comes to it. 'He didn't leave at either, henceforth, I was bound to take action. Despite not having any firearm on my person, I resolved that I could at least grab something as common as a rock and try scaring him off. This was a frightful thing, but the door was locked. Lord Pond gave me another key, but did he lock himself from the inside? No, this must certainly be the thief. With a twist above I managed to open the first lock, the one which could be twisted by anyone from the inside. 'I've got you now!' I yelled, ready to come down on him with as a primordial feeling and might of a caveman. Only but one thing, whoever laid there wasn't the one who locked himself in. There was the second lock, the one which only worked for someone who had a key. 'Someone locked you here, didn't he?' No answer came whatsoever despite every attempt I had at conversing with him. Either I could wait or see for myself what was going on in here. But curiosity did get the better out of me as I got my key and started pushing. Whoever it was, I was about to find out. With one click, I opened to see only the candle left on the table, in a spot which was almost hidden. No figure came, at least not for the shadow! Before turning, I saw how the candles' flame vanished by a gust of wind. A hard blow released me at once. With once again, standing in front of the line. 'I need to, I need to tell Pond about him. Someone's out there. 'Those who were staying in line suddenly turned. It appeared like this was yet another night, different than the one I've previously been in. Not only were there different people standing but I could swear that there were twice as many inside. If I remember it correctly, this mansion wasn't but a simple manner anymore of their play of lights. Now, it appeared more like a palace in its entire meaning. After they returned their gazes and said nothing to the man who shouted, I had to take a look inside and everywhere around before getting in. No tool shed and no pair of buildings there. I was certain of. 'I need to go. 'With proper respect, I gave up this spot in line, knowing that in this dream-like state, I wouldn't go there anymore.

For this fact to be checked didn't take as long as it appeared to take. Just one turn and I saw that there wasn't anything on the ground. Clean, to the point of never having been tilled before. Not only that, but the garden was also tended to, at least as it had gardeners to deal with it. 'There, I knew you'd be there. 'It was his wife who stood there alone, waiting by the gate. If this wasn't the first time, perhaps it was now. Since I couldn't remember when was the last time we met or even if she remembered who I was, this was the introduction. 'My name is Robert Stonecall. Pleased to meet you. 'This was a dream and in reality, she was clearly dead. But that didn't stop me from kissing her head. Despite being as antiqued as it sounded, this was the only way I could step on and try convincing her of my intentions. 'I'm Marie Wick. You probably met my husband haven't you?' Indeed I have ma'am. I'd even say that I and Lord Pond have quite a fond relationship between one another. 'Do you now?' She appeared to have been awakened from her slumber, at least now that she received some company. As lonely as she seemed, without her child, I had received my answers. The tool sheds and the other small buildings which stood on the side. 'Does someone live in there?' I asked without a sudden care. 'Well, no, why would some live in such a rustic place. That's where the servants get their tools and what not. Gardening, cleaning, most of everything that's needed around the house. Perhaps even the mining, though rarely someone's coming here to do that anymore. 'What do you mean by mining?' 'I think that's my husband right there. Do you mind? Wait, hide away until he leaves. 'Before I could say anything in protest, I was shoved once again the small shack from which I remembered going in. Something was wrong and being in this dark place made me feel uncomfortable. Seeing through the shadows and hearing them talk, but unable to grasp what they were saying. That was my problem, at least for now. What was she doing out there then? I waited, trying to stay as hidden as she desired. Looking to see that there was already a bed standing there.

The same bed Lord Pond had stepped into, I assumed, ever since the incident happened. But why all the secrecy now? Once the loud noises stopped, I backed away from the door. I saw her again. 'Marie, what's happening?' She had a pair of keys in her hand as well. This feeling made me aware of where this was heading towards, despite how vibrant and lucid this dream had become. Once she closed the keys and made sure her husband left, she began trying to force herself onto me. Like others who were in this state, I was almost hypnotized by her movements and whispers. Dear lord, she was having an affair all along. But it didn't last long after hearing the screams and the terror from the distance. It was too distracting, yet it happened nonetheless. Marie stooped down as if she heard something she shouldn't have but I assure her that nothing was going to happen. 'Wait here, I need to find out what's going on out there. 'It was indeed true, what I thought it'd happen. Wrong place, but it happened nonetheless and I was too late to witness what fate befell on them. She came crying as well, seeing the mansion, crying for her child who was left there all alone in the arms of the nurse. But how could this be then? Her alive, her alive, she was. 'She was alive. 'I awakened at once, standing on my bed alone. From the pain, I felt on the back of my head and seeing how I was still dressed. The door opened before I put on the rest. 'Had a sweet dream?' 'Morning sir. Sir, there was something, someone who broke in. 'I'm the aware lad, ever since I found you looping in a small pool of blood. Don't worry, he didn't do any damage at all. The doctor said he only scraped you on the way to the neck, nothing more. 'So, nothing was. 'Nothing at all. Here's it, by the way. It'd hide if well if I were you, it's not worth taking any chances with those outlaws hanging around. 'The envelope was thick enough, but what lord Pond said was. 'I'll wait for you once you're well. I'm quite curious on what you've found out so far. Seemingly you were busy. 'As he said it, he knocked on the window. Well, with that said, he wasn't as mad as I expected him to be. Nonetheless, he left now and left me with my money and in a state of confusion. Who could've been the man who tried coming there and got locked inside? That's what I had to find out sooner or later. If he came one he might certainly return and now he had something to take with him in case he succeeded. Out of which was unexpectable. I took the money and looked on the floor, there had to be done, I felt it. A place which was hallowed, certainly, I felt it now. There was something about this hidden spot which made me not want to use it. Just near the bed, It was something sure. I picked the slab and pushed it away. Apparently, this was laying just under the bed, a few centimetres away. One could stand just in front of the bed and feel it quite well. With the envelope, I made sure to put a piece of cloth I've found. The opening wasn't that deep but I was certain that someone could find it as well as I have. No, this was too easy to find, I thought. 'It'd be the first spot they'd look after if they knew what they were doing. 'There wasn't any other chance. I had to carry this with me until I made a trip back home and hid it away. That would certainly take two hours to go and come. But at least, it was certainly safer than any other place. Lord Pond, right, this was about to become certainly more interesting than I expected it to be. After I was done talking to him, a small trip back to my office then a quick return. With that, I arrived at his small shack and looked at the lock. There were no signs of forced entry that I could see. 'Someone was most definitely here Lord Pond. 'I'm aware of it, there wasn't anything that might've fallen over your head from inside. But what do you think happened? Were any of the jewellery or. 'He shut his own mouth immediately. This was something I wasn't aware of as of yet, but apparently, something was hidden inside. 'What was that then?' 'Well, I may have been hiding something here and there but nothing too exaggerated, you know? It makes me a lot more comfortable knowing that there's something in here that needs my protection. 'I understand sir, but the problem is that the thief might've had a key to this house. Have you give the key to anyone else?' From the looks of it, the dinner was ready. Not that I would let myself get too distracted or anything. 'Well?' I haven't given the key to anyone else but you. Does that help and may I ask why are you asking that?' The man had locked himself inside the house before you arrived. "So you had the assailant inside and you decided to let him go just like that?" No, Lord Pond it didn't make sense that he would light a candle and just stand there in front of the window. Either someone was locked or I'm not aware of something. But when I opened the door there wasn't anyone inside. 'This conundrum left the open question of who it was, despite the fact that nothing could've been done for now. 'Could it have been someone from outside then?' You mean someone who might've managed to snick behind me and knock me at unaware? Perhaps but this has passed already and I'm certain that you'd have to hear everything which I discovered certainly more important. 'The man nodded immediately and presented his entire attention. Over the next hour, I started talking about everything I've found during my investigation. That of which the mansion, the upper floor, clean cut and everything so far. And yet someone might've been trying to get him. 'I'm certain lord Pond that in that darkness, once the light was blown off, there couldn't have been a distinction between the two of us.

'After all, we were quite the same height as one another. And this might as well add up to the point, someone, perhaps the same person who did this to him came to finish the job. 'I understand, surely, this seems quite strange. And are you sure that this mansion was entirely pulled from one side?' We could both go and see. "No, no, there's no need for that now, let's just finish it here and well. I'm just glad you're here and accepted this, there's no one else I could've put my faith in right now. 'We shook hands as we departed now, he had known everything which needed to be known. Within minutes after our departure, I glance upon that dark mirror. It was another man, more slim, older, driving the cab. The plantings didn't entirely seem too different, to begin with. Nonetheless. 'To the station, I have a small trip to take. 'After he nodded, I knew I was on the right track, ready to get where I needed to be. At least from the looks of it. Just a few blocks away and my heart was pumping, my sweat ran down through my forehead. Every glance made me realise how sick I was becoming with each moment I stood away from that place. 'Stop the cab, I need to go back there. 'With a sudden stop, we were almost driven to a road accident. It appeared that I had his entire attention now that I changed my mind. There wasn't any other way it could go. 'I need to go back right now. 'He went ahead and turned around. Despite how mad this appeared to seem, no matter how hard I tried to get away I couldn't. Something pulled me back despite the fact that there wasn't any resistance to be had. The way ahead and the return had to be paid for, as I was aware. And there was definitely the issue of having to hear rumours from now on. Since I became aware that these cab drivers were the fastest way the unfounded rumours spread, I didn't bother to resist. Something which I realised was the fact that I couldn't leave any longer. The reason why this happened to me had to resign in there. Whatever would come of it, at least there was an answer to be given. I had to know what made me feel so ill when I tried getting away. Before long, I was on my way once again towards the point where I left off. The ladder was still in its place including every tool in the shed. Now, the only current problem remained where could I possibly hide this stack? Just for the time being, I went inside and grabbed the cloth and placed the money inside. All of it, buried behind the house without any doubt or question asked about what happened to it. There wasn't anyone who knew, but now. Once this problem went away, I'd return to my house and put it in the safe. Something had to go a different way today, I was certain. Again, the ladder was placed, but this time on the other side. I just had to see the living room and the small tower. From the looks of it, I managed to glance at it as it twisted away and stood alone in the back. Despite being the highlight of this building, something had to be affected inside of it. First the window, but I wasn't aware that someone had opened this one. Only the curtain stood as a guardian, which was pushed away at the tip of my mere fingers. Now, as I stood there, I could finally see past the veil and the fumes. There wasn't any reason to explain why I came so unprepared now. Without the proper mask, I resorted to covering my face with a piece of my shirt. Someone stood there waiting at the gate, gazing and trying to see what I was doing. Has lord Pond hired someone to see my work in motion? No, I stand the same way he stood the previous night. Frozen in the veil, I doubted he could see me especially that far away. But it was a figure nonetheless, that was certain. 'Who is it?' I shouted, doubtlessly looking as if I wasn't heard the first time. Of course, the second time wasn't even a question at all. How could this have happened then? For this one moment, I felt bizarrely estranged in my walking path and lost my composure. Perhaps this was the result of the fumes taking full effect over my body. It was too late for me to realise that I've made a mistake. My body fell and barely managed to grasp the edge of the wooden piece, the perfectly cut ribbon of the mansion. Awe soon became dread once I realised that I couldn't control my body any longer and fell. The pain would've come as expected when I felt myself reach that hard substance. 'Help me, somebody help me!' The shout fell on dead ears once I realised it was too late for me to be saved. This pit was swallowing me, raising and pulling me inside. At last, before my strength waned, the fumes were too close and my consciousness was partially gone. Almost awake, my body had no control over it, but my mind was there alive. I felt something inside of me trying to warn me about it but I failed to listen now. Where could this be going? Somehow air was kept inside, this sea or well or whatever it had become. But now that I was fully aware I had come to the realisation that I was swallowed by the pit that fell from the sky. Without a way to return, I waited. It must've been hours long that I was aware of things behind my eye, swimming with me and extension these small frail movements that my body began doing. They whispered but I couldn't hear, I wasn't there. But I became aware. At least now, in this dire moment, that when my mind would give in, I'd never come to be awake ever again. With my fate sealed I used what strength I had to breathe as much as I could. That's when the fall finally gave in. Left as if I was dropped slowly by a piece of resin, I stood there. Pieces of glass pierced my back but only leaving flesh wounds. But when I was aware of the fact that I felt pain and I could move again, I turned on my belly and looked where I stood. Above of me was the floating pool inside the pit, and below was a fashioned floor. Most of everything here had already been broken by the fall, so it made sense in a bizarre way that the pieces of glass would've made it through. But the other side was too much of an extension of reality to make any sense at all. I looked forward and saw the starry sky. It was night, but from the looks of that town which laid so far away and lit with their marvellous bright cold lights, I shivered. The cold was there and from the looks of it, there wasn't a way back for now. It was impossible for this to be that cold unless I laid in the outdoors near the north. But this came to me as a surprise. 'Snow, look at it!' My voice almost cracked at this vision of white and pure. It almost came as a shock since I was stuck here. With the piercing pieces of glass off, there wasn't anything but the desire to explore this. Which meant that there was a good reason why I was here, alive. After all, that dark feeling pulled me in for a good reason, and that was most likely to come and find. . . It wasn't far off that I came to find myself once against a loss. There wasn't any shout but as I looked above after a few steps, from the stony hills I saw the boulder come.

Too late for me to do anything at all, until now. No one heard the scream in this distant area hidden in the woods, nor could they have seen what happened. But a rock fell on the man crushing his head and spine. And there came another one, smaller which covered the lower bottom of it, right a few steps away. Not even the echo which remained for a while there didn't do much to help him at all. The moment his blood froze was when fate finally abandoned him. No one would come to rescue him. There in the distance, his hand got stuck pointing, towards the town. Not so far from where he died laid a road which was more paved towards his destination. Despite being set on a long road, caravans still found their way to it. It was here that his vision went out of sight, caught forever looking there. Her daughter laid on the bed sleeping. It's been a while since she became used to this new place. But now, her mother had to do it just as well. Looking around through the empty barless gate which would've been a window in her time, she saw them walk and act. 'Strangers, that's all. 'Now, if it were that she lived still in her mansion, things would've certainly been a lot more different than she expected. Originally she wanted to explore but this place appeared to be just another world. And the way behind was lost for so long that she always thought that one day she might return. 'You little man carrying a platter of candles. Why would you do that on a night such as this?' This was a common thing, apparently to lead on and pass the light from one another. Quite strangely, they knew of the existence of electric power but refused to use it. This sky didn't even appear to be as real as it seemed. Something about it made it appear too much like it was placed there rather than being natural. 'Sleep well Sophie. We will find a better place for you and me to live inside. 'There was a certainty now that wasn't as lacking as she thought it was going to be. It doesn't matter what they were though, as long as they allowed both me and my daughter to stay. As long as she worked for them, cleaning around and doing chores, they were both safe. Worst of all was having to hear what was going on in the town at night. Once the lights went out, to the point of true darkness, there had come those terrible noises. Gurgling and spitting, and the screams of murder ran. Was it night already? She didn't seem to see any light anymore or anything as a matter of fact which would've helped her see. No one dared look but there were figures dancing in the darkness. 'Shh, go back to sleep Sophie. 'Marie was quite afraid now, looking through the veil.

If it were a man, he was dangerously tall and strong. Perhaps a being that was neither human nor animal and something else. This was the uncertainty of the place. Having to cover her ears and go to sleep. Each night and every day, another dead man found at the bottom of the stairs. Ripped apart and having parts of him clean and devoured. Even the blood might've been sacked and abandoned. This horror which was present appeared to have left everyone frozen in their homes, at least until someone came and cleaned it off and set it to the morgue. A desperate job but paid it well. 'Another one?' Indeed old grannie, they just keep piling up and piling up. At this rate, we won't have any men to defend the town anymore. 'The wooden towers and the hall, the houses, the doors and the stalls. Nothing was strong enough to guard them against it, whatever it was. Those who tried to come against it managed to fall and be thrown. Crushed, to this point, they weren't as lucky to even get a glimpse. And that's how it appeared that this beast wouldn't be caught. 'Shame that this happens, isn't it?' It was just the old man who managed the store. Ever since I became accustomed to everyone and since I needed friends, it wasn't as hard to become friendly to everyone. 'Will it ever stop? This has gone for way too long to be just only one murderer. "Oh, but it's been going quite longer than you've come here to our abode. You see, I'd wager that at this point, he's got under his belt at least a dozen dead and twice more since you came here. 'He wasn't as keen to point the blame on me, but I couldn't complain any longer.

Despite being an outsider, I and my daughter had nowhere to go. 'A mere coincidence, nothing more than that. 'His stinkin' eyebrows appeared to have been levelled off. But how could I be blamed for something I've not done?' It will clear off, I'm sure of it. "Sure it will ma'am, just be careful on the streets, we won't have you get accidentally locked outside into one of the nights. 'This threat was nothing of an accident nor as subtle as he thought it'd be. 'I understand. 'That grim face stood out to her, especially since she thought that someone out there was just the one who did commit these atrocious crimes. Alas, don't worry, so she thought. Won't happen to me, I'm sure of that. Just the same day repeat as it's been for now, back with the groceries, then to work. Those dark glances towards me never seemed to pale in comparison with my conundrum. Past that I felt that I was accepted, past the point where I felt nothing but to wait. 'What is that girl doing?' Jumping continuously from bed to bed, the walls wouldn't sustain much of her, until that knock. That's when she stopped, once the face of her mother suddenly popped in to look at her. 'Isn't it time to go to your classes?' 'It's in an hour. "Well, you're going earlier, now!" She exclaims with sadness and shivering rage. Despite what the child had seen, there wasn't any chance but for her to move on. They couldn't risk being thrown out with a murderer on the streets. And this attention started digging their own graves, at least if it continued at this rate. 'You'd better teach that girl more sense if you want to stay. "Thank you, but I don't believe I asked for your opinion whatsoever. 'Edna nodded at it, that old crone, standing and weaving her basket as if there was something wrong with me. It was pointed right at me, in the form of a cage. Just what was this woman trying to imply with this simple act?' 'Do you need something to be staring at me?' "Nothing at all, it's that, I saw your daughter leave earlier than she should've gone. "And?" "Well, it just happens that my daughter goes to the same place as she goes, nothing more. "But there's no other place than the one this teacher has made and my daughter need to learn something. Where are you exactly going with this?" There was a bitter expression on the old crone's face mostly but she refused to answer immediately. It was almost as if she already implied. Damn this woman, does she want both of us gone already or even worse? Locked outside, with a murderer. It was already pitiful that I was forced to clean the floors and their rooms for a lady of my stature. But this was damnably hellish of them, to mock me and try to end my own life. 'Damn this, damn this!' Said Marie Wick in her corner, alone and far away from any looking eye that would try to glance at her. Fear ran her sweat like a maddening gland which tried to bury itself deeper inside her skin. Despite them being harsh for both of them, Sophie would have to grow it this and live with it for the rest of her life. 'I need to see her safe now, do you understand me? I need to know that she's safe and she won't be thrown outside if something happens to me. 'From the attire, the man was a soldier, standing at the entrance of the building. He most likely came from far away, probably over the news as well. Sooner or later, someone had to come to deal with this unnecessary murder. And this was to be the one. 'What's your daughter's name ma'am?" Her name is Sophie Wick, black hair, kind of tall for her age, eleven years old. I don't know. 'Before she said anything, she made sure she'd look around trying to see if anyone would try to glance or do anything suspicious. There were four in the foyer, and this was considered to be an unnecessary break from her necessities. 'No one here trusts us and some would rather see us off than anything else. That's why I'm afraid, for me and my daughter. "I'll make sure of it, don't worry. That's why we were called here, to begin with, the lady, nothing going to happen to either you or your daughter. 'And he was certainly wrong, some twenty feet behind him there were a few caravans sets and some tents just around the corner. Four, no, five soldiers accompanied him, more would soon come. And this was to be the end that I assumed. Before long, if I was ever going to be done with today's work, I'd finally get to see my daughter.

'And today we will learn about the common plan of Botocornolia and its properties, class.' Said the teacher. This was quite interesting. Despite the fact that no one in the class appeared to have much attention set towards the specimen on the table, no one glanced at what was happening outside. It was a jar of dirt, from which a long plant appeared to have grown to the point of having its bulbs coming out and spreading from each side. Green, no, violet, or something in-between, which for some reason didn't even get to the point of growth. The neck of the plant was heading towards a doubleheader which was pointed towards the bottom. And for some reason this plant was important. 'What's it good for?' Asked Sophie, as a matter of fact, being the only child in there whoever asked questions. If it was considered rude or not, this was certainly a strange behaviour. Accepted nonetheless by him.

'Well, that's a good question, Sophie. It's mostly used in curing the common cold and light wounds.' He went on ahead to demonstrate exactly how it worked. So far little of it made sense, but the rules were set for this world and not theirs. That's what she had to learn. The man leaned on the table and started squeezing one of the sacks at the end of the plants. More precisely, those bulbs she thought to be hard wasn't as they appeared to be, making a sound noise when they were squeezed. Something about it, as the substance started dripping on his fingers made little Sophie shiver at the sight. In truth, she was the youngest child to attend his classes, at a difference of at least two or four years. Compared to her mother, this was just as harsh as being labelled an outsider. Nonetheless, to prove how this work, the man did something rash. He made a small incision around his finger just as he prepared his almost surgical-like knife. Blood started pumping out for as long as they could see him do it. Just as the solution came out of those pores he finally pushed his finger in and asked us to see. It was magnificent, to say the least. In mere moments, that cut around his finger was there no more. Suddenly, everything from which blood came got sealed and healed in an almost illogical way. 'How's this possible?' Many of the children reacted as if they have never seen it work in action. Once again, truthfully said, it wasn't used to treat bruises or other cuts and hits the children were used to be getting, henceforth, none of them has seen it work. At least most in the class were ignorant of the effect it had and how it worked. Sophie felt that finally that she could relate to the others, knowing that neither of them knew why this phenomenon even happened at all. It was at least a mystery to think about it. So far, it hasn't happened for it to go through her head at any moment at all. Just as the weather outside appeared to be getting worse, Sophie feared for what might happen to her mother. Despite being in just as much of a danger to her. Those things, murderers, kidnappings found their way to her regardless of how much her mother tried to cover her ears from the facts. A midsection pause came when the children were suddenly left there to do whatever they desired. It was kind of a break from the activities which ended with only those who were certainly interested in what the teacher had to say while the others were delighted in their childish activities on the playground. Speaking of which, this appeared to have caught her interest in more than one way. This plant and all its effects appeared to have left a strain on her head, at least to the point of wanting to know more. Not so many other children remained to listen since most of them appeared to have left. 'Will it grow more of those?' 'You mean those bulbs? Well, I'll be certain with you now. It just so happens that with enough light and water, enough of it will start growing. There was something though which made him want to try with them. 'Children, do you want to see how it's being used for the harder hit or bigger cuts?' As much as filled with innocence as the children were, this appeared to have been as close to the limits as possible. The light in their eyes appeared to have signalled both fear and apprehension of what he was saying. 'Perhaps later then, when the days are shorter and the nights are longer. There are other experiments I'd like to show your children and you don't have to worry about a thing. The way he was playing with this plant appeared to have been too much for the others. 'Why are you still here? Haven't you heard children? We're not holding long classes anymore, there's something dangerously lurking outside. It'd be better that you'd head inside before something happens. 'As he said it, the dark look in his eyes made him change. Certainly, he knew something and refused to help the others in their hunt. But he was desperately eyeing Sophie the most in this situation. As much as she was repulsed by the thought of a tall dark man doing nasty things outside, she took her time to gather what she had in that small backpack. Most interestingly, she ripped a branch off the small plant once she realised that her teacher wasn't looking, making sure it had plenty of bulbs attached to it. He won't notice a few of them. At least, it wasn't as obvious as a pull and since the desk was fairly lowered, she did it without any trouble at all. But this was another deal entirely. The danger was indeed on its way once it became dark outside. Perhaps, it was because of her, that she didn't notice it earlier. But now she found herself running in the hallway, with other children, filled with gloom.

There were bells ringing, voices going. 'Come around, come around. 'Said a woman, with her bells and her boots, were stricken to the ground. Then it came again with a harsher voice. 'Come around, come around, there isn't time to come around. 'Just as the streets were getting emptied, the darkness pulled over the light with a veil utmostly strong. Sounds came as the voices rang off. Now, it came as a gust of wind, a storm was on its way. Soon there would be the promise of pain and something worse for those who weren't prepared for the storm. And the children all went to their various homes, from door to door just as the parents waited with them half open. Light poured towards the outside. Soon night would come and it would devour. Anyone who laid awake made sure they'd get as much space for others to go. Despite the presence of the soldiers in their tents, people weren't sure what to make of it at all. A murderer was on the run. Children were facing this mighty demise, and a storm was coming. Or at least, it was soon to come. Lost and alone, she found herself abandoned in the confines of the school. Now that there wasn't any other way for her to go on, she realised that this choice backfired. 'School is over now, what are you looking for, little girl?' It was a dark voice, deep and shallow, the likes of which didn't belong either to her teacher nor of any parent who came for his child. 'Teacher?' There laid a blanket of silence, but the door behind slammed. Could it be the wind? She asked herself, mumbling under her whiskers, standing as if ready to be eaten by a creature who his itself. It was in plain sight that he refused to come. The various holes from above made it obvious that in the upper level there was a level of light, someone either was working or forgot to close it down. Whatever it was, this was obviously strange for him to stand alone and talk to her. 'Why aren't you showing yourself?' Sophie's voice almost cracked. Even for a child such as her, as brave as she wanted to appear, nothing could prevent her voice from showing her true colours. At least, now she seemed to be aware of the thing that crept over and around the corners. 'Why haven't you left yet?' The voice appeared to get more shallow as it approached now. 'I couldn't, there's a storm outside and I couldn't find my way back. "Why did you return then?" My teacher was there, he had to know what to do, he knows a lot of things. 'Here it was, over to her reach, she grabbed the candle and held it as if it was her only means to survive. The only problem here was the fact that she didn't have the means to light it. No match of any sort. Henceforth, she asked it as a sign of good faith. 'Could I have a pair of matches?' There was some creaking of the door. This entire place had always had a gleam of strangeness to it, building on rotten planks. A misguided builder might've thought it was a good idea to have a basement that dug under the ground and as far in the depths as possible. This eeriness which almost haunted the place made her feel sick in the stomach. It only added to her conundrum now. 'Kindly ask me for it now, since I have brought it to you, will you be gone?' But I've nowhere to go, as I have said, not to mention that the wind from the storm will blow out my candle. You can't force me to go out there. 'Protested Sophie, knowing that the cold, as well as this loneliness, would reduce the chances of going back home. 'There are other children who refused to leave as well, do you want to know what happened to them?' 'I don't think I want to know. 'A cold, sticky hand, which appeared to be missing fingers, if it had any, long and bony touched hers. It shivered as she felt it come upon her. One may even say that it was undeserving for this to happen to her now. But in that bony-like hand laid something more important than anything else. It was the pair of matches that was given to her in hopes that she would live, having a pair of crooked matches inside. Despite getting what she wanted to, nothing happened. As the hand, repugnant as it came back, it began talking again to her. 'Won't you light the candle now child? May I come into the light?' 'Are you the only who lit the floor above?' That was a peculiar thing she noticed, but there were figures there coming in front of the small holes and covering them from time to time. Someone was definitely there, to be sure. Either the cold extended from outside or it was that thing which grabbed her in the night. 'Those are others who escaped and locked the door behind them. Don't change the subject child, don't you want to exchange glances into the light as one another fair?' This speech of his was beginning to appear to frightful for her to let it continue on its own. Something wasn't right and she knew it too well to let it go as much as she wanted to do it so. 'I think I will leave now. 'Though the round doorknob was cold perhaps too much so for her to go. Yet, no matter how painful it appeared to have been, she didn't give up with it now. Something was too off for her to go on like this. 'I think it's stuck. 'This was a grave mistake to admit. But in her mind, saying this would have resulted in something quite grim. Luckily for her, this pair of words never left her mouth and for a good reason at that. It would've been the worst possible thing, especially when it stood there for far too long. 'Don't keep me waiting for the child, will you turn up the light and if not, where are my matches?' The stairs weren't as far as she thought them to be. This was certainly the only chance for her to go on and save herself. 'Do you want your matches back then?' 'Only if you don't want to go ahead and light your little candle child, I cannot play with you forever. 'Sophie didn't want to feel that cold hand touching hers again, henceforth, as repelled as she was, this was indeed the last chance she'd get. Something was wrong. Now that it came to acting on her impulses, this was going to be especially dangerous. One chance to run through and convince them to open the door, but as the thought occurred, she needed first to know their names. 'Do you know who hides out there?' Sophie tried to leave a smirk in the dark, without realising that this attempt was nothing but feeble since she was playing with forces that weren't known to her. But that one time, the one thing that changed it managed to leave a mark on it as it spoke. 'Is this the game of guessing?' That voice asked, and it was only now that she realised that he wasn't a teacher or an adult. Since her mind blocked any other image or any other possibility, this was strange. A large hand would grab me the moment I'll start running. That was the main idea that went with it, a chase that she'd fall, unable to open the door and be grabbed. Some kids were missing from what little information she had. For them, there wasn't any coming back anymore. Little by little something was approaching. 'Such patience for a little child, it's a pity to keep me waiting for so long.

"Wait, I'm doing this for a reason. "Which is? Don't you know that it's dangerous to keep me waiting for so long?" This was the moment when both of their voices got loud enough to alert those who hid upstairs. Especially since what she needed did happen after all. Just fair above, past the crack from which the small glimpses of light came, there was an eye watching her profoundly. It's been trying to look through the dark and saw only the silhouette. Nonetheless, her voice being heard was the most important thing and now it came for her to act. 'What do I get if I win this game of guessing?' Inquired Sophie, noticing that it backed away. This attempt managed to get both her attention and that of the creature that seemed to hauntingly creep around the corners. 'Let us begin with your life. That's what you get to keep for now. But what will you give me if I defeat you in the game?' Her hands were already in the process of sweating. But it was good enough as it reminded her of the small box of matches she still held, protecting it as if it was important. It was indeed going to be as important as it appeared to be, as she claimed it for her own. 'I will return that was given to me, the tinderbox which was given to me in order to go outside through the storm. "You still haven't returned it and now you claim it for your own?" That voice appeared to make the skies tremble upon the dismissal of this small game of theirs. Now, there wasn't any chance for them to play along anymore since the result of it would do nothing but anger it more. 'Here!' Finally, Sophie had done what she intended to do. Throwing the matches, they went through the light, enough that he'd see them and change them as she ran through the stairs. An eerie howl came, reaching a leaving as if it was cutting the strings and melting teeth under his breath. On the stairs she fell but came back to her senses, going around the corner, trying to climb up as fast as possible. Sophie didn't need to utter a word at all since the door opened on its own and alas, the saviours pulled her inside before locking the door. That darkness which reigned above as it close came back. Behind the closed gate, it lingered, waiting for someone to let him in. No one would even dare to look through the peeping hole. 'Stay quiet and don't make noise, please. 'Said a girl who pulled her behind. There were four more boys, making them the only six children of who she knew to have escaped. 'What is that thing?' Sophie now spoke in whispers since asked to quiet down. From the looks of it, they weren't doing as good as she was, placing baskets upside down, trying to hide under the desk and using melting candles which didn't seem to work for that long. The candle had become a ticking bomb, which remained the only thing that kept them safe. 'Just shut up and wait, just wait for the daylight to come or for our parents. 'Said one of the most daring boys in the back. He was tired from the looks of it, bearing a few bags under his eyes. This was certainly going to be something new from the looks of it, to the point where she refused to acknowledge the fact that she was just as afraid as they were. Certainly, someone would notice that they were missing. 'Why can't they come back now? I want to go home. "We all want to go back home, just. . . Just grow up already, this thing will eat us if we go outside, don't you get it? We need to wait for an adult to save us, or we won't go home at all, why is it so hard for you to understand that?' It almost startled everyone but more importantly, this managed to get to the ear that listened behind its bars. Behind the doors, it spoke at once. 'I can hear you hiding in there and that light won't run forever. "We have plenty of candles to go with it? Why are you so eager to get inside?' Asked Sophie, as if she had made herself the leader of the group. This was to be a delicate situation that needed proper handling, something which she couldn't have really given if she truly wanted to get out safe. But from what she knew, there wasn't anyone else in the room who had a better encounter than her. After all, the fact of the manner remains that she was only one who encountered it and still was alive to go on and tell her story. 'I know. 'It suddenly came to the conclusion that something which was proposed hadn't come to be realised as it had hoped. 'What about our game of guessing now? I can hear your hearts beating for the game is on. 'As their voices grew silent for a moment, Sophie thought she was the only one who could speak. They remained silent for the time being, though as much as it appeared to have been a trick of some kind, there was nothing but fear involved. What was important remained as the fact that Sophie had made this mistake. 'Now, the moment you get one wrong, his heart will stop beating child and when the moment when the last hearts stop beating, I will come inside. 'It said, with a petrifying voice. Now, this appeared to be less of a man and a voice made out of outstretched strings which carried something of a speech pattern. Sophie didn't know what this was, other than a sick joke played on them to pass the time. This would end up as being nothing further than the truth. 'Fine, but if you get three of them wrong, you lose. 'That evened it out, at least, since the chances of having been tied were low, and the night was still going on. Her tiredness made her feel, that once that light went out, she wouldn't feel anything and fall to the will of the dampness which crept around her. 'I accept it now, let us begin. 'She had realised that there were only five children in the room, which made the chances go quite sour. 'My guess is that one of the children if name Michael. 'There was a set of glances over the room, the children who had laid in sight were evenly sitting in silence. 'It's a wrong guess, there's no Michael in here. 'A set of croaking and slithering sounds came from the back, going as far away from the lungs of that thing. For what was worth, it couldn't have known if there was foul play inside. 'Let me in, or else I cannot know whenever you're cheating or not. 'From the tops of the door, everyone suddenly went ahead and retreated once they saw that a small pool of blackened position came from the very each end of it. It tried encompassing it since it realised how fruitless the game was. 'Why must I argue with children then?' 'You said you'd played the game, haven't you?' 'This was indeed a promise that should've been kept, regardless of beast or man. 'No, I will not entertain you any longer. Do you really think that the light keeps you alive? I was merely stalling for the proper tools now. 'The knob started being drowned as well, as in one moment it was somewhat clean and in the other, all of the sudden, it had come out. This is when she first had a good glimpse of that eye. Oh that dark eye, that was the reason why everyone stood as silent. It had no power over them, but as well as they thought so far, speaking would let it drag their soul. Somehow, that eye looking through the peeping hole appeared to be the most disturbing thing she had ever seen in her life. 'The light is fading and the moment when that happens, I'll have broken in. 'Attempts to open the adjacent door were on the way. Apparently, this room was connected with the laboratory on the side. Despite having said no word in his presence and seeing this thing just being pushed, they signalled from one another. And soon, that reached Sophie who stood there and watched them act. A few pair of sings and finally, since she didn't understand, frustration overcame fear at once. 'Block the door now!' Each of them grabbed a pair of chairs and benches and threw it at once. Now, if there were others stuck outside, there wasn't any hope for them. 'You little mongrel. 'That came as a surprise, but the lad had gotten a pencil stricken directly into the eye. 'Bullseye!' He yelled once he realised that he had pierced deep enough to leave a scar. Which followed were a set of screams and shouting, to the point of dread whence it was coming from. The night was still going and at once they managed to creepingly push the door open once four of them stood there. 'Let's join them until he comes in. "What about the candle?" Asked Sophie, having realised that they would stand there blind. At which the lad nodded his head, breaking his brown hair strands and making sure she came with them as well. If four of them were needed only to push it slightly in front, through the darkness, it'd be impossible to open it now. One by one, they went through, followed by Sophie. And just as well, one last time, that shout came as a surprise now. What remained now was the fear of being caught, for, once the light went out, that thing charged through the door and burst at once. In contrast to that, they pushed the door closed and blocked it just again. Luckily for them, this door was closed, with the only problem being that there remained only one way out. With utmost silence, some pointed towards the indoor windows which lead to a small jump, back to the point where she had run from, or at least a few steps away from a running distance.

That she was the only one who objected being there during the closing hour, it didn't matter. The only thing she could've thought of was just how mad would her mother become once she realised that she wasn't home. 'I'm scared, do you think it will leave us alone now?' Shhhh. 'Came at once. This perilous thing almost alerted the one who appeared to be searching. But what was worse, something happened in the dark, just as they started counting one by one, they have reached the conclusion that one of the other boys was missing. It was at the edge of a second when they were trying to cross through the dark. 'Where is Geoff?' One asked in a whisper, at which the others looked to no result. There wasn't any scream to alert them or anything else which would've signalled what happened to the boy. A mystery which would be unresolved, if it weren't for the fact that their pursuer was so silent at the same moment as this disappearance occurred. 'Do you think he got him?' 'I don't know. "It cannot be a coincidence that he came off at the same time with him, couldn't it?' But this was short-lived, as they hadn't realised, there was a light at the bottom floor. Seeing it through the windows made them shiver, once they realised that there could be another one there, if not even Geoff now, trying to find a way out. 'Wait, don't get so close to the window. 'Said the other girl while being as cautious as she could. Between them laid a few meters which stood between one another, making it quite clear that she wouldn't be able to stop anyone if they tried. 'But it doesn't fear light, I'm sure of it. It made me want to light a match for him and bring him a candle. "Are you sure of it Sophie? What if you're wrong about that?' 'I'm not wrong about that, we must go, I've got a bad feeling about this. 'Sophie said while seeing how the darkness in the room had been lessened to a great shadow which pushed itself beyond. Whatever happened below, the light made it too evident for them that there wasn't anything they could do. Despite the fact that we were only five now, one of the boys went on to check near the window. We were already clobbered by now together almost woven still. 'See, I just need to see if there's someone who needs help. 'A small candle laid in the middle of the floor. The funny thing was the fact that its owner had vanished from sight. The boy turned to tell them that it was all good. 'See?' Before he could mutter anything, the sound of crackling glass pierced his ears. A giant hand outstretched from behind, encompassing as much of his head and the pieces of the window which laid behind him. Small fingers, limp and covered in something which almost resembled moss. At least that's what they saw bending around his head. Both fell, muffled by the children's constant screaming, at the point of not having realised what was happening to them. The fire was shimmeringly hot for it and there wasn't anything to break its fall since the pain was too far progressing through the body. A candle smote a dark spot and the child managed to crawl a few feet, bleeding from his head as his fate was left unknown. 'Open the door, now, before it gets to us. 'With a bit of effort, the four remaining children started dragging the door open, managing to barely take it to this point in time. Everyone heard the partially muffled cries of the child but couldn't do anything but run once the small crawling space was open. This is where they split now. One of the stiffer, fatter boys couldn't go through since it hadn't been as stretched at it was before. And atop that, they were already on the other side. 'Don't leave me here alone, he'll get me, please, just push a little longer. "Just hide, he won't get you if you stay silent. He'll think you've run with us and you'll be safe. 'But this dance of whispers hardly was something to be called this way. Certainly, Sophie expected him to act like being told. 'No. 'The yell came, altering of the presence. 'Help me get out now, push it a little further. 'The eeriness found its way creeping through the various holes in the floor. Despite not being any light out there for them to be alerted to the approaching presence, it was obvious now. 'Shhh, shut up for a moment. Do you hear that?'The voice of their friend had finally perished. 'He's dead, and I'm going to be dead if you don't open it now!'Desperately, he attempted to push and pull, making it worse, at the point of forcing them to have no other choice. 'It's for the good of all us, stand and hide, don't make any noise. 'And it was already the point of them having vanished into the veils. Half-asleep, walking through the damp corridors. 'Damp?Why is the door so wet?'Sophie asked, trying to barely make the figures which lay in front of them. The three of them barely laid close to one another, holding hands as they attempted to make it through alive. Meanwhile, the sounds of the one they abandoned suddenly came to a stop. It was distressful to think about it, but at least there was hope. 'I hope his fine. I'm Jack by the way. "Margerie here. 'And with that small thing done, they just had happened to hear her voice before the point, or at least before their hiding spot was ruined by her. Most classes were held close. 'We just need to hide before the night ends and we might be safe from the likes of it. "I think we can make it. 'Said Jack, trying his best to remain courageous in this disturbingly wicked conundrum they were in. At least, one could say that he wasn't alone, despite the work not having been done. Walking through the twilight of the building, soon going to the places they weren't supposed to go through. Every child now knew that they had to get away as fast as possible and just as far. And just as well they knew that not everyone was going to make it anymore. There wasn't any adult, nor anyone who could've known. The storm had already gotten to inconceivable levels of strength, going as far as ripping trees of the ground. Not only did the wind take out small rocks off the ground and threw them away, but small critters just as well. And farther than the town there laid the pool still waiting. It stands there hot against the shimmering wind undisturbed. That made this place so familiar, as much as she looked around, she could see and feel just the same way it felt like going down. Soon their hands slipped, just like when she held her mother and tried to find her in that pool. 'Margerie, Jack?'She asked for anyone's assistance but her mouth was almost muffled. From the looks of it, all of them were not lost without any clue about one another. Sophie tripped into the darkness until she found a small opened cupboard. It was just enough space for her to hide in an attempt to spend the night, guiding her hands and going in as fast she thought she could. With a closing bit, she looked and comfortably placed herself in around position that would certainly leave her standing slightly numb to the noises of the outside. Only a small vertical hole laid just at her eye level, which wouldn't be seen through this perfect darkness. Sleep, just sleep, it will all be fine in the morning. That's what the girl thought in that dark hour when no scream came and the fate of the others wasn't known to her. Whoever, or whatever it was, now it had no place in her dreams as she descended as far below as she could possibly go. Her hands were cold, her body still, now she slept well. But the patience which made it follow was too thin. It broke through tables and somehow made it to where it needed to be. All up until the morning when the light came and the soldiers in their uniforms burst through the houses and the storage rooms, the tower and the school. What they found in the morning was enough to make one's stomach turn at the mere sight and the thought that it used to be the small child of one of your acquaintances. 'Men, stand, block the perimeter. Don't let anyone come to this spot under no circumstance. 'What he saw on the other side was a mere set of trails or pools of blood without anybody to bring any confirmation. Nonetheless, it worked well enough, to the point of which none of them was able to find out what had happened to the children in the notion. They've looked inside and seen only the blood, dripping from above, then below. Soon, before anyone said anything at all, a voice sprang through the market. 'My children are gone, they're gone!' The voice was almost drowned in the sorrow if they weren't already filled with dread at the sound or sight. Now that everyone who went outside to the closing hour was safe, no one was safe inside, neither their children nor them. 'Let me in, I need to find my son, he was inside when I left him. "I'm sorry ma'am, but until we're done, no one enters and no one leaves. 'There were two of the soldiers who blocked the main entrance to the town. The gate was finally closed now, but armed and dangerous as they were, no one would dare go through, even if they wanted to take any chances with them. 'You will have to wait. We will inform you if anything is found. 'That soulless voice was enough to send a shiver directly through her heart. Whatever they were doing, they had to be faster than most would've expected them to be. After all, when everyone came to the realisation that there was another crime, no one would stop the entire townsfolk from trampling over them, regardless of them being armed or not. This was either with them or against them from the looks of it. And there wasn't anything to satiate this bloodthirst in the parent's eye. It was quite clear that a small crowd had already been made, though no one dared to do anything other than asking from one another. Young captain Robert Gillgan was the one set in charge with leading this investigation. He appeared young and lightheaded but not accompanied by two other men who appeared to have had their share of field experience. But this right there was something new and unexpected. Never before has it happened for a murderer to go for the children in this manner. 'Coward, murderer, If I get my hands on that little. "Relax now, we didn't come here to throw empty threat at it, so let's calm down and see what we can find. 'It was, truthfully pointless in a certain way. Since there wasn't much left around for them to find out what had happened, other than the blood, no one could tell anything else about the scene. 'Damn candle. Who even leaves these things hanging on the floor?' It had taken the turn now. No one knew what was the reason behind that, setting it around a child's mistake or the wind pushing the candle down one of the various drawers standing near the wall. 'Let's spread and try to look for anything really. "Do you think he might still be lingering around here?" There was a confused glance met by another one of those glances. In truth, not one of them knew what to expect from this. We're about to find out anyway, whenever it's convenient for us or not. The way they were thinking it'd go wasn't the same as it turned out to be. No more than a few droplets leading to places they would've hidden away, just to find them open with no one inside. Whoever it had gone inside, it was clean when it came to everything else but the blood. But one little thing escapes it, for our luck appeared to have turned around. It was nothing but a child, he said. 'Come here, on the second floor, we've got one living. . . 'Before the others arrived, it appeared that her breath had stopped. 'Somewhere last night. 'Said the coroner once he was called. Now as the townsfolk were ready to burst through they realised that soon there'd be no stopping for them. At least now they were sure that they could pronounce the only child that remained alive, deceased. Something peculiar was pointed out by him. 'See that thing there, someone had stuffed the only hole and locked her inside. That'd be the main cause of death. It appears that someone didn't want us to see or talk with the girl, in the case she might've survived what happened in here. 'Somewhere in the night, it happened right under the nose. Soon they came back outside, only to deliver false hope and push them further away from the crime scene. It appeared that the only child that attempted to escape had a body which needed to be recognised. 'We need to identify this body, it's standard procedure. 'In the man's hand laid a small notebook with numbers and names. Wouldn't take a genius to recognise what it was used for, especially after exiting the school and having said what was said. 'To save ourselves some time, I will have those who have daughters come into the pile on my left. One parent only per family, nothing more, keep that in mind. 'They listened and all of the sudden so did Marie. She came from somewhere in the back, slightly repulsed by the scene and what had happened. After waiting her turn and being forced to stay as one by one they came and glanced over the body of her child, this felt traumatising. Shock and pain paled in comparison to what she felt. Fear for her own life and the fact that not only would she not return but also that her only child had died there. 'It's all my fault, I sent her here earlier. 'The man had shed more tears than she did in an entire lifetime. It had already been a miracle that she had survived the fall from the pit, but now she wanted to have nothing to do with anyone anymore. 'I'm sorry ma'am but it's nothing we can do. Beyond our knowledge, it came without leaving a mark or a trace or something that would've made us realise who it is. "You mean that the one who killed my daughter is still alive?"The man nodded and covered her with his jacket, escorting her back or as far away from the others as possible. Despite having people in the crowd who might've at once attempted to intimidate her and Sophie, there wasn't any soul that would dare frown or throw an insult at a dead child. No one was cold as that but left alone with the dead child while they were investigating was more than damaging to her mental health. 'Let me in. 'A voice said from the other side. It appeared that she was left in the same foyer from which she had once asked for help. But now it was emptier. 'I have to bury you. 'With a shed of tears, she looked again upon her child and seeing her cold features and realising that she'll never get to be as old as she burst again into tears. It was going to be a long winter in the coming. And the killer was still there somewhere. Just before the sun would go down and at the point of them being escorted back to their houses, she took the horse that was originally found when she first arrived there and went on her journey. 'Do you need an escort ma'am?It may be one of the coldest night around the year. "I'm fine, I need to bury my child if you don't mind. 'The pair of men nodded and for a first time, they went over themselves to open the door and make way. From behind, the many windows weren't barred and as they watched they realised that they might never see her again. Having a storm pass, it was quite evident that another one, much colder than the previous one would soon arise. It wasn't safe for either of those that would've chosen to follow. 'You could bury you, child, somewhere close, it's not. "Shh, I understand, but thanks.

It needs to be done and it needs to be done there, in that special place. 'This didn't leave much room for interpretation, but whatever place she had chosen to bury her child, it was going to be as far as a horse is needed for the journey. The men nodded and let her go on her way, going as far as none of them expecting for her return. Harsh winds were on the way and the place was already getting white with snow. So many trees which might've been dark now had their old hair going on as far as it went. 'We're going home Sophie. 'She said, going back to the place out of where she came out of. It would've been quite the thing to be found now, as her heart was once torn out, but then again, there was no explaining for this. Someone had to take the blame. That could wait for now, as she had seen it come from behind. It was too far behind for her to notice who it was, despite that, the figure appeared to be familiar to her. 'Who goes there now?'She asked, but didn't receive an answer. It appeared that it suddenly fell in a canine position and started chasing her like a grinning wolf. 'Run, now. 'She heard from the woods. Without even taking the time to respond, she immediately slapped the horse around the ears and started dashing through the woods. The various branches were almost trying to pierce and let her off, though, at the first indication, she ducked. 'Who are you? Why are you helping me?' Nothing much, other than the sound that came from the woods. It was getting close to helping her now. 'Take the first left, you should've lost him there. 'Him? So it's a man that's chasing me now? But who might this young lad that's helping me now and why?' I'm not sure if I can trust you now, I can't even see your face. "You must see me my lady, but trust me when I tell you that you don't truly have a choice now. Unless you'd rather face that beast alone and die where many have tried and failed. 'The notion of it made her shiver to the bone.

Only a glance was needed to turn her thoughts upside down. I need to return, Marie thought as being her prime directive. Soon, she did as she was told, the first left, looking behind to see that she was still being the chase. Her horse jumped over the lodge and immediately she had realised that just further in there laid a bear trap, easily avoidable by a horse jump. But could that be said the same about a man jump? At the point where she would've run, she stopped and watched it go before her eyes. Suddenly, it snapped bone and crushed the foot. It was a man dressed in a dark robe, now wholly white. A mouth laid shut as if guarding a secret. He couldn't scream not breathe air to melt the snow laying around his mouth. It means that he has nothing else to do but wait. Just beyond the trees, the image of her helper became apparent now. It might've been one of the children who managed to survive. 'You escaped, haven't you?' The child nodded, almost frozen by the likes of it. A few hours must've passed since the incident, and in this case, she might've expected him to have died from hypothermia or such. 'Come here, I'll take you back. It's all right, you can trust me now. 'There was a corpse bent just behind her and from that feeling, there was a deep warmth to the deepest confines of the body. Of course, the boy wouldn't get to either feel or see, but this thought alone drove her to the edge. Just a small delay and we will return Sophie. There was obviously a problem going on now. He came as fast as Marie let down her hood. For starters, he helped her for the mere fact that she was a woman in trouble, given no reason whatsoever to be trusted. But now that changed since it was all of the sudden that she was recognised by him as being one of the deniers around. 'Let me come closer. 'Avoiding the man who was still cowering in fright and pain, she got closer to the child and helped him on the front of the horse. From the looks of it, as much as she had seen from their family doctor, this was quite obviously bad. 'Your hands might be suffering from a frostbite. Get yourself warm as fast as possible. 'Wrapped in her own cloak, he was covered from bottom to the top. Luckily for him, she even brought an extra little hat which he'd wear. The only bad side of it was the fact that she reached behind and pulled it off Sophie's head. Marie hoped that the boy wouldn't notice the dead child standing behind her. That would certainly lead to some strange consequences if he were to take the wrong conclusions and misunderstand. He didn't. A sight of relief came on her face, but by the looks of it, there'd be no going out once she returned. That snow would push through and leave nothing in its way. 'We need to get there before it gets too late. 'The boy nodded now, having realised that they both abandoned that man behind. There wasn't anything that would've made them note or tell about the man to anyone else whatsoever. 'What happened out there?' 'I found this boy. 'Marie was already on the edge of the town, waiting for something to be given to her. Nothing personal or truly impactful, but an agreement for her to stay another night. At that point, she was more than welcome now, quite celebrated once they realised that it was the boy of one of the bigger houses in this small town.

Perhaps she'd even be left to go through the inner level and see past the dusty foyer. Both were pulled immediately inside the great hall which raised its tall gate for them. It was a long trip but both of the received hot blankets and even tea of the highest grade for what she's done. Without realising it, her horse was place shut in the stable where Sophie's corpse had fallen and knocked itself against the hay. Truly a marvel now spared her of a long conversation she would've had about abandoning the corpse of the child if it weren't for this celebration. The boy's name was William Winehouse. 'The next one on the line to lead my house, my lady. 'From the looks of it, she was quite home already, standing in front of what it'd be the equivalent of their day to day lord and ladies. Happiness soon came and gave her the shelter she thought to have deserved. As for others who'd ask about where she came out of, there wasn't any need to answer their questions, rather than give a wink and leave it as mysterious as it remained. 'Oh, blast me, I've never had so much fun before. 'But one of the other ladies had already come onto hear. 'Don't you worry, this night had just begun. 'A good wine and plenty of men to look about, now that she was alone. With the proper given clothes, she had become quite the looker, perhaps even to the point of having returned the charm she had for many years. Dances, gazing at hanging fruits, this was the place for her to be. The arched windows left their mark, as hot as they had become, you could see the snowstorm that was going outside. Something truly appeared to call to her, as much as she wanted to enjoy the rest of the night. 'May I go?' 'You can go wherever you want as my guest. As a matter of fact, would you do me a favour and visit my son? I've asked the maidens to dress him and call him here once they're done. "I will do as it pleases you. 'That was the lord of this house, a handsome chap with light brown curls, quite the boyish appearance If I may say. But something other than that pulled me towards it. Though the first steps appeared peculiar, I looked behind. 'This seems familiar, too much so. 'Her heart didn't stop beating as she started remembering. Stuck between the first floor and the second, she could see the boy standing there at the top of the stairs. Dressed in a suit tailored for him, he waited there, almost appearing to be bored. His hands were better. 'It's you. 'He said as he recognised Marie, immediately sprinting at his saviour, now that he had a reason to go on ahead. But this celebration of theirs wasn't without problems of the way she thought. As the child came and showed a sign of affection, he looked past the crowd and saw his father talk to a younger woman who wasn't his mother. 'More wine for everyone. 'At least he went on ahead. And as everyone cheered, that crackling sound from the sky came. Peculiarly, this sound appeared to be hauntingly pushing forward as it advanced. The ground roared as a tremor came and soon she realised what it was. 'Something's coming. You all need to get out. 'Before she could say anything and realising that there wasn't anything for her to do now, as the robe she had received restrained her from running, she embraced the boy. Outside, the people who were standing there suddenly lit one hundred lights in their homes and managed to see that dark thing fall and take within it, everything in its path. Fear crept through the confines of the town. The rest of the night went on without a murder. Something darker was about to be discovered nonetheless. When the soldiers arrived and saw this be, they realised that this delivery was something beyond them entirely. 'Come on men, seal the area. There's something wrong with those smokes that come out. 'Their world was being forced into a retreat, as the peasants came to see. Apparently, there were already whispers that a murderer was traded for this to happen and now they've had their wish granted. 'See, I've told you it'd happen this way. 'The prophet, the drunk, the man in a robe with a wooden crown came again, with his so-called prophecy. He'd been silent for as far as Sophie came, as she appeared to have been an educated stranger. As much as their beliefs and limited knowing went. 'I've told you but no one believed that this would happen. The gods of the pit came and took yet another set of sacrifices. What say you now that it turns out that they're real, ey?' Those who had looked upon him as a fool and in disbelief now reckoned that they needed change their faith in what he preached. Standing on a wooden box, they gathered around and looked at what he did and said. 'We need to appease it no longer for the time being but unless you want to lose someone you love as you lost your children, you'd better be ready to sacrifice. 'A woman apparently had begun the pandemonium there. With a shout which was loud enough to wake up the dead, she had apparently found Sophie, laying cold and abandoned. It was clearly wrong from the looks of it, but nonetheless. 'Bring the child here and witness what it did. That pool fiend, killer, murderer and tyrant who hunted your children. It demands that what it's theirs be returned. 'The people looked at him as if he knew and was aware of what he was doing. A soldier soon came and intervened at once. 'You will not do anything rash and unnecessary, understood?' This was obviously a blow and an insult at the same time. He hadn't expected to be talked down, especially by one who pretended to be protecting their interests. 'Blasphemy, you are an outsider, I spit on you. When you first came here. 'As the old man said that, with his right hand he held the corpse of the child, having enough strength to do it with only a hand, while his left hand pointed at the man. 'It's obvious that you made an unspoken promise to protect us. And look at what happened! Children died, people died and who's left but you to tell us what to do?' This was rather close to being an insult to injury. 'We will not stand and wait here while our tribute gets denied! Make way for us you pagans unless you want to taste our wrath. 'Taken by surprise by this act, the man clad in his armour backed away immediately and went towards the others. Soon, they became infuriated with the fact that no one would heed their demands. Without realising, the foyer had its gate shut inside no longer. Perhaps, now that there wasn't anything to be guarded anymore since this inner city of theirs laid in ruin without the main building, they could be let inside to explore. That's at least how the thought went. After all, this had become, without their realisation, an empty town without lords and ladies. Most of them had been gathering in the same place for years, a mistake that wasn't forgivable. First, they arrived now, they felt fear. The first sight of that dark pool always grabbed everyone's attention, at least for the sake of it. A bubble popped in the distance, fumes spread through the sky. Soon the snow would come in just to melt once they reached the warm fumes it created. 'Wait, who goes there?' Asked, what seemed to be their captain. There were eight soldiers standing in-between the scene of destruction and these peasants. 'Don't stop us now, dear captain, we've come under straight directions from the gods of the pits. They demanded this sacrifice to be brought and thrown inside of it. Unless you wish to have a small duel between us and have more people unnecessarily killed, I suggest you step aside and let us go on with it. 'The man bit his lip as he heard just how sharp this old man really appeared to be. Despite his haggard appearance, there was something of a sharpness in that glint in his eye. Something was off. 'Step aside men, we don't need more casualties today. Let them go on with their ritual. 'But sir. 'The man, fairly older than the captain opposed this only momentarily. Whatever happened to him, now this wasn't the time to go on against them. Not only that it wasn't worth it, but they were also strangers, outsiders as well, people who came to defend them but failed to do so. He backed away now and let the old man proceed so. The child, Sophie, which was recognised as being who she has reminded him of that failed promise which bore through his skull. It was a pity, but the woman had returned as laid in there. Both mother and child now remained buried in the same pit. Without any sign that it worked, everyone appeared to be looking quite confused and repulsed by the situation. 'It's time to rest now before it asks for another sacrifice. Now begone, for this night will be one without murder. 'This promise appeared to have as much to back it as the people who came and promised to defend them. Empty to the point of wratch, deep inside the pool, Sophie was stuck. Without a force to drive her to swim forth, there was nothing anymore, nothing that would keep her going. Far deeper now, past the cries of soldiers and mothers who weep, there laid a stone so high across the sky, that it reigned as a mountain. A single tall mountain stood above the clouds and rightly above of it laid a pool so dark, that it dragged the very clouds that were reigned over. Harsh but without any other alternative to it, a woman and a child fell, the only survivors from the likes of it. Both of them took their time as to recover from the broken limbs of which they suffered from this fall from grace. Looking through and seeing how this pit now laid there just waiting reminded her of what happened the previous times. 'We need to go before it falls again. "I cannot climb, I've never done it before. 'This was certainly going to be a problem now. Both the woman and the boy remained still for the longest duration they've thought off. Not to sleep or anything, but rather, wait for the moment where it would've been the most useful to die without pain or any regret whatsoever. No one would come to rescue them now. 'We need to go further. 'Said Thomas, looking at if he was ready to defeat his fate. 'I cannot any longer, look at my knees. 'Both of them appeared to have been turned in the wrong direction. Perhaps Marie might've cushioned the fall for the boy, but she suffers multiple concussions and plenty of broken bones. 'I'm a goner now and I won't even get to see my daughter again. How could I have been such a fool to abandon my only daughter?'There came another surprise now, as the tears in her eyes were drained over her. From the farthest point above, there fell Sophie, past the clouds and the point of reach. 'My daughter. 'Thomas came to the realisation that she needed to be caught and brought back, looking past the mist and seeing a small figure. 'Don't worry, I'll get her back, she mustn't be that far. 'The woman nodded her head after doing whatever she could do now, or rather, doing the only thing she was left with. Making peace with herself for the last time. Now that there wasn't any saving and the boy jumped from rock to rock through the mist. Marie never saw the boy again and as soon as he disappeared from sight. The shame and guilt drove her to the point where she stopped living. Since there was no driver for her to keep on living, she stopped desiring it. And now, forced to face the consequence of her actions, Marie Wick stopped her own heart from beating and died. Tom hadn't realised that he was now chasing the little corpse of a small child. Without anyone to return it to, he followed the whisper through the mist, jumping from peak to peak, until he realised that he was close to the top of the world. 'You won't reach that thing if you keep it that way. 'For a moment there, Tom looked around and thought that the crow which stared at him just spoke moments ago. 'Who's there?Who said that?'After a pair of glances he returned. Seeing that the small body got carried below, he just had to go on unless he wanted to lose the corpse now and remain unable to find him again. 'You'd better hurry. 'Said the crow, a beautiful thing at that. The only downside do it was the fact that at the bottom, she bore something in her chest. An opening of the sort from which the guts stood there hanging. 'What happened to you?'The same thing that will happen to you unless you hurry. 'Said the crow and it flew away into the mist. Tom had a conscious of his own now, thinking about the woman who saved him from the grasp of that piercing cold. Now and again, he'd look behind and realise that the body was so close and perhaps there wasn't anything to be done about the woman. At least in her last moments, she'd have the child in her arms, he hoped. Continuing to jump and jump until he reached land. A walking pair of steps that ran down, but not even a slight clue where Sophie might've been. 'If I didn't know any better I might think she was alive and walked on her own. "You may not be as wrong as you think you are. 'Said the crow, just as he arrived at the conclusion. Sitting next to him filled the boy with dread, since the creature was dead, after all, the mere thought of it crept him. 'What happened to you?' 'Isn't it obvious? I was caught and ripped apart for meat. "But who'd eat crow meat in a place like this?' He faced a dangerous question, as well as being rude to ask someone why other would eat them, especially since it appeared that he didn't die here. 'I lived in a small home of sticks and stone, with many jewels made of gold. Small stones and pearls I've taken. "And they finally caught you and killed you as a punishment, right?' This was something the crow pondered about. It was almost as if the crow was sitting deep in thought. At least Tom decided to show some courtesy by waiting. 'Well, it was rather a lucky shot by a boy and his father, they were hunting, you see. Nothing vindictive, rather the bad spot at the wrong time. 'And the crow had disappeared into the mist immediately. As much as he wanted to see this little flying creature as his guardian angel, the mere appearance of it brought little short of disgust. Out of the mist came the voice nonetheless. 'Don't you have someone to find?' Sophie. 'He even remembered her name, a peculiar thing from the likes of him, but he and her mother had some time to chat as they waited on that peak atop the mountain. Crawling things carried her, bulked and strong. Insects which were huge, double headed and from the looks of it quite infected. From one end, something poured and darkened the land, with many feet spreading it from side to side. It appeared that they bored tunnels that went past the body and guided them to where they were supposed to go. But as much as they made their effort to go on, and their thick carapace prevented them from getting crushed from the weight, Tom still managed to catch up with them. 'Look, where are they taking her?' 'Oh, you'd rather return to the place you've come from if you understand what I'm trying to say. From that place now, there's no returning if you want to escape alive. 'This was certainly something strange and peculiar to think about, yet he did it anyway. As much as he wanted to think and imagine a world of theirs in the sky, they were close and acted like insects. 'They've got a nest somewhere in the ground, am I correct?' 'No, they're taking her to something worse. She may just have been chosen as a bride to the king of the pit. "That pit again. 'As the words left his mouth, suddenly something got stuck in his throat. He spat a little black spot of blackness which came on the ground and suddenly remained there as a permanent spot on the stone. It was strange to look at but it kept the need going. 'What are you going to do now then?' 'I'll keep my promise and bring her back. 'From the rumbling in his stomach, that was about to wait for some time. 'Is it after your dinner or before?' The mockery that was about to come from his little new found companion came as a surprise. But nonetheless, inviting, surely he said. 'You may go as well and take as much meat from here unless you want to starve. Come on and take only but a bite. 'There was something extremely peculiar which he felt now, especially since not even a drop of blood came out of that stomach. 'I'll find some berries or something to keep myself fed. "But barriers in the mountain? That's the most peculiar thing I've ever laid my eyes upon if I may be, boy. "Call me Thomas. "Thomas, Tom, Tom-Tom. 'Repeated the crow, almost turning it into a song of the rustic sort. Strangely, the boy didn't oppose this light-hearted thing coming out of the small animal. It was fairly peculiar as it was. 'Wait, but how could she be the bride if she's no longer alive?' 'That never stopped any of us Tom-Tom, you haven't realised where we are yet, have you?' 'I just need to bring her back, and I'll find a way back home after that. "If you say so. 'Nonetheless, despite this lack of faith in the boy, the crow decided to follow him as far as he would go. Rather than saying anything about his journey or desire to return this girl, he warned him of the journey ahead. It will be harsh, as you seem quite.

Rather, alive for someone here, be careful as you go down there. The king won't take pity on someone who'll attempt to kidnap his bride, especially so close to the date of the wedding. Old as this dimension, said the crow, king of the falling pit. 'Is he responsible for what happened there then?' 'Where?' 'To my home, raven. 'It appeared to have stung the small companion rather thirstful than anything else. Wasn't that often after all that someone would call him an ugly, untrustworthy raven as he said. 'Crows are deemed to be faithful and fair, where those cutthroats would've found a way to rat you out to the king. "What's that?" 'Don't you dare cut me off after what I've said. 'Before anything, there was the entrance to his kingdom, as far below as it went. A black veil of smoke arises from the bottom of the vale. Machines, metal roads and plenty of things that caused pollution spread the tightly fit into smithereens. 'This may be the very reason he's doing what he's doing. Look at the ground there Tom-Tom. 'Where the mountain had patches of dirt stood pools of black tar combined with oil and other unknown mixtures. As useful as they were both contaminated, neither of them were usable anymore, but that didn't stop them from spreading that hard to take scent. 'What's this?' 'You'll have to seek passage to his kingdom here. "Lying cheat!' Went on the boy as he grabbed the small flying beast. 'You said that this was his kingdom. 'It was an odd crow, rather small for its age and speech. In a way, they were both alike in this certainly strange world. 'Let me go. "Fine, but don't try cheating me unless you want to suffer the same thing all over again, understood?' There was a simple nod of agreement, followed by what appeared to be faithfulness once more. It wasn't what he expected, but he had to take this road. A city full of working people, fishermen, working at docks in the sky, plenty of women just laying and washing their clothes in those sick black pools. Only a glance was enough for Tom to shy away from one of their glances. It wasn't that often that they saw little children coming around. Rather, perhaps it was their size, as they appeared to be three times his size, coming close to being giants, if it weren't for the fact that he was rather small himself. The crow his inside his jacket and tried to whisper in his ear. 'Don't make any deals with them, understood? They're rather a dangerous folk now, see those hooks?' On his rear, further away, he was what could only be described as a pair of hooks which had been launched and happened the very clouds that kept it floating there. 'You're saying we're not on the ground now?' 'Shhh. 'Before he could be silenced, a group of giants just barely turned to notice him, only for a moment before returning to their work. As much as he was something new, there was still something to be done about this. "What are they doing?" Tom said in a whisper. 'Well, they're anchored now, trying to get as many of the clouds inside and wash them in the pools. "Why would they do that? They're so beautiful and clean. "Careful where you're standing little child, you're blocking the way. "I'm sorry. 'Almost being flattened wasn't what Tom had in mind for now. As much as he appeared to have known what he was doing, this was rather new to him. He went on the side, almost sticking on the front of a giant metal door. From the looks of it, might've appeared like there wasn't any way it would open anymore, or have been opened in the last century. 'So what now? We can't just wait here with an empty stomach and nothing to do. "Then go and search food for both of us, won't you?" There might've been a dinner here or somewhere, after all, even giants had to eat. Especially them, being born with a giant appetite. Well, the boy didn't wait long for them to cross the streets with their boxes full of devices and various things. They appeared to be delighted by inventions and little machines that would walk. Once and again, he'd stop thinking about his hunger just to return to a counter and see one small robot do a little dance. The crow was just as delight once it observed the fact that the small robot's eyes gleamed with the shine of gems. As a matter of fact, some were even polished to the point of. 'Stop, stop, stop, I can't take it anymore. If I keep seeing them longer, I won't be able to control myself. 'Tom felt rather sorry that because of him, this memory of addiction came back to his small fiendish companion. It wasn't that often after all that he had someone with him to be concerned about. Rather, this was something new for both of them again. 'Don't worry, I think it's in there. 'Tom was fairly anxious to see what the giants were eating, and from the looks of it, someone was just fairly tired enough to forget the door open. 'Careful here, we've got nothing to pay for the food. 'I'll think of something, don't you worry. 'Despite barely having touched the giant iron door, there came the ring of a bell nonetheless. It's true that not everyone turned immediately but most of them threw the occasional glance at the boy with his stuffed chest. Tom was amazed to look at them, seeing how this was the closest thing to a civilised folk if he was ever to see anything of the sort. Standing at the tables, they were drinking from tall coffee mugs as well as eating well-cooked giant fishes. 'They got wings, there, but how could that possibly be?' 'Oh there are plenty of flying creatures here, I'm surprised you've not seen the flying fishes on your way. Come to think of it, you're lucky that you didn't drown as you came to the point where the two of us met. "How could I have drowned in the sky? That's ridiculous. 'There wasn't any argument there, after all, there wasn't anything even close to water, other than those pools, of which he was sure that they hadn't any. 'Well, here you can, standing too much inside a cloud and you'll drown just as fast as being thrown into a river or the sea. Why do you think they're harvesting it for the king?' 'May I help you?' A tall woman stood at the counter, staring at the boy that was way too small to be one of hers. Rather small, to say the least, it came to the point of Tom looking like a toy than a real tall boy. 'I'm sorry, I'm just looking around. 'Despite his stomach growling, there wasn't anything he could've done. 'Are you lost?' That understatement wasn't rightly placed for the time being, as Tom didn't want to go on and reveal everything to the first giantess he met. Regardless of what he thought as being the right thing to do, he looked around and saw that plenty of the others who were eating their meals weren't interested in eavesdropping on his conversation. Being close to a leg tall, he was fairly small indeed. 'I thought I could come and ask if there might be something I could do to earn a meal. Not to be a disturbance but I'm afraid I couldn't even pay for something if I wanted to with my small pockets. 'A fair thing to say, but it was not found as pleasing as he wanted it. 'Well, I'm sure we can find something for you to do around here. You're not that small after all and I'm sure that giving you something of a meal won't be as troublesome as doing it for the others. "Thank you, miss. "Not yet, first, come here. 'The bar stool was clearly made for someone who didn't have his height, but nonetheless, he managed to climb on it just fine. Other than the fact that he stood on it with both of his feet, which was fairly considered rude for a person such as him, she didn't bat an eye at it. Not to be looking too strange to him, after all, there were giants that were born smaller than the normal. To be even more clear, even in this small place, there were at least some giants that were smaller but bulkier. And, as for being even more clear than that, other than Tom's impression about their height, there wasn't any other should that called them giants for a matter of fact. Just the extraordinary specimens of their race. But enough of having dwelled into that, Tom-Tom looked and listened as she whispered in his ears. 'Not so long ago, I've lost my necklace somewhere inside the kitchen, perhaps in a fairly large window of time, if I'd be honest. Nevertheless, there's no way I have the time to go around and find it with some many people having to be fed if you get what I'm saying. "Won't there be rats or something worse waiting for me at while I'm searching?" 'Don't be so ridiculous boy!'But despite this act, she bit her lips in dismissal, hiding something which was quite above the expectations of what he was about to find out there. 'Just take this. 'It was a toothpick, the type you'd use to clean the remains between the teeth, with the exception that it was big enough for him to use as a small dagger of the sword.

'Take two of them, if anything happens, you should be able to defend yourself. "What do you mean if anything happens?"Just, please, find me my necklace, it's a family thing I cannot be forced apart from, won't you do that for some food at least?"Well, I. 'Before Tom-Tom said anything, the crow went on to accept. Despite having the voiced be as far apart from one another, the woman pulled him over the counter, strapped the small nod at her back and thanked the boy. 'Just shout when you need to be lifted back and don't worry about being crushed under, you're fairly big enough to avoid that. 'This was certainly not something as reassuring as he wanted it to appear, but he found himself going through the back door into the kitchen. Fairly big on its own, he thought. 'So what about it partner?"I wasn't asking for your help, but say, there sure is a lot of iron going around here, isn't it?"I told you they're craftsmen, haven't I?'Despite not having remembered whenever the crow did indeed help him or now, he had to carry on. Tom didn't know what to expect down there, having to use a weapon to defend himself. Whatever laid down there, rodent or not, certainly there couldn't be of such sizes that would do him any trouble if he really set his mind of dealing with it. 'Do you have any idea what may be waiting for us down here?'Even in his warm jacked he nodded and make a sign. Not the smarted animal he could've received. His help was more than welcomed, as much as he desired to ignore and be afraid. Something big made some noise. 'It might be many things, perhaps the boiling water?"The stove was one, iron for iron, black like the floor, from this angle it appeared like they were using the same forge that they made weapons out of for their silly meals. 'Don't joke about their forges and stoves. You never know what ears may fall upon your words and take offence around these parts. 'Said the crow with its crooked smile. It was hard to tell from that angle, but he did it nonetheless. 'Perhaps you're right. But why is that they're making so many things out of iron and don't use much of anything else?"That's simple little Tom-Tom. It's because, iron grew naturally here, right outside the stone. Veins that push themselves past by the pressure underneath the earth. Well, if we may even go down a few generations, we may even find out that the founders of this craft of metal forging were the ones who created all the clouds. "Whoa. 'The excitement made him truly look different past the building and into the sky. 'Did they really create the clouds?"Well, more or less, rather said, without them, they wouldn't have been freed from the bottom of the earth. But alas, nothing lasts forever as their freedom is being taken back, but why am I distracting your attention now?You're busy aren't you?"The boy nodded and without a notice, almost got snatched. A small iron toy-like being just jumped and jumped then sprang like a bullet, almost taking both of them in its path.

'What was that?"Run, Tom!"Yelled the crow, or rather threw a tantrum of words and squeaks and other bird-like noises that sent shivers down his spine. Cold shivers that felt like the memory of his frostbite, despite being as hot around as it felt like. 'What's that?"The construct that haunts this place, we need to find the necklace fast until it finds out what we're looking for. 'Before he could turn and take a glance at what they were exactly looking for, they appeared to be at a loss for words. It disappeared into thin air, without leaving any trace of destruction or anything else of the kind. 'Where did it go then?"The crow merely nodded again, showing no sign of interest, other than the glittering thing that was missing from that woman's neck. 'Check under the cupboards and further away from the forge. 'The crow took a moment and spoke again. 'That power it had is nothing to joke about if he catches us again and this time unaware there won't be anyone to look and save that girl from her vile destiny. 'Tom noticed as well, barely now, that the far edges of the small spear he was given got a few inches of its front just melted from an end to another. How big were their teeth now? How quaint that he would wonder at that in this moment of grave danger he was in. 'There might be something there. 'Far and below, under one of the raised cupboards laid a stench of dust and as well as of sweat. No one bothered to look below for what went missing despite being the starting points. 'I won't be able to fit inside. You need to go and check for me, it's just enough for you to fit through. 'The crow nodded, quite reluctant and who could blame him now, especially under these circumstances that didn't bode too well. His chances were still and their enemy hadn't attacked yet. 'Fine, but you owe me one if it's the necklace. "Don't worry, I'll announce you if I see him coming, understood?" It was a fair deal since he was a little dark crow. Past a point in the darkness and he just vanished. The ordeal with Tom-Tom as a guard didn't take too much of his busy time at all. It took its time before deciding to attack anyone. Can it be that it knows what we're searching? He looked nervous standing there alone, pretending to be a guard with his small toothpick as a spear. In a way, not knowing who he was, or exactly what, there was something of an intimidating stance, at least from far away. Which sooner than later, rather vanished than anything else. Tom-Tom turned as if he saw a ghost, covered in dust, having almost white feathers and being as close to being alive as he had never been seen. 'It's not it. 'With that and a mere shake, he jumped back in its pocket. 'What was it down there?" A few forks and marbles which were rearranged by someone to look like a necklace. The dust that came on them made them appear like it was the thing we were looking for. "You don't think. 'The crow nodded at the suggestion, rather welcoming it than anything else. 'The marks are there, something has indeed grabbed those very objects and pushed them together in that formation we saw. It thinks just as well as the two of us are. 'But as those wheels turned into the distance and both Tom and the crow noticed, it stopped short out of the darkness. The waitress, or rather, dinner matron came in and threw a bunch of orders into the furnace, disregarding the boy who was still at his job. More importantly was the fact that past her legs, in that small crawling space it laid preparing its next move. 'Psst. 'Tom got his attention rather quickly. It was obvious that they were both looking in the same direction, trying to get a better look at that thing. A strange metallic creature which resembled a rodent of some kind. The mere fact that it had a pair of wheels under it was enough to distinguish it from anything else. He couldn't ask for her help now. After all, from the looks of it, she was rather busy with the orders. But the moment the door bounced and she went back outside, a blanket of twilight came. That's when it came, though prepared for the strike, Tom leapt on the side and only by chance scraped the shell with his little spear. A small spark came from the contact as well as a cheerful attempt of a war cry from the crow. 'Very good job indeed. 'Those eyes were glittering in the dark corners, just waiting for an attack. Obviously, it was scornful of the fact that someone managed to go on ahead and burst its bubble. 'It's not over yet, chase it Tom-Tom! Chase it before it prepared for another one!' The best advice it had ever given to him, at the right moment as well. He came as close to the edge before it managed to turn and saw a small gap at the back. It was the type of gap that would render one useless, floating in the air if it was attached to the keychain. 'It's a toy, I knew it. "What are you staring for Tom-Tom? Go on ahead and trap it before it turns!' But his attempt fell short, for the crow was too loud. This slow turn had suddenly changed into a charge for as far away as he could've gone in order to escape him. 'No, he got away!" Damn you, child!" With a thumper, the far end of the wall got hit fairly hard, if it made a sound which was harsh enough to leave an echo that would soon loom around. 'That thing hurt itself now, back away before it recovers itself. 'With that and seeing how the waitress just came again lit up the furnace which had to be taken care off from time to time, Tom came to the other side of the room. 'How are things going so far?'She asked, seeing how he was filled with dust and having run from corner to corner. For a moment, it appeared that the boy was fairly taller than he originally appeared to be. Quite strange to say the least, but that went as unnoticed as the second she wants back to her work. 'Well, it's going well, but I'm still searching for it. 'From the looks of it, he had sweat running down his body as well, making it seem like he had been part of a grand chase of some kind. 'You'd better hurry if you're hungry unless you're planning on staying here with us. "What's that supposed to mean?"Since we're going to be fairly accustomed.

Well, the thing is that we're set to leave in a few hours, no longer being anchored to the mountaintop, do you understand that?"Which meant that one way or another, they had to go in the same direction with those creatures that took the girl. 'I understand, I was planning on going in the same way as you were. 'A simple nod did it, though she still remained fairly surprised that a boy like him would rather choose to take on the journey with them. 'Here, hope you don't mind the heat, there are a lot of orders going on, lots of work, you see?'Despite that, he welcomed the light, as well as the fact that he was concerned with his position inside the room. One way or another, the moment that room slammed shut, it would come outside. 'There, boy, look in that corner. 'Just as she left and the door closed once again, it came as a rabid beast who had just finished licking its wounds before coming once more. A broken thing, it had appeared as being, from the liked of which now laid parts of him that were clearly cracked. 'It went on with its full speed rather than to give you a chance to trap him. "But why is this happening to me now?I haven't done anything to it. "Well, you did intrude on his territory. 'A thing which the crow was fairly more familiar with than any other human was. Having been a beast of metal rather than of flesh and bone didn't change the fact that it still wanted and desired to protect what was its own. 'We're the intruders here, remember?It won't stop hunting us until we leave. "No, you're the wrong crow, he doesn't want that at all, why else would it have made a fake necklace other than to pull us in?There's something wrong going down with it, I'm certain of it!'Now it came to it again, but far from a different side. This time, he barely deflected that rodent thing as it strode past him from a different corner. 'What?'Before anything else clever could've come from any of their mouths, they saw him bounce away from the spear than drift back into the veil. The light wasn't enough to make everything at the light as it appeared to be. 'That thing is only but a decoy. "Tricked again Tom-Tom, we cannot stand here like sitting ducks, go ahead and chase it!'It felt like he was forced to act like a hunter who was facing an intelligent prey. Without a doubt, this was certainly a worthy foe. 'What are we going to do now then?One more time, it needs just one well-aimed charge and we're done for. "No. 'Despite being filled to the gut with the smell of food and as hungry as he was, there he stood, knowing that there was something he could to against that toy. After all, he was well enough on his feet and embarked on this journey all alone. 'Let's get him before it tries to get us!'With that, they both charged at whatever spot in the darkest corner they could walk about. There was fairly enough noise, almost making it seem like those wheels were muffled now, though still, they were both daring that there wasn't a single scar on him. 'That's the spot from where the sound of wheels came out of, he's preparing yet again. "Be careful Tom-Tom-Tom, he may be doing one of his weird tricks again, don't be deceived. 'It was under one of the stoves, which were fairly lifted off the ground. What laid under it shocked Tom once he adjusted to see what was making all the noise in that small cramped space. 'He tore one of the devices. 'The crow yelled, seeing how it had become something so strange and how Tom was exhausted from this entire commotion. A small box with a single wheel still tried moving despite lacking the rest of the device. It appeared like the fuss was coming from down there. 'That's not the thing making all the noise. 'Set on flying, he lifted himself to a higher point, trying his best to warn Tom before it was too late. 'Look out. 'Before he had the chance to turn around and look at the assailant, it had already been too late. The boy took the entire blow, having been thrown away rather than crushed. Tom stumbled as that thing turned and went around, barely able to control himself. Rather, this was certainly stranger than expected. The boy had bruises all over his body now, covered in dust but no heavy wound. 'Ahh. 'From the looks of it, as far as he noted, the boy was ready to fall into a small hole and cry for the rest of the duration of his staying here. 'I only wanted that necklace, why are you attacking me you petty metal box?' This certainly hit far deeper than he expected it to hit. Despite his unawareness, there was pride in that device, which made it drive and look around. Suddenly, just as the crow flew back into his coat, that thing came to the light. It appeared like the furnace was still going on as they spoke. This time though, both of them were going as slow as possible, in case one or the other was ready to retaliate at need. But as a sign of fate now, Tom threw his spear on the ground. 'I never meant to do you any harm. ' Said the boy, all teary-eyed, looking as if he was going to burst at any moment. 'I just came about to find that necklace, nothing more. 'A cloud of steam came from one of the cracks, making it seem like it understood, or rather tried to understand what they were saying. 'Tom assumed that the device was intelligent enough if it truly made a decoy and it wasn't a coincidence. Rather than speaking with it as if it was some kind of toy, not it gave it the proper thing of respect. All the while, as the crow thought of the next way they could lure it in and trap it before it was too late. 'Do you think it'll buy it?' 'Don't ruin this now. 'Came a whisper to another. 'Oh, this one?' Tom saw the little device make a slight motion, which he turned towards the one who hid inside. It was hard to see, as every move and step he made, that machine turned towards the same motion. 'Well, he's a friend. 'In a slightly lower tone, he asked him for a simple name, something which he himself forgot to ask for a while now. 'My name is Lord Ian C. Raw, don't bother trying to do the correct spelling. But it's a pleasure to have acquainted you. 'There was something of a bow which was made into the air. Obviously, another cloud of steam made it seem like it understood something unless it was malfunctioning. Either way, one of them would've been pleased. 'Ian, huh? It's not that bad of a name I'd say. 'At least not as bad as Tom-Tom. 'But enough with the pleasantries, as it appeared that obviously, something was extremely wrong. Either it was going away to do something that would help both of them, or it was getting ready for yet another charge. The latter was extremely bad, especially after an exchange of such introductions with plenty of bows from both sides. 'Do you think it found us rude then? You don't suppose it'll try again once he's out of sight, do you?' 'Just have some faith now, we won't get anywhere if we keep going on this path. 'They waited there, fairly hungry as a matter of fact, well at least one of them. Tom found himself surprisingly concerned about his little flying friend, though that was short lived. After all, he couldn't even eat at all, let alone stomach the food. 'So, what do you suppose will happen next?' That was rather fair of him to ask. Ian quickly pulled his head out of the coat and looked around. 'It's all in the hands or the wheels of that thing now, since you've decided to trust it. Whatever happens now to both of us, it's up in your hands. 'A rather extreme stance but in a way, he was certainly right. More than anything else happening, it came to an end rather quaint. It was quite the bother from its side, but there wasn't any trick involved from the likes of it, quite so. There was some sadness once both Tom and Ian realised that perhaps, as much as this seemed to be a battle, it appeared that this was the last lap it'd ever get to do from now on. If the damage wasn't enough, it also missed a wheel and a part of its dignity. 'Doesn't it look kind of sad, as much as it tried to harm both of us. "It's quite big too. 'There was something which made it appear like it was the size of a house cat, or at least something as big as it. The view which dragged everyone and everything's sizes came after all from the eyes of a boy who was bent on completing his mission and the promise he had bestowed upon the woman who saved him. Not to mention that he had been growing even as he had received the necklace in his hand. So, at the moment where the door opened, the waitress wasn't met by a little-malnourished boy, but by what could be as big as one of her own. 'What happened here?' 'Missing something?' Tom said while flashing her necklace in the dust. She was rather surprised to see it, but even more so to look upon the almost flattened form of the mouse. It was at least strange, to look upon the pest that had haunted this place ever since it was opened in the first place. 'What about that? I don't think it'll chase anything anymore from the looks of it. "Wait. 'Before she could grab him or do anything else, just as it froze in fear from the mere sight of her stature, Tom stopped her. 'You wouldn't mind if we, I mean I could get rid of it after we eat, right? I believe I've earned myself a meal after all. 'The woman smiled, at least from both the service and the daring tone coming out from someone who could be her son. Speaking of which. 'Well, my name is Dennise, happy to be acquainted. 'As she made her bow, Tom made sure to make a sign for the contrast to come by his side as she was distracted. It was followed after by the customary bow and the presentation. 'My name is Tom-Tom. I mean my name is Tom. 'This was a first name basis introduction and nothing more. It appeared though that some of Ian had rubbed over him, as well as the other way around. The little fellow had grown inside of him right before his very eyes. Quite the phenomenon, to admit to oneself. The size and the sudden growth was not only unexplainable, but the mere notion of taking a seat and being able to stand and eat without a problem was quite bizarre. 'Well, this smells good. 'It was indeed, as their culinary customs didn't appear like they were any different than theirs. Boiled potatoes, eggs, bacon strips, a stew and clean water, this was a sign that she was more than grateful. Just as that thing was standing at his feet, a bulk that appeared to have regained much of its own size while waiting. 'Is it me or did it seem bigger in the darkness?' 'It was bigger, I'm sure of it, if I didn't know better, I would've said it was big enough to match a carriage.

'In the dark. 'Ian said, placing the attention on it. And rightly so, past the shadow under his seat, it already appeared to be as big as it came as when they first met. Though now there'd be no trouble in carrying it by hand. 'Oh yeah, here's the spear. The pick back, I don't need it any longer. "Oh, you can keep that if you want to. 'She called, without having to turn at all. 'In honesty, I only gave it to you in case you found my necklace and couldn't reach it. After all, it's a long pick. 'Indeed it was, as she said it, a long and sharp, perhaps with a crushed end, but it was big enough.

'Ian, don't you want to eat either?' The crow nodded, the mere sight and size he found himself confined were just enough to frighten the fellow. 'Just finish eating. 'He said, with a tremor underneath. Despite what others might think, this was just as worse for him as the day he had died. 'All right, I'll be fast, then we can be on our way.

'Something laid in the food as well, perhaps their strength laid in their diet as well as in anything else he had consumed while here. 'It's the air, it must be. 'Said Ian, glancing through a small round button. 'That's what made us bigger, and that's what made them bigger. We must be in the air Tom-Tom, when you're done, look on the outside and see for yourself. 'For that certainty wasn't as clear. Perhaps it was the meal or the waitress who winked at the boy now, but as he returned, with both the construct and Ian, he found himself dizzy. Something made him stumble on his feet while he was walking. At least he couldn't complain at the mere fact that the clean air made him feel well. Soon those that laid around him weren't any different than the people that came to celebrate in his father's mansion. 'I can't stop this strange feeling, could this be what they feel like?' Without a doubt, there was something that pulled him in and out, getting his lungs filled with this tasteless gust of wind which didn't feel too warm nor too cold. Looking at the others and how tall they were, this must've been the reason! 'We've gone so far, haven't we?' 'How could his kingdom be so vast and spread. 'Asked the boy as he saw the mere sight of endless clouds, pure blue sky and everything floating in the air. A few boxes laid wrapped in a rope to prevent being pulled into the air by the wind. A form established long ago as a countermeasure for the loss of their valuable apparel. 'Tom-Tom, catch it now. 'He saw a little box with wheels. It was a shame to look at for its eyes had lost their glowing light. But for a moment, it almost fell into the air, making it seem like it wasn't as heavy as it appeared to be. Tom caught the construct and held it under his arm. 'That was close. "We should stay in-doors before this clears up, or at least until they anchor to another place. "Isn't going to the palace the next spot?' But this question was heard by another who was resting on the side. It was a man, tall, strong with a red beard, large enough that it acted like a cushion for his hands while resting. 'That's the last stop lad, there are a few in-between there and here. I wouldn't doubt it if it took several days for us to return back there and that's only if the wind is right. "Several days, isn't there a faster way to get there? It'd be too late by then. 'Tom-Tom looked as if he was caught in distress by the mere words and the thought of having broken his promise. He was aware that there wasn't any return without her. 'Well if you're that much in a hurry, don't spill it on me, go talk with the conductor, he may be able to tell a different story. I doubt it in any case, but it's worth a try if you're that much in a hurry. 'This appeared, at least, to be sure about it, a peculiar thing to think about. Certainly, something was going to be wrong. And it wasn't about how he acted or what where he was sent towards. Their words appeared to bear a harder meaning in his head now. 'This air's affecting us in a bad way, Ian, I'm sure of it. "Are you all right, right, right?' Said the man, but before he could stumble on his feet, the boy just went on ahead and tried finding the mouth which leads to the insides of the platform. Certainly, this was new for both of them. 'Take there, Tom, we need to find it before the air passes out. 'Tom felt a lot heavier than he should've been. Not even Ian was an exception to this. People were hiding themselves or trying to stay away while they were flying, yet none bothered to concern themselves with the child. Either they were too shocked to see someone so young come or rather, it was the fact that he was the only one who clearly got affected by the air and didn't find a spot to stand and relax. With a few more steps. 'There, Tom-Tom. 'The crow pointed with its beak, a pair of stairs leading down. There was at least warmth, so much of it that it made it feel like home, right after falling into a cold ocean. It wasn't as cold as standing in a winter storm, but at least he wasn't internally suffering anymore as he had been for the last pair of minutes. 'You can put it down now, the stairs should be large enough for him to walk alone. 'Tom hadn't noticed but those wheels attempted to walk on him while he was distracted. A peculiar thing, at least that was fair as of saying it, but nonetheless, he was shocked by the mere fact of how much deeper it went. 'If I didn't know any better, I would've thought this is a tower rather than a platform like they said. "Aye, just look. 'At the exact moment, they reached the ground, the metal corridor had tightly sealed windows which you could've used to look through. 'Are those balloons?' He asked Ian, who appeared to have knowledge of the sort. After all, a crow had many secrets and noticed many things, and this one wasn't an exception, but rather one of the most proper examples out there to be had. 'That and a few engines are keeping the platform going, otherwise, they couldn't hold all those buildings lifted. 'But, how does this even work?' Sitting down to catch some air, and seeing how there wasn't anyone there, Tom finally got a chance to stand still. For a moment, despite Ian having described much of the lore behind the idea of having floating machine and the other kind, he looked at that construct. Now that he was sitting it appeared to be large, enough that it wasn't only cat-like in size but also a fat one which was fed. 'Do you think we should name it?' 'A zeppelin, you see?' 'That seems like a good name to give him, don't you think?' There was some steam behind it, which still came, some repairs were in order, but the matter of the fact remained that he didn't need to change its name now. It was all fair for a reason. 'Zeppelin, that's what your name's going to be! Will there be any objection to that?' The steam coming out was hotter now, apparently, so did the lights and the life came back into the small machine. 'I think it's pleased with the time being. 'As a matter of fact, it was obviously enjoying it, even to the point of going on in circles while pushing out much more clouds of steam. Perhaps it got too excited as a matter of fact. 'Stop making so much noise Zeppelin, someone might hear you and check us out. 'Are we even supposed to be here?' Ian didn't want to check it out, rather than stand in his newly found nest, being Tom's coat. He responded to the question in a rather normal stance, still focused on what he was doing. Still, he looked at the clocked which laid on the top of his head and realised that he couldn't see anything of the sort. 'Yes, we need to get this thing to go on faster, remember?' 'Indeed I do, so what are we waiting then?' With that, the two of them walked, while Ian still got as cosy as he desired to be. Strangely, he found Ian to be warm and comforting inside his coat. Despite his shrewd appearance and ragginess he might as well just go ahead and call this his new home. He wasn't shocked either by the altitude at which they were, despite having a good deal of a view below, there wasn't anything of a land of any sort, just clouds in the air. An endless gust of wind pushing them, while the chains floated above of the platform, dragging a pair of clouds with them. 'How are they doing that?' The dragging of the clouds I mean, shouldn't the iron just go through those nimbuses?' Certainly, this appeared as being a bizarre thing to him. Ian knew better, having sparingly glancing around. 'That's no iron child, but a special form if imbued alloy made by their kind. The same thing goes out for all their floors, buildings, ships, platforms and even their floating cities they created. Would've been better for you to not know but look below. 'It was a strange request now. The boy couldn't raise the windows due to their sheer size and heaviness. Ian must've noticed that. As much as he looked through, it wouldn't be as clear as being when he was standing at the top level. 'I can't see anything other than the clouds. 'Announced Tom-Tom. 'Very well, but do you know the reason behind it?' Just as the two of them spoke, Zeppelin decided to go on it's towards the door at the end of the corridor. It was still fairly eerie but this explanation wasn't to take long, for as much as Ian knew what he was talking about, something was missing. 'Strange you might think but listen to me now. The ground below had, well. 'This story happened a long time ago, perhaps further in time than he expected that his crow-like memory even went to. Certainly understandable for something like it, but as much as he remembered being a baby crow, growing and being an adult, it happened something during that time. 'I was merely a child compared to the human lifespan, as you may say if you were in my place. When I witness the terror that came from the earth. 'Whatever happened to the land, it wasn't anyone's fault, but the earth just had enough of their pollution and torture. 'Blistering bits of fire, black water that had no taste. It was a time when the planet itself wanted to see its inhabitants dead before its eyes. 'And the point of great destruction, while land was swallowed by water, crushed and burnt by fire, one man came to save his people from this damnation. 'The king!' He said, and Ian nodded his head. 'Just as the land was becoming uninhabitable, he came out of nowhere with an anvil and a hammer. He made hooks of metal, platforms with giant metal legs which kept everyone safe from the destruction. 'Soon, as it came to hunger, he had some of them fashioned into hands. 'They grabbed the very dirt and offered them a chance to grow their own good. After that, when the fire was getting too intense or the water rusted the feet, he grappled onto iron from the very veins of the Earth and made wings that flew higher in the sky. "He saved all of them, but why, if he's such a strong ruler and just. . . Why did he choose to kidnap Sophie?" "I never said he was just or fair, or of any kind. He chose to save his people and reigned over them as a king, to the point of witnessing countless generations die. He's immortal Tom-Tom, arrogant undying. Already a prodigy of creation which made him close to reaching the havens. 'The king built cities, kingdoms and ruled the earth for countless generations. While at the top of the world, where everyone became fat from the air, he came too great to ever be stopped. 'But why her?" "Silence child, his reason isn't as important now. What you need to know is that the foe you're about to face isn't going to be as forgiving as anyone you've met before. "But I'm not a child anymore, I knew what I was going for even before I've made that promise. 'Though there were facts laid away from this story, the details being shrewd and seen through the eyes of a crow made it seem familiarly cruel. Now he gets his sweet revenge on the earth he so much sought to conquer, taking anything he needs from the primal elements of the place. 'Where's Zeppelin?" He asked while looking around, trying to see where the little pest had gone. "There he is Tom-Tom, stop him before he bashes the door open!" In truth, it was getting close to being night, and from the looks of it, he seemed to grow into the darkness, far larger than he had been. From a cat to at least two common household ones and perhaps even a dog attached to the top. 'If he keeps growing that way, there won't be any room for him to stay. "Talk to it Tom-Tom, it seems to be listening to you rather than anyone else. You're the one who chose to take him with us. "I know, I know. 'This slight annoyance was nothing with the sound it made while it bashed the door, not to mention that from the looks of it, it had repaired itself. 'Look, Ian, there aren't any cracks. 'The crow's head came out blinking at the construct. Both of them were surprised to see it well. 'You're the right boy, but how could this happen?" Despite his initial shock, Tom wasn't planning on any of this to go this way. From this point on, it was all improvised. Certainly, something was going on inside of it, that power it bore. 'It may get dangerous if it's able to self-repair and grow, just look at the door and what it managed to do in the short time it stood there. 'Zeppelin had left quite the mark on the door from his constant rustling, though Tom was glad that the man hadn't noticed. Just a few more swings and there'd be a hole he could use to enter. Tom looked again and saw not even a scratch on him. 'Zeppelin, this needs to stop, you're making too much noise. "Someone's coming, quick Tom, call him in the darkness, stay in that corner at once!" Ian stumbled with the words but the boy listened as if the warning came out of an adult's mouth, going into the corner. Zeppelin followed Tom instead, getting as close to him as he lay concealed. 'Who's there? Who made all the noise?" In an instant came a bearded man, white hair, scoring teeth, wood clothes, looking quite repulsed and mad. 'What's it to you tricksters? Can't you see I'm trying to work here?" The man didn't even bother to bring out a light of some sort. The only thing he now desired was to lay back down into whatever he was doing inside. But he forgot to fully close the door. 'Zeppelin, did you plan this all along?" Tom said in a whisper. He wasn't sure if he was going to be heard or not, certainly not then and there but this wasn't to be the last time the two of them would meet. 'That old man sure seemed mad about the noise. Perhaps we shouldn't speak to him yet. 'Despite Ian's advice, Zeppelin was already going on his own, opening the door by himself, coming into the light as small as he once was. 'He did it again. "Don't shout. 'Said Ian, immediately shutting the boy. Not everything went as they wanted, this was certainly true, but this recklessness was only going to get both of them in trouble. 'Let's go before it leaves a bad impression. "It's already too late for that. 'Ian was certain that once the man would see the mark left on his beautiful door, he was going to be mad. Especially since, on the other side, it was only leather covering the metal. Was he planning on putting leather in the front as well?Thought Ian as he looked around. It was entertaining to look at everything he owned, especially at the carpets, his paintings and the various small statues that laid around. Compared to the rest of the rustic and the folk-like sight above, this man appeared to have some resemblance to class. 'Hey, look Tom-Tom, close the door for a while now. "Won't it be too heavy?"Just try it. 'The door was light, as a mere touch just closed it to the completion. 'Is this the driver's cabin?'Despite being an obvious answer, he looked around and saw just how well he had decorated his place, going as far as appearing to resemble some sort of palace of some king or royalty, to say the least. Obviously, this man wasn't as rich as this very room claimed him to be, was he?'Close to the dark, Tom and Ian hid, seeing how Zeppelin stood right under a table, beginning the process of growing once again, all by himself. From a glance, the door had a key in it, though that might be an explanation for his lonesome rage. 'I think he's all alone here. "But aren't we intruding yet?"The mere sight of clouds in their sky sea, past the winnowed domed that went around caught his entire attention once he noticed. 'I think he'll be fine. 'Said Ian as well as he grasped at the sight. An endless sea through which he pushed and tried to reach the place of dreams and it looked even better in the night. 'Don't be caught in it, we need him to go faster, remember?'Zeppelin was faced towards both of them, making only a slight move, back and forth to get their attention. Once that came to him, he started going towards the man in his seat. 'No, Zeppelin, wait. 'Both tried warning him and whispering in order to avoid being heard but that failed to get anything from it. Blunt to no end, the small thing was getting close but stopped. He waited for the two of them to get closer and initiate the conversation, which was soon to come, sooner or later as he waited. 'We got no choice Ian, if we don't come, he will start it. "Fine, but follow my lead and button your coat harsher so he won't hear me, it's just dark enough in here. 'He could've at least lit a candle, though the bizarre thing was the fact that there were present, industrial light, caught in nets of metal, standing above. True, for Tom, they appeared like they were nothing but white floating bulbs, standing as nothing more but decoration. Before anything of value had happened, this came as a notion of retreat. The man stumbled on his chair and was tripped by Zeppelin at once, without a doubt having to swear even the mighty one from their depths. 'What's thing?Damned, cursed, crushed, little thing of much pain!'He said, in an almost shout that came out of his mouth. Visibly mad from this, he kept the same haggard appearance he had during their first encounter. A pity that he hadn't changed his mood at all. 'You're the rascal, aren't you?With your little toy and knocking and what not. Where are your parents now boy?I'm certain that there'd be a lot of spanking involved the moment they arrived as I informed them of your misdeeds. 'This made Ian cringe at the idea, let alone be left a voice to speak. 'What do I say?'Whispered Tom-Tom, just in time for Ian to begin his act now, as he certainly did so. 'As a matter of fact, I just came here to announce that there's trouble. "Trouble?"Asked the man perplexed at the mere sounds of the crow's voice. This might've come at the right time, but he almost sends a shivering whisper back to Tom-Tom just as he noticed it in the sky. 'Point at that, fast, boy!' 'There!' He pointed at the creature just as a small ball of black clouds formed around it. Its entire black, serpent-like body was covered by an armour made of singing small black bells. They were silent now, a sign of some sort, which made they seemed like they were damning to say the last. 'Get back boy, we need to turn the ship. 'The man turned as well and looked at the door. It's closed, that damn boy did something behind my back, rascal of old, damn him. 'Grab of something and hold now, there's no other change if we may escape now before we enter the storm. 'This came fast, but the ball started growing, encompassing more than the mere clouds, but many others. From its bells came lightning, striking far below, though they were no mere matches for anyone once it came further above. Its bulk of a body, tall, round, like an amalgamation, almost made itself visible as lightning bolts bounced inside of it. A mere child would've been able to glance at the thing and realised that there's the spot where it stored all its power. 'Grab the damn thing, boy, what are you waiting?' Zeppelin already took its spot, in a tightly fit lock between a metallic pillar and a chair which was strapped just next to it. Nothing would be able to push or affect it at all. 'Grab it already bot, are you deaf?' 'I'm sorry. 'Tom-Tom grabbed on the same chair, a few centimetres away from Zeppelin and held as tightly as possible. This was a peculiar thing he felt now, as the wind started pushing itself past the windows and landed into the wind. 'Such power, we won't be able to hold for much longer, once he starts shifting it around. Especially when those pop out. 'Something was beginning to come out of its body, to the point of making it seem like the bells were hanging by poles. A damned vision that made it seem obvious what its next move was. 'It's going to use them as conductors. 'Said Ian, and the sight and thought alone made those things seem frightening. 'Stand on the chair Tom, before we suffer the full effect. 'The boy did do as he was told. Young and bold, though he wasn't afraid for his age, he went back alone there made sure no one would see him do it. 'What are you doing boy?' 'I'm closing the door before it's too late. 'This was something that the man didn't understand, his mere action appearing to be nothing more than a simple waste of time. As much as he could move freely, this was about to change in a short duration of a time. 'Go back now. 'I'm done. 'With that he dashed like a rabbit caught in a chase, landing on the chair like there wasn't any other way around. 'It's all done. 'Seeing a band around, he wasn't sure of what to do. 'Pull it and strap it. 'There was a short explanation given by Ian, mostly in crawl noises which were concluded as being misunderstood by Tom. He was quite mad that the child had chosen a bad thing to follow but now it was more than safe. 'Done, you can turn it around?' 'Around?' The man almost shook his boots as he laughed at the mere proposal of the kind. 'You can't be that dull, can you? There's no way we can turn this without losing our cargo, we're going under it now boy. 'But you said. 'I'm afraid that after some miscalculation, there's no other way for us to turn it anymore. Those lightning bolts would come just right us lad. 'Henceforth, there was no other was but, through the very eye of the storm. 'Boy, see that button next to the wall? That round thing just fairly above your head?' 'This one?' He made only but a sign and Tom understood. The white bulb above started glowing red with might, as the sound of the alarm came to life. Its dignified song came not only as a surprise but just as shocking to everyone on board. A harem of shouts came, as most had already noticed towards what they were going. But this wasn't any alarm that signalled danger. It served the purpose to announce the fact that a storm was coming. Rather, they were coming for it, to say the least. It stopped short of reaching the first dark cloud, that's when it became a soundless alarm which bred nothing short of a chaos above. 'This will be the utmostly rough boy, whatever reason you've come here for, I hope it was worth it. 'For the front would be just as affected as the rest of the ship. Unknown to Tom-Tom, these platforms were made to be pulled to one another in case the one who's doing the riding was too hurt. 'Rather than being here, you could've been somewhere safe. "I need to reach the king at any cost, sir, nothing so far has been a mistake. "Is that what you came here for?Do I look like a royal attendant to you lad?"There was a sly smile, just as the platform started descending.

He turned around, stilled in his chair and looked at Tom, still have kept most of his smile, glancing at the small machine he dragged along. Something was stuffed as well in his coat, which had become as obvious as it were. 'Well, what is it then?"I wanted to ask you if you could please go faster, that's all. "Well your wish is my command now, isn't it?There'd be no escape from what you see if we were going slow through the storm, would it?But what exactly is your deal with the king?"There came the whisper before Tom even said anything that would've been as rash as his tongue remained. 'Don't tell him what you saw, tell his this Tom. I seek an audience with the king, nothing more. 'And he said it as it followed. 'Interesting, a boy asking for an audience, for what is worth, I hope it's worth it, risking your life to go through this. 'Just at the far end of the wind tunnel created by that creature, they started sinking below. 'Brace yourself, we're about to lose the ability to fly in no time. 'The wind died, air stood still, it was almost as if the area around it slithering body removed any sort of thing that would've kept objects floating in its range. They fell but managed to avoid a thunderbolt. Right into the storm below. 'Don't be scared now, we're almost through. 'There were eyes which were grasping from their small huts, houses and various provision headquarters above. Everyone looked in fear at that which coiled in their darkest days. But the sound and the feeling of raindrops, as comforting as it remained did nothing to help them forget the terror that still coiled. This day they were spared by it, as it made no effort to follow the small floating chunk of metal. Now, the driver had his first relaxing breathe of air, as far as going about to take it in certainly deeper than expected. Tom had his eyes closed throughout the entire process, glancing merely from time to time at what was happening. 'You may open your eyes lad, it's quite the view. 'Despite having a storm just at had, they were just above the dark blue ocean, with its islands spread from side to side, as giant as to be called close to being continents at least. 'Could I?"Don't leave your chair yet, it's not safe!"That was certainly frightening on its own, as much as he wanted to believe he had his best intentions. 'Well, isn't it supposed to be uninhabitable down there?"The green trees on the island made it seem quite so. 'You weren't told about the story, were you?"I know only that there came something which almost destroyed the world, but the. What I meant to say, our king. 'At the whisper of the crow that of which came as a correction. 'Our king managed to save you with the help of his machine while the world below was destroyed. "Well, that's not entirely true, but most of it could possibly explain that way lad. For some things, you need to become older to understand them. Nothing stays the same down there, one way or another, too much exposure to the grounds does things to you, which believe me when I tell you that you'd not like. 'Despite everything that happened, at least they were still in the air. 'We're floating now, from the looks of it, everything should be more than safe. 'It was a curious thing in the mere fact that they might've lost some barrels and some boxes in that. This platform, or rather a ship was going fairly at the same speed. But now unstrapped from the chair, Tom had the chance to ask the man. 'Could we possibly go any faster than this, sir driver?'As much as of an old man as he was, he stroke his beard but threw a coin.

It would've been too big if he were here for the first time, but now he was just tall enough to grab it and hold it. 'Grab me a drink, there's a dinner upstairs, it has a sign. Tell the woman at the counter to give you something with a kick, but don't tell her it's me, do you understand? Do me this small favour and I will try to make this fly faster.

"Understood sir!" Like a little bee, he went, opening the door with the key, the same one the man didn't notice he had taken. As a little reminder of their deal, he decided to keep it in case he thought of locking himself in. 'Come Zeppelin. 'Just as the end of the hallway, he was set to wait, though. As much as he wanted him as a companion, the way outside wasn't safe for him. 'Too much water, can't you see the rain? It wouldn't do too much good if you rusted here, would it?' But his eyes were half torn on that and on the sleep. After this little ordeal, he knew he would most likely fall wherever most likely it was. Just a little walk from toe to toe and glancing at what used to be filled spots. There weren't any boxes that could've been used for storage anymore. It was fairly cold and raining, not to mention that he had nothing to wear for this kind of weather where everyone else had brought their raincoats. Everyone was extra busy now, working the next shifts as well to cover up for everything which was lost in that manoeuvre. Soon they'd no longer be above the ground anymore, but in-between the clouds, a place that was just as worse during the rain. 'It's soo cold in here. 'Said, Ian, as he went even deeper into the coat. Despite the best attempts the crew had, it was still just as hard to keep warm in this conundrum of his. 'It will be over soon, just let me get his drink and we'll be down there in no time. 'While being carefree, he went on ahead and started dodging the various walking figures and the barrels which didn't fall off. Everything had to be moved at once just in case there was another encounter in the sky. Anything that would prevent this from happening was more than welcomed. 'Careful lad. 'Watch it where you're going. 'Stop that right now. 'Ah, you've almost made me drop that one. 'Some of the voices came, tired, dulled, just like the men had become once they were raised up from their sleep by the alarm. Once glance at their faces and you wouldn't be able to tell if they were just tired or had been raised for the dead. 'I'm sorry but I'm in a hurry. 'The door to the dinner was open, as it had always been, though there was a different waitress now, much younger, though she was dressed the same. Definitely something in the regards of having been called or might've been her daughter. Surprised to see a child coming to ask for a command, she went in the back and prepared just what he had asked for. 'Make sure you don't drink this, all right? It's definitely not too good for someone your age, could you promise me that?' 'Yes ma'am, I'm only the delivery boy, nothing else. 'With that, he paid her and went on to return, wet like a dog, as well as Ian, was. The mug was covered well enough, just so that dirty water wouldn't pour inside. From the looks of just how filled was the patronage, it was kind of obvious that something was about to occur now. Shifts were being changed. People who weren't supposed to be awake now woke up from their deep slumber just to go back at it. 'Hurry boy, Tom-Tom I'm really feeling the cold deep inside my guts. 'This was hard, as he was carefully walking in order to make sure that not a drop would be spilt. Ropes were being hanged, hooks being taken back, doors were being closed and now, planks were being places to hold them still. 'They're preparing for something. Boy, make sure you're safe with the driver, despite what he had said, that should be the safest spot on the ship, understood?' Tom nodded and did his best to listen to the advice of his friend. Not many people dared help him now, but down the stairs, into the cockpit, where Zeppelin had apparently turned and waited, in the exact spot he stood where the circulation came back to being. Harsh winds were coming, it was way too obvious to be called something other than what it was. 'You brought the drunk boy? Aye, give it to me now. 'With a white foam around the top of his moustache, the old man almost came to life, having dealt a kick to himself now. 'I feel alive. 'He said white pondering at the smelling wet dog which stood around. 'Go look through that drawer over there, clothes your size should be standing there, just look for them. 'There were indeed a few of which appeared to be working clothes, but made for children?' I guess there's no exception for anyone who's here. "They used to bring their children here, but not anymore. 'In the dark, the entire change took place, as much as he didn't want to be seen, nor Ian, the dead crow, he kept as quiet as possible. He left his previous clothes in a wet pile after this simple exchange. 'How do I look?" Like you've come from a valley of chimneys that needed to be cleaned, boy. Now, what was it that you needed from me?" I need you to go fast, the audience?" Oh, yes, indeed, little boy, I remember that now we can perhaps go faster in order to get rid of this damned storm. I'm telling you if it weren't. 'The man stopped once he noticed that Tom had stopped listening. He was sitting in that chair, coiled and sleeping. Just around it, stood Zeppelin, almost like a guard, tall in dark and waiting. Unknown to anyone, the ship was already set to walk on its own, towards the destination. Oh, poor chap, what life awaits him when he gets there. I don't know how far he'll take this mission of his. Thought Ian just as he had prepared himself to shut his eyes and dream the same dream of crows rowing in the sky. This time it was quite different than anything else though. Tom was sitting in the shit, doing all the rowing. The mist made it all appear like a fever dream, where a bunch of crows stood inside the boat and made signs to one another. In other cases, it would've been a pair of crows holding the paddles in their beaks and rowing together. 'It's quite the change now, perhaps we could rest them for a moment. The boy wasn't even distracted or even thought about asking what was truly happening around him. This came as an accepted thing, hearing them speak, going from place to place around the distant sky. 'Ian. 'He turned towards that one, despite being so many of the other crows in the same condition, the one that didn't speak was obviously pointed out. 'How'd you know kid?' Asked the crow, of which voice had a certain deep ring to it now. 'I just knew. 'Tom had already been taken by the mist, along with the other crows, but as always he just flew away into the clear sky. 'Wake up lad, there's a stop. 'A shout suddenly woke all three of them up. Ian almost left an unrelenting sound of crow as he was taken aback. Tom became close to yelling in his condition and Zeppelin, the last but not least, blew a smoke ring out of his back. Least to be mentioned was the fact that the ring of smoke it blew was darker and hotter than the steam. 'What's going on? Did it come back or anything?" No lad, it's all safe now, we just anchored into our next stop. I just wanted to wake you up and let you know of that, you might get to like your staying here. 'From the looks ahead, there were only clouds and high rocks, nothing truly magnificent at all. Tom gave the old man a petrifying gaze, making sure he understood he didn't want to wake up for this. 'What? Oh, that?' Once he realised at what he was gazing at, it made him understand why the boy was thinking of it. 'Oh, I'm certainly sorry but that isn't what I'm talking about. Go upstairs now, and take this as well with you once you're there. A fine job it is to you. 'With that thing, he was given another coin, one for air travel and in case he was hungry. It wouldn't have come as anything else but peculiar, but there was a certainty that he'd get something as well for delivering the mug back to the dinner. Nonetheless. 'Take that small machine with you as well. "Will do sir, thanks for having us. 'There was something of a farewell between the driver and the boy, though they'd most likely see one another fairly soon. As for Zeppelin, the lighter it got through the tunnel, the easier it had become for Tom to just grab him and carry over the stairs. 'Well, boy, I won't ask you of it if you don't want to talk about that. "You mean the dream, don't you? I don't know what else you could be talking about, no one can hear us here unless there's someone eavesdropping at the top of the stairway. 'There was the pale-faced crow just standing there confused. Why would the boy be in my dream as well now? This thought alone confused his little head now, certainly more than he had expected. Why is this happening to me now at all times? Again, his inner voice tried to break it into pieces, though as much as he desired that, he couldn't make the boy wait. 'We're connected, somehow, I'm certain of it. And it goes a long further than me being inside your coat. 'Tom nodded his head in agreement, though he wasn't ready for this type of conversation yet. Something about it made him feel bad, even worse than he had expected to be. 'Can we save this for later?' Ian nodded as he went away. The purest thought the boy had now was only the one where he had desired Zeppelin to have had the ability to talk. 'There, now that you're on the ground, you should stay away from the dinner, at least until things clear up. No one should give you any trouble if I'm here around. 'Said the boy with much of his cheeks being encumbered in red and almost blown. The sight of green came out of sight. Trees almost fell on the platform. 'What is this?' 'You should go and explore Tom-Tom, while there's still time. "But what about dinner and breakfast?" Those can most certainly wait, perhaps you may even get through this and find something to eat inside there. 'It appeared like a peculiar sight for him, to the point of never having seen trees so tall and bearing onto them, small pieces of clay as armour. Leaves were sharp like knives and there were berries in the distance. 'Wait there a minute lad, you're not planning on going there alone, are you?' A voice and a hand stopped him before his feet touched the dirt. One single guard was left there, standing between him and the open space. Something about him wouldn't make you look twice. 'I'm in need of exploration, is there any other explanation that you need now?' 'Aren't you a little short to be a lad? I can't let you pass, it's way too dangerous out there. "Sir, I'm more than certainly aware of how I'm supposed to take care of myself, so don't you worry a bit. 'The man frowned at the sight of trouble he'd give. 'Back away I said. 'With a punch over the brow, he stopped Tom from attempting to slip away while he was distracted. It wasn't as hard as it was felt as the boy bounced over his arse. 'Why did you do that?' 'I said you're not supposed to go through here. 'Apparently, every other way was blocked, to the point of this being the only alley where one could've gone. One particular thing was the fact that he had noticed that this platform looked more like one small part of a giant town, the thing that was very peculiar for a ship. But that design or whatever drove them to make it that certain wait could wait. Now what remained important was the mere fact that there had to be a way for him to snick past him. 'Wait, Zeppelin, not yet, it's not worth it. It's not worth it. 'Tom was surprised by the sheer amount of strength this tin box displayed. If it had just a small amount more, there'd be no stopping from its track. 'Let me try at least. "No, we cannot let him hurt him now, we need to think of the consequences of that. Who knows what may happen after that. They could even kick us off the ship and never have us reach the king. "All right now, what's with all the ruckus going on here?' Apparently, a man was dressed like what seemed to be a miner of some kind. There was no mention of the similarity between their clothes. It might've been something short of a plot in order to get past the guard. 'You can't seriously tell me they asked a child to come and work, could you?' 'Wait, Brom, there's something about this kid, he wanted to snick past me when I wasn't aware. We can't let him go, what would his parents make of it?' This was certainly a problem that appeared like it might've lasted. At least if it weren't for the stranger who appeared to him he might've stayed. Now, this could or might only happen once. But he looked in both Tom and Ian's eyes, noticing that he was hiding something more than the clever look he had. 'I say let him go and have his work, what could go wrong, you hear? He won't be allowed to go past the ruins and the city, understood?' That rugged man scowled at this but gave in eventually. It wasn't anything of the sort but he desired to have no trouble with him or anyone else who might've come to see a kid standing there and being blocked. 'But. Listen, kid, you return in an hour. See that little thing on the wall?' It was a rustic device, covered in the same iron bands that were out there, green with a bit of rust. But how else could it have worked, with its four tongues, with every single one of them leading to a different direction, up and down, left and right? 'I don't understand it, now they all changed directions again. "Each of them calculates a certain period of time and never leave their set area, kid. Didn't they teach you that in schools? Damn thing, just come back before they all reach the middle from whence they spanned. It should be easily noticed when the light comes down from the sky. 'There was a dark frown to it, for he looked at the sky in fear. Something of that dark storm which was left behind appeared to have been called and on its way. Damn thing would bury all of us alive if it weren't for the captain. 'What are you waiting now kid? You got an hour. "Right. 'Without even thank for noticing the man, he let go of Zeppelin and already went on his way, brushing the sand off, rubbing his forehead as well. 'We're free, finally. ' 'Not for long, but we could at least try to make the best out of it. "Do you know anything about the place, Ian?" The crow was already deep into his thought, making sure he had grasped any amount of information that could've been grasped at. The curious thing was this, past the few leaves that dared grow, this was an extraction point. Whatever amount of sand had once been, it got dug out, leaving a system of pipes leading to a giant globe which held all of that black liquid. 'They're extracting it, Tom. Stay hidden, under the leaves I say. 'Just near him, as he laid crouched, Zeppelin was making sure the boy was safe. It even works under the shadows of the leaves. Thought the boy as he appeared to have been set on this peculiar stance. Awkward to stay crouched, sweaty perhaps. 'Change position, please. 'The crow immediately rolled under his arms and appeared suddenly on his back. His breath was cold upon Tom-Tom's neck, but if it were between this and the sweat. Well, more importantly, was this machine. Almost golden, bronze, and sucking on the land. 'Why are they taking so much of it from here?' This peculiar question had something in mind. Regardless of the reason behind the extraction, the land was visibly suffering because of it. And a mere child could figure out that it was making the ground sick. Even the sand was sticky and falling apart from his hand at a mere whiff. All because it came so close to the point where it was being extracted. 'Don't say a word Tom, someone's coming. 'Past the throng, a peculiar pair of people were discussing, most likely what they were planning on doing with this. 'Could we get close to them?' 'Tom, you're way too big, they'll notice you. "Could you do it then?' There was fear in his eyes but he couldn't see that now. 'I can't fly there and it'd take too long for me to go. It'd be better for us to avoid this entire ordeal entirely, wouldn't it? At least until we get enough time to look around. 'There were some wise words, but as Tom had thought of them, bore a tone of fear which had made it obvious. He was afraid of being seen the way he truly appeared to be. 'We will return, right?' 'Certainly. 'Soon, there was no sign of them passed the bushes and the sand springs which loomed around. Tom might've appeared like an animal peering from the bushes, though now he disappeared before he was spotted. Blast that thing, we should've done something when we had the chance, thought the boy. But without support, there was certainly nothing they could do alone. In the brow of leaves were said had accompanied the forms, creating crystals around them with the help of heat, the light came as much of a surprise. 'What are there?' Ian quickly pulled his head out to peer at the various shining thing. 'Hide me Tom-Tom, pull me away before it's too late. 'Tom had turned his back on the crystal, though it was just as hard for the crow to resist turning itself to them. 'We need to be as far from here, from this region. We need to go. 'For a dead crow, his breathing was fairly going out as fast as it could possibly go. 'Damn thing. 'He was almost getting to the point of hyperventilating if he had the means inside his small body. 'All right, all right, we're going away, what is it with you and shiny things?' Boy, you wouldn't understand the fact that I'm a mere child at heart when it comes to shiny things and precious little glittering objects. Stay away from them and don't call me out unless it's safe to come. 'This quaint thing made both of them depart as far away from civilisation as they could possibly go. It was quite obvious now, that nowhere here was safe anymore, at least not where the heat came and definitely not around the plants. 'What should we do no? There appeared to be in the sand as well. Small shining rocks that can't help it but get furnished by the sun. 'Don't talk about that Tom-Tom, you're only making it worse. 'I'm sorry. 'But that didn't do anything from deterring from the distraction in his mind.

Once his mind got set on it, there was nothing stopping Ian from wanting to snoop around and glance at as many glittering and shimmering things as he could. Rocks and stones, shining diamonds waiting in the sun. Don't think of it Ian, you'll only get lost from the boy. The thought alone was strong enough to compel him to stay. There was something about the boy which made him appear like he was quite worth the time. Not to mention that there was no paying him at all. He worked for free, more or less, even got himself that nice tin box with wheels. A damned thing, that he only thought about now. Growing in the dark despite not being made out of bone and skin, a dangerous thing. 'Ian, I think it's safe to come out now, I found something. 'As his head popped out, he noticed what the two of them stumbled upon. 'Oh, no, no no Tom-Tom. We're definitely not going inside of that, it's far too dangerous now.

For both of us, to say the least, there might not be any going or coming back once we're in. 'There wasn't any guarantee, though this appeared to be something crudely pushed from the depths of the earth. 'See that? It looks as if a tree had grown from inside the ground and raise that thing standing right there. The dirt and roots and rocks still remain. "And that's exactly why it isn't a good idea to head down there. 'Said Ian in a raspy voice. He couldn't believe what he had stumbled with himself upon, going from various plant to plant and cowered. Did he really find him or was this place avoided even by those giant people as well? 'Wait, Tom-Tom, listen to me now, we cannot get Zeppelin to come with us if you choose to climb. There's no entrance to the ground, notice? 'Without a way inside, the best thing which remained was a hole which appeared to have come from the ageing of stone. The architecture was certainly present, as for pillars and various forms that appeared to have circular patterns and sculpted humans on them. Other than that, it was certainly strange, but a hole was made just that someone might fit. 'Zeppelin, you may have to wait outside, unless you want to return to the ship. 'Even the machine came to reject this thing, though he did follow them anyway. 'You're as stubborn as an old oak, you know that?' 'You could wait for me outside and keep Zeppelin company. 'Once glance change that, as there was certainly no chemistry between the two of them. Perhaps it had to do with the fact that he was a crow, stick, stone and feathers. A construct wouldn't understand the needs he had, wouldn't even help him hide from the shining things. Some machines were even glittering themselves when standing in the sun, but that's going too far now. 'I think I'll pass. But be fast, I've got a bad idea about those underground trees of yours. 'From the distance, it appeared that some of the stone wasn't on the branches. A metal laid inside, but it was like nothing he had ever seen. Ian said nothing to Tom. It was too soon to say anything anyway. Certainly, the boy wouldn't understand. 'Well if you really want to do this. 'Apparently, so did Zeppelin, as his attempts to go around and seek a way inside for himself. There was just no desire to depart from one another. Certainly not this way, in a sense that this could end up in the worst way scenario. Damn those people, where are they when you need to get spotted?The boy will get lost and so will I if I follow him like a damn fool. There just wasn't any other way for him other than to follow Tom, someone had to take the chances and look out for him. 'At least be careful when you're climbing, you're meddling with another life, keep that in mind. "Which life, yours? I thought you were quite dead, to begin with. "And it wasn't a pleasant experience at all, thank you very much. But I would not like for it to happen to me again. 'With that, he shut the boy and let him do what he had to do, straight into that decrepitude. It was cold and dark though he could walk on a somewhat straight downland. Roots were hanging over, making it seem from the likes of it, that there were plenty of places where plants had grown and taken over. This place gave both of them that creepy feeling that managed to bear under the skin and frighten them at any sound. Especially as this came from Tom like a memory of what had happened in the not so distant past. He remembered going through the dark halls and feeling like someone was there watching, trying to get him. 'Anne. 'Tom yelled all of the sudden. It echoed right into the distant depth that bore rightly so into the earth. Of such a voice, even Ian wasn't aware and almost came out of his coat. 'What happened?What's the matter?"Nothing Ian, I. . . I just remembered something that happened to me and the others?"Others?"At the school, from where I ran from, it's not worth talking about. 'That feeling of anxiety and fear never left him in the dark. It felt as if he never left that place. Ian was not going to let the boy go around if it meant doing it like this. 'Listen, Tom, if you're not comfortable with this, we can go ahead and return back to the ship. An hour must already be gone and who knows. Perhaps they will start looking for us. "No, first we found out why I wanted so desperately to go inside. I know there's something there that's calling me, I can feel it. 'And from the source of that light something laid at the bottom. A deceit, trick of the eye, as the tunnel became steep and both Ian and Tom fell to what would seem like a deep fall. "Ian, fly!"Those words just fell on dead ears as they both did. Neither had time to act but fell on something big that broke their fall. It cushioned their bones from breaking and their bodies from being smashed. 'Something broke our fall. 'And out of the sudden came a bright light right in front of it. 'It's you. "Tom said as he just started sliding down. 'How did it managed to find its way down Tom?"I don't know but if it weren't for him, this certainly wouldn't have been too good for us. 'Zeppelin had indeed done some growing. The sheer size alone made it seem that this place had been completely dark before his coming. 'Dust and ruins look, Tom, there's something there. "Let's go, Zeppelin, it's still time for us to explore. 'The way it was all set made it appear like it was a temple of some kind, or at least used to be. Pillars held the top of the concave, their various religious objects held atop of the walls. Unfortunately, the light came only in an arc since it came from the eyes of Zeppelin and nowhere else. They couldn't move but see and work in that area. Sure, it was large enough, but not for their every need and care. 'Let's see then, what could we possibly do here?"Tom-Tom, just find what you're looking for and let's get out. Something's certainly wrong about this place. 'And rightly so, the roots were apparently the embodiment of something which encompassed the small altar kept in the middle of the entire concave of stone. It bore all kinds of marks, words but especially the most important thing, something inside the roots. 'Something's there, I'm sure of it. "Don't touch it Tom-Tom, don't touch anything. Who knows what could possibly happen if you touch anything?You could level the entire place to a damn brick and bury every one of us alive. 'But it appeared that the boy was too encompassed by the exploration to give any heed to the warning. 'Look, there's also another room, perhaps even another wing, right through. "Right through that dark tunnel which has no light and could just come down on you at any moment, isn't that right?"We got Zeppelin Ian, we can certainly do better. "He's way too big, just look at him. 'It was indeed true, from this size, it seemed like he could be mounted and used as a vehicle. 'Somehow he isn't affected by his own light, but I doubt he could shrink. "We could just go on our own and explore. 'Again the crow interfered. 'In complete darkness?What would be the point of that?'But the quick-witted boy was quick to point at a torch that stood rightly on the wall. 'Someone tried to come and explore before you boy, that's certainly a bad sign. "If someone was there, it means that. "It means that they might've not come back to take back their torch. We need to head out now and not say a word about what we saw. "Relax, it's not like there's someone who will think we went inside of this temple anyway. We'll be more than fine.

'He had his mind already set on this and there just wasn't any turning back for this boy. Damn him and his stubbornness!He'll see what's coming if he doesn't stop being reckless. The light was dangerous as well in a place like this. Tom didn't realise it, but as soon as he grabbed the torch in his hand, it was almost as if the air ignited by itself at the top. At first, he thought it as nothing but an illusion. It wasn't until moments later when he found out that in reality, there was sort of device in it that activated upon touch. 'Just who are these people?They've got self-igniting torches and flying cities at least. "You shouldn't take their kindness for granted but are we about to leave?"Ian was interrupted just as Tom turned around. It was as if the mere touch of light had taken effect just as it ignited, past their backs. Zeppelin was standing there as little as he had been. He was waiting to grow smaller so he could follow past the ruins. 'Good thing Zeppelin, now that we have you again, no one will dare to attack us. "But he's small again. "Just trust me, that's all I'm asking, there's nothing that could stop us. 'And as he said it, the three of them were already past the gate and into some sort of crypt. It was big, deep, and forcefully shoved into a steep path which leads deep below. For once, this came as a surprise that it didn't fall apart from whatever happened below.

Some would've thought this as the most frightening thing. And he did as well. 'Don't touch those coffins Tom, understand?"The boy nodded at the warning and stood just as far. It wasn't his deal to start looking at the dead. Since Ian was the closest thing he had to the other side, he might as well be listening to what he had to say. 'Not those words on the stone either. "May we look at least?"But don't touch. 'As much as he wanted to explore, this had to do. The signs were undecipherable, at least to anyone that was around. But the pictures on the wall, those he understood, more and less from a glance or two. 'Two people walking with something in their hands. They both seem to appear in a lot of places. "It's not just two of them standing there. Those are their robes. 'It peaked Ian's interest past ahead and a robe. He peeked and peered at the sight and tried to see as much as he desired to see before going into the warmness. Something there made him feel especially cold, being surrounded by so many of their dead. 'Those roots seem to be present at the bottom of the floor. 'Both the encryption and a pair that had grown. It was now that Tom recognised what appeared to be the seed which they had carried in the images. 'Documentation, that's what it is. I bet they've only written it down so people will come and ready, isn't it the way it goes, Tom?"There was a simple nod of some kind as he went along. What could this crow be trying to say then?Damn it and its riddles. Somehow, it started talking in gibberish some moments ago, from standing too much in front of the wall. Tom dared not say a word but listen. Could he understand what's being written there?"Tom, we need to get out as fast as possible. Away from the wall, now!'His voice almost turned into a crawl. Tom turned away from the wall and started going towards the deeper end of the cryptic place. 'Boy, listen to me. 'Zeppelin had already taken care and stood in front of him, almost causing him to trip. 'You can't both be serious, where's your sense of adventure now?"This place is doing things to me and I'm not sure if I'll be able to control myself any longer. "You know what then?" Boy look up front. 'Someone laid in a sleeping position, at the sight of which they both laid in silence. He wore brown clothes and was covered in roots and dirt. 'Roots and dirt, Tom, this is what will happen to you if you don't come back. This is a burial place and it isn't safe for us. "Let me just see. 'Tripped and on a knee, he came closer by crawling to the point of seeing the man from his face. Nothing but bones and it was recent. 'Let me have it. 'All of the sudden Ian came out and stole the jewel from his hand and hid it inside his nest. 'You can't use me as a bag. 'Protested Tom to no ears, but something farther from that point now frightened him, even as a mere thought. 'Ian, I think you're right, we need to get out. "Finally boy, you noticed it too?" I think there's something deep there that are listening to us. 'Tom said in almost a whisper. 'He was so afraid that he dropped his torch where it stood, seeing how the light was slowly but surely fading away. 'If the light goes it will start chasing us I think. 'His skin was cold and like a chicken's stool, he started backing away. 'Get on your feet boy. 'But those dark glittering eyes came closer. It was a giant thing, at least it even rivalled the giants themselves. No, this was a colossus, that stood as if he was a part of a mountain or a giant root of some kind. 'We need to go now, just leave the torch. 'Guided by the hand and the glittering light Zeppelin produced, the boy ran. 'The gate, it's too small for him to use. "Tom the same will be for Zeppelin, just look at it. 'The metal started bulging and vibrating as it started to grow in the moments it flashed the light away and came into the darkness. Flashes made it appear like it needed no eyes laid on it in order to grow. 'We need just another flash of light to get through. 'Tom jumped at that command once he saw the pure light come through and lit the way ahead. 'Zeppelin, come. 'The machine came in rushing as they piled up. The three of them stood, cold and watched upon the forced light. It was a giant black hairy hand which pushed and pulled, trying to grab at that. Anything it could grab was for the taking, that was certainly true. 'What will we do now?" Run before it's too late, it may break the stone to try and get us. Are you even listening to me?" This shock forced him to go on and look for a way out. 'Zeppelin, is there another way?' Steam came but nothing for an answer. From the likes of it, there was nothing of their sizes, at least as chances were. 'Look that way, we need some light to climb. Fast Zeppelin, it's up to you to help us escape now. 'The small machine did as it was commanded. There wasn't any way for them to reach towards the exit. 'You know what that means Tom. We could climb the vines and keep going until we're safe, but that means we need to spend some time in the dark. "Ian, you're right, Zeppelin is far too small now. Please close the light until you're as big as you used to be when you broke our fall the first time we landed here. There's no other way but to be alone in the dark with that. "Shh, Tom-Tom, make no sound. 'In the darkness, the form stooped and waited as they both became silent. No light for guidance but that shivering giant hand didn't appear to move at all. Its form was hidden and pushed over, waiting for its chance. The light came at once when they both realised that it went back inside. 'Either it's gone or it's here with us. 'That voice the crawl gave made him think of nothing more than an endless promise of despair that would follow. As much as the boy feared it might come, he went on ahead and climbed on the back of Zeppelin. This was the lowest height for him to climb on and reach the tunnel from where he fell and landed. Exactly the same spot as it were. 'Thank you, Zeppelin, see you rightly outside. 'This was an easy climb though something still made his thought and body shiver at what might come and try pushing him down. 'What was that thing in there?' Ian was silent for a moment just as they were focused on climbing. 'Careful not to fall. 'In truth, it might've come to get what I had taken. Shh, you dumb thing, don't let him know what you've done, he must've already forgotten about the ordeal. 'I'm glad we're safe at least, speaking of which. You weren't as bad down there for a human boy. 'Something about it would've made him blush in any other circumstance but this just wasn't one of those. 'Let's just focus on getting out. 'A finger broke a slab and both of them froze in place. It felt like a small battering ram which came and pushed it open from the darkness. As Tom held steady, hanging by the root, he looked at the dark form which tried feeling what was inside. Don't say a word boy, or he'll get us both. It had barely managed to push forth a few slabs away until realising that there wasn't anything there. 'Go around. 'Ian wriggled closer like a worm and whispered in his ear. It was an impetuous thing, to say the least, but at least he tried his best, judging by the circumstances. 'I can't reach the other side. 'Came to the soon regretful thing. A conundrum, to say the least, this thing just as another slab came down, broken by only a finger. Both Ian and Tom were unsure if this came only because it was the farthest it could reach or because it wanted to feel around. If a finger did that though, his entire hand could possibly just crush and cause the tunnel to collapse. 'Climb now, think about it later. 'Both of them were approaching the first hole which was dug in the tunnel. It was obvious that he was going on a pattern, trying to get as high as possible with his strikes. A giant smoke cloud suddenly came and the sight of Zeppelin down below left a wriggling thing in the darkness. A coiling form fell. 'Now it's your chance, run!' Before the little machine, as it had become from the exploring could be caught, it suddenly rushed towards the point where from where he had come inside. 'It saw us. 'Warned Ian once he noticed that glinting eye at the bottom. Those lips were just as putrid and close to being hairy, cracked as if the lack of water left it a desperate thing. For a moment, Tom almost fell into the hole, which prompted a desperate attempt from that thing to grab him. 'Climb now, faster Tom, faster!' Yelled the crow. It was something of a dark thing that his feet were wobbling to one another. And this action was repeated until both of them landed on the stone. As he climbed back, it was already half of the way which was free of any peril at least. Zeppelin had touched the light by now and laid outside, going to the point where he had lost the boy and the crow. Once again, both of them were now trying to desperately climb, holding on the vine. 'Damn this, we're about to be too far from the spot until it reaches us. "There's no other option!" Tom had his nails almost pulled out. At the mere sight of what was happening, he wanted to close his eyes and think of what it felt, again, being left alone. In that cold place where his breath was still going. A voice that was so strong and deceitful still rang in his ear even now. 'Go on ahead and try to run boy. 'Thinking of it alone made him shiver. Was I the first to hear him speak? It was then when he ran, climbed or went through, jumping only to land into the cold. At least a rib was stuck by the fall when he opened his eyes at least and realised that he was outside. With that howl coming from up there, he'd rather go away. 'Tom are you all right?' 'I will survive, don't worry. 'His hand felt around but it was a strange thing, making it seem like there wasn't any rib that was broken by the fall. Something strange occurred, rather one strange thing after another. 'Where's Zeppelin?' Asked the boy and from the likes of it came the small machine with a delay. He had to wait and look around but it was just as slow. 'How much time did we spend down there?' 'More than an hour Tom, more than an hour! Hurry up and get on with it, you know they're waiting for us there. Don't make them send for someone. 'Crooked on the first steps, he regained his composure and stability, making sure he could walk once again. What happened there? It was something which made him question whenever or not it was an illusion or the real thing. It couldn't have made it through the room without a noise. Something bad could've happened to them and it would've been all his fault. 'Well, it's getting dark and I'm starving again. You'd think there'd be barriers or something of the sort around. "Just wait for it Tom, I think we have a bargaining chip now. You just return and we'll see what we can do about it. 'This was quite the peculiar thing to say at a time like this. Both he and Zeppelin appeared to be trying to throw glances at the little crow. Well, none of them would be answered other than the esoteric. 'Don't worry. "But I might, other than that, Ian, was any of it real? That thing that almost grabbed us?" Even looking back, past the bushes and the various trees, he could see that tall structure hauntingly standing there. It ruled over the land like an obelisk of the darkest kind. Most importantly, they angered the king or the ruler, or whatever he was. 'Do you think he'll chase us now?" Rather in your dreams if you don't stop talking about it, Tom. 'This was quite the dispute that wouldn't be as welcomed as he wanted to be pleased. 'Down before they see us. 'Eight foremen stood there bearing small picks and pushable carts filled with various stones. Accompanied by five superiors, they were doing as commanded. Various metal carts had in them plenty of minerals which were in need of breaking. 'It seems like we might spend some time here. "You appear to be certain about it Ian, how'd you figure?" Tom's voice almost appeared vague. His eyes on his face had become quite pale. It seemed like his mind still got lost in that place where he wanted to scream. 'Listen, by any chance have I yelled or screamed when I was there?" 'We're out of it Tom-Tom, just concentrate on this and move on. There's no way he could reach us. That murderous thing won't reach us at all. 'Apart from the feeling of being lied, he didn't seem to take this to heart. Whatever it was, this close encounter wasn't quite worth it. 'Let's just return to the ship than before we're being spotted. 'Past the bushes, onto the road, without being seen. There wasn't any guard that stood there, after what seemed like ten minutes of lonesomeness. 'He isn't there!" Just snick inside and don't look back. 'Though this was quite hard now, not to stare at what appeared to be the lacking of a better fate. Everyone appeared busy, at the point where they have even abandoned what would seem to be the guard at the exit. 'No one's on the post. 'Though Ian was already with his head out, going around to peer at something. 'There boy, go there, we need to make an exchange. 'It was a pawn shop, that he recognised from the sign. There was plenty he had visited in the big town that managed to afford that kind of business. His mother once said they were a nasty business, the taking of the precious things from someone desperate. 'Nasty business. 'Recalling the words of his mother alone made him think about her. He didn't know whenever or not she made it through. 'Let's go already, do you want to eat or not? You were lucky enough to have me on so moving already!" But I've got nothing to exchange, nothing to give. I haven't packed anything in my pockets from home, there wasn't any time for that. "Just bear with me all right? I'll do the talking, you do the squawking. 'And Zeppelin stood by their side, silent as usual. This door didn't appear to be as heavy and tall as the previous ones had been. Luckily everyone was too busy to question why was a boy trying to find at a pawnshop. No one, and certainly no one who was busy had any care. It even bore one of those bells at the top of the door, which made a clicking sound as it opened. 'Those shining things, you'd do better not to face them while I'm here Tom. You know how I act around them. "I understand. 'There laid a busy man, past his age of prime, a jeweller to say the least, who was busy. Gems, diamonds, a jade so green you'd think it a dragon stone, no less. Gold pieces that were made for a few crowns and pieces of sceptres though never finished. At least on some sides there laid pearls and many silvers necklaces adorned with standing bronze and marbles statues. This man appeared to bear quite the collection here. It wasn't a moment that passed without him noticing the lad and how he stood there, waiting as if he came into the wrong place or a dream. 'You've stumbled into the wrong place, I presume? This isn't a place where children come to play, run along now. 'Past his little desk, he brushed off and came close to the boy. He gazed into his eyes but stopped once he saw some determination there. 'I don't suppose you've got something to trade, would you?' 'Not me. 'And immediately came Ian from behind his back, bearing a red rock which appeared even more marvellous and precious into the light. 'But I do. 'Tried to speak the crow, though it was quite hard whilst bearing the gem inside of him. 'Where'd you find that?' His hand slipped but couldn't grab the gem before Ian pulled away and hid his beak. 'Not yet, not until we hear of some payment first. We've gone through a lot of trouble to recover this. 'I think at least, wherever he might've got this, I certainly hope it won't get us both into trouble. 'Play along, that's good. Just keep going this way and we'll be fine. "Well, sir. 'Came Tom again, standing a lot straighter than he had entered the room. A curiosity and a peculiar look followed. This no longer appeared to be a boy but a strapping lad or gentlemen of stature. Either that or a fool with a bargaining chip. 'Very well, come to my table and we shall appraise it immediately. 'Both of them came out and followed the jeweller. From a button under the table, he lowered a set of devices which might've been used for enlarging thing. The word left him for the time, and the thought alone of them made him shiver. Round pieces of glass which lowered themselves, what could they be? 'May I have the gem?' 'Oh, right, Ian, give him the stone. 'Ian came right out but stood only out of reach. His body was still inside of his cloth, having remembered that small detail that might give people the wrong idea. 'Here you go. 'Those various pieces of glass were lowered by metal cylinders and tools which appeared to be controlled by his own will. It didn't help either that he had another one hanging just by his head, which he strapped only moments ago. 'Now, let us see what's going on. 'There was a silence that bore through him for a moment. 'Lad I don't know what you've stumbled upon but this may be worth more than everything here. "Oh, is that true? Wait, are you trying to shake me off now?' His mother had warned him about the type of men he'd find in the world if ever he had decided to travel around it. Every kind of men you may find, from good to the worst of the lost. They'll try to get what you've got and leave you standing in a pool. She said that with utmost care and need of protection for her child, a lesson that stayed with him. 'No, lad, I'm trying to look out for you. Something's off, something ancient about this. Take it away and never let anyone else see it. 'Ian was quick to grab it again once it was brought closer to his mouth. Perhaps he wasn't that type of man at all. But curiosity still dared. 'Do you think there's someone who might be able to tell me its worth now?' 'Just wait until we reach the capital, this might be a matter worthy for the royal jeweller alone. "They royal jeweller?" This might just line alone with seeking the girl. In truth, this might've come at the best time possible. 'Thank you then, I'll take my leave if you don't mind. 'As it was perhaps obvious, the man didn't seem to be paying much attention to what Tom had said. Something about the way he took him perhaps and what he had seen inside that gem. 'Ian, why didn't you tell me about that?' 'I thought you knew the boy. 'The bell rang again as they left. Hunger bore through him once more. This was quite the hardship now, that he needed somewhere to go. Calling it a peculiar thing to go in the bushes was already harsh, especially with a passenger or two. Though he managed it on their way to that temple. This was a different manner entirely. 'How do you think we may be able to ask for another free meal?' 'Just ask the woman if she needs more help and sees what happens. 'Once there, taller than the way he was when he had entered, he came to one of the seats and was greeted by the same familiar face. 'You're that boy, aren't you?' 'Tom, ma'am. I'm fairly afraid that. . . "Are you hungry ain't you?' As she said it, she still hung on that necklace on her neck, having remembered this favour of him. 'It's in the house, it's only fair after all. "Wait, ma'am, I wouldn't want to take advantage of you. If there'd be anything you need. 'There laid no second glance at the boy. It wasn't like she enjoyed making his meal for nothing but apparently, that little necklace around her neck was important. Far too important for anything else to matter. Since it was of such importance, it was only fair, Ian thought. It was a miracle at least that the stone didn't push itself past everything he wore underneath and cause some rupture. Quite the thing, gazing at its form in the dark. Though as much as he enjoyed the company, it was getting peculiar to have him on his back. 'Ian, you need to turn around and hide in front of me. People are starting to stare.

'The switch went one before anyone realised anything had even happened. 'Surely the won't suspect you a hunchback now that the lump migrated to your belly. "You didn't have a better idea now. Thank you, ma'am. "Enjoy dear. 'It was quite the meal, a beast of some kind, filled with carrots and potatoes. There were spices in places he didn't expect them to be. Something of it bore a hard smell which made him fall into a haze. A delightful mouthful made him realise that, despite the appearance, it tasted far too different than he expected. 'Take some more and be careful not to choke boy. 'This was indeed the thing he had with him, too strong of a scent and a taste that was like rubber. But in the end, the taste finally kicked it, making it seem as if there was something about it which bore through him. A rare combination of juicy and thickness which laid in the made. Its taste was hard to explain though it felt welcomed to a hungry growing lad such as himself. After a few more bits the condiments and the sauce kicked in as well, adding the real flavour that it had. 'It's just amazing. 'The more he looked around, the more he realised that this was a special day. Everyone had taken a part of the great beast. 'How come everyone's got it?"Oh, didn't you hear?You seemed the easily excitable fellow. 'Said a sturdy stranger from behind his table. 'They killed a great sky beast and took it by the side. It went right above the ship not long ago. "That's. 'He stopped his snooping and return to his dish. A flying beast that was caught. This thought alone made it bear down with every bite. Perhaps it was the connection of flying and the crow but this suddenly tasted shallow. No matter what happened to it, he was almost done, leaving only a pair of large bones behind. The damning silence was just as ready to be done as well. At the end of the dinner, there laid a pair of musicians, drums and around a stringed thing which seemed to bear to heads laid a small box which appeared to produce the sounds that came out of it. 'It seems like our entertainment has arrived. 'There appeared to be no wonder why people came from their way just to step in their dinner. Someone had just slammed the door open at once and at least ten men and women to accompany them had arrived. It was getting to the time of being over with the work, henceforth the reason why they were set on this. Without noticing, his plate had already been taken from him. 'Thank you. 'Barely noticed as she had left behind. It was going to be a busy end of the day now. Now. 'How much has it been Ian?You've got a better sense of the passing of the time, don't you?"This question seemed to bear something to him as he started in the darkness atop of the ceiling. Compared to it, the sun was swallowed. Perhaps it was either that or the fact that they had laid sooner than expected, lanterns rightly outside. They were preparing to celebrate something which he wasn't sure of. 'Let's go before it's blocked. 'At which the crow only silently nodded, though unfelt. Zeppelin was most likely lost at their feet, without any chance of being found in this crowd. Speaking of which. 'Could I go through?Thank you. 'This place was filled with people, perhaps twice more than they had been before it came to this. And the closest mention of fear came out of the fact that the night came sooner. Too soon to be precise. 'Ian, are you seeing this as well?It couldn't be night now, could it?"It's the summer days young man, they're coming to an end. "Oh, I'm sorry, I didn't mean to. . . 'She bore something of a red dress, standing like a rose on a sea of metal. 'It's all right, just be careful now, nights are supposed to be longer for some time now. You should be going inside, after all, it won't be too safe with a bunch of grown men and drunk ruffians fighting. Don't worry, it happens all the time. 'She seemed too sure of it for her own comfort. Tom could do nothing but look away, nod and blush. No one had called him a young man in a long time. The fact that it came from such a well looking woman didn't ease this at all. 'I'll take care. 'There were already a bunch of them just staring and throwing their laughs and taunts. 'Got yourself a little boyfriend now?' That sharpness had enough subtlety to end an age of cold. 'Why you little. 'The woman was already four steps away then close enough to make him eat the dirt and the rust from the small cracks between the metal plates below. Apparently, they were just as sturdily built as one could find or expect to find at these altitudes. 'We need to hide below before someone finds out about this. 'Zeppelin had already taken the path towards the bottom, though the reluctance didn't stop there. Something was lurking at the end of the tunnel and it was quite obvious what it was to be. 'Do you still have the key?' Always Ian, there's no way I'm going to give it back now. I just have to know when we're leaving. "We're at the safest point boy, don't worry about it. As much as you are afraid he might come and try to do anything to you, he's out of reach. 'What laid behind those words apparently had two meanings at least. Tom felt as if he walked alone through the dark corridor. 'The nights are longer, don't forget. 'Suddenly the light came from Zeppelin again, rightly when it was needed. His ratio of size was still within normal limits, is the size of a cat. No small thing being able to do that. 'The sound's nice at least, even if it's faint and coming from above. "Pff, as if you'd enjoy. "You wouldn't understand, being a crow and all. 'The end of corridor came and the door was closed. A few phrases and words came to his mind at least. What could I tell him to let me stay another night in the cabin when I've no place to go? 'Let's snick in and just leave in the morning before he wakes up. "I've got a bad feeling about that plan Ian. What if something happens during the night?" There was some silence once they heard noise coming from inside. It was locked but luckily, no key was inside. 'He has copies. 'The crow was observant, though one thing he did forget or managed to brush over. It was the fact that past everything the man might've remembered he had a key. 'There's no one there. 'He noted once Zeppelin closed his lights. Something was off. 'Is there anyone in here?' The boy yelled to no avail. Partially, the sound of his voice went off into the distance, lower than the faintest whisper of the wind. The music outside muffled any attempt of being heard. 'What now?" What do you mean boy? Go to sleep and wake up in the morning before he returns. We got the small machine to take care of us just in case something wrong might come to this plan. "But what if he returns and finds us here. "It's all right, your wet clothes. . . Were here once. 'The place where they had been suddenly made it seem like there was nothing in there. 'Close the door. 'Zeppelin, just as he came and got covered by the moonlight, started bleeding its light out just for them to see. 'They're not there anymore. He must've taken them before. "Fine boy, close the door and get as much sleep, I won't repeat myself any longer. 'It was a fine deal of bargaining though he had no choice in the matter. Something really managed to frighten the boy now. He had nothing but this one thing which managed to make him wonder what was going to happen to him. Reluctantly he went into the sleeping pose and closed his eyes at once. Nothing came to it at first. Before he realised it though, he was already snorting like a rock at the bottom of the watery ravine. Ian was in his nest, polishing the jewel before his welcomed sleep. And just as usual at the spot Zeppelin. One thing dared get both of them then. It was the shared dream in which they found themselves again. At least, one could look around and figure out that this was the same place they had explored, but with one change at least. The beast had won and managed to collapse the tunnel below.

Without the ability to scream or really make any noise, both of them were caught under the rocks in complete darkness. 'Ian, where are you?' His whispers were frightening and managed to show that he was indeed hurt. Something managed to bring down the spark from his throat. A rock of some kind. The silence as well. Not enough space laid for the crow to open his beak, neither to move with the gem being between them. Through the darkness, the various forms bore something but he couldn't tell what. Did it crush the tunnel above himself? Could it be dead? Suddenly, something forced itself from far below of him. It was the crow which managed to sneak and slip but to no avail. Ian wanted to let a shout or what the equivalent would've been, but he looked around and realised where they were. 'My wings Tom, they're torn. 'Said, Ian, as he rested on his back. He was barely breathing despite having no functional lungs, at least from what he knew. At least, he managed to drag under one of its small pointed legs, the most important thing. 'You brought the gem. 'Blood came out of his mouth and found its way on his fingers. It wasn't hard for him to figure it out despite being covered by the dark veil. Hinted at him were the pain and the liquid which ran through his fingers. 'Are we going to die?' There appeared to be plenty of other crows, a flock, a murder at least. All of which were sitting down on various rocks and watching them. 'I can't move my hands. "Shh, Tom, I can hear something. 'There came a hand which moved. It grabbed and crushed a pillar in its way. From the looks of it, that hairy dark being managed to lift itself past the rubble and every piece of rock that would've buried it alive. There was not even a hint that there was an exit out there, perhaps not even the light. Left without a chance or a place to escape. He could feel as to being forced to the point of cowering below. Since there wasn't anyone that might help, the thing was only to wait until realising that it was a dream. 'The darkness seems so real, can't you see that he's here?' He asked Ian but the crow couldn't do anything anymore but watch for fear how his other crow friends got torn apart. It grabbed them and suddenly pushed them into its massive mouth. He must've been somewhere deeper than they were, it couldn't be the other way. Had the collapsing tunnel made him fall? Is he buried as well underground? 'Ian, we need to escape, we need Zeppelin. "Don't shout boy, he'll hear and find you at once. It's the gem, that's what it wants, I know it to be true. It won't rest until it gets it. 'The guilt started gnawing and bitterly dragged itself through the boy of the crow. Perhaps, being forced into the worst fate a crow could bear, unable to fly made him rethink his decision. Either that or the fact that the darkness had taken any glitter from the gem, leaving behind nothing else but an image of what it had been. A shade of its former self which was worthless. 'Let go of me. 'Shouted a crow as he had been handled in what would seem like the worst possible manner. No denying, something was about to happen to all of them, though, despite that, they weren't going to fly away. 'You need to escape. 'Ian tried whispering. It made no difference whenever or not they heard what he had to say. For once, the veil was too thick for them to see where they were flying. Then, it was the fact that the massive beast was far too intimidating for them to attempt anything other than being frozen in place. 'Have you seen it now? It's too massive, it's too dark. We're all bounded to you and you're not moving. 'Said a mighty one who appeared to be as sharp and fat as a pigeon. One more glance at the black pigeon-like crow and he disappeared at once. Another one took for the cause. It was a pity that bore no flame in this cold waste of a temple and they haven't even gone through it at all. 'Tom, what are you trying to do?' From the looks of it and from what he had heard, there was still a chance for him to go through. 'My legs, I'm starting to feel them. 'Rock after rock he pushed and stopped. Waiting until another crow was taken at once and eaten alive. Despite it being a slow process, it seemed to enjoy eating the crows.

Perhaps they tasted or felt like the equivalent of candy, or at least partially something similar to that point. 'Ian, we're going to escape. And the gem's coming with us. 'He whispered though it was obvious that this plan was mad. Pulling himself was fairly hard and he dared do nothing else but try. At once, he appeared to be glancing, out of the ordinary. The final stone came off. While grabbing Ian and the stone, that giant hand was stuck into the motion of grabbing a rock which had a crow on it. It dropped it at the notice. Forced in his shirt along the stone, Tom grabbed the torch which at once ignited. 'Look, Ian, I was right, he's stuck inside. 'A mad ravenous beast noticed that though there wasn't any doubt that if it desired to escape. It would have just come out without difficulty if it wanted to.

'Where to now? He collapsed the only way through. 'Both of which went out of sight as he went back into the passage where they had found the gem. 'We're going to find another exit, there must be. Feel this?' It was the cold wind that came from below, a source that bore through his lungs like light spears of air. 'But Tom-Tom, this is nothing but a dream, it couldn't be. "Then stall Ian, stall until we awake. There's no other way for us to go. Can't you hear those feet moving?' Oh, that damning sound of boots and stone, what could it be bearing now? They hadn't seen its dark below but the sound of chains was as obvious as it were. Could it be then? 'Look at the drawings again Tom!' Ian was quick to point out that the drawings on the wall appeared to have him depicted in plenty of ways. No, there was something more than that. It was the fact that he seemed to be part of a species of beast-like people which were used at giant stone dragging slaves. 'Picking the stones and carrying them were, carving and even everything that needed. "Don't forget guardians boy, that's the most important. It must've gone mad though if it desires to get through and. . . 'That was cut short as for seeing that at the end of the tunnel or the pathway, it laid waiting for a mark. Either the shock stopped it or something might've been waited for. 'It's coming again. 'By now, this rendition of theirs went on again with him jumping through the gate. 'There's no way out, you know what that means. 'It was indeed obvious that it wasn't going to try again, going through with his hand. 'We need to go through this hole. 'From the looks of which there appeared to be a path, they could take in order to escape. Blow and punches were thrown at once. 'It's trying to break the gate!' Came the crow to this dark conclusion. There wasn't any denying it whatsoever. 'We need to jump through then. 'Perhaps there could've been alternatives to this decision but this was the best they had. It'd be just another way collapsed. 'Whatever you do boy, just don't look back. The only thing that still remains is for you to look forward and never stop running. 'Said Ian and he glanced at the feathers which laid at the bottom, covered in what would seem like sand and brittle dirt. 'Let's go then. 'Before he realised it, he started jumping from rock to rock. The height was relentless though Tom realised that the slightest mistake would mean doom. Quick to regain his stability on them, he used his hand to grab and push against the opposite wall so he wouldn't fall. Apparently, remains of the previous wall had fallen below just as well, making a path which leads to the lower levels. It felt colder, that's for sure. 'What are you waiting for boy?' 'I'm trying to think. 'As dust particles flew in front of his eyes, he found himself standing at the threshold of it. Going behind would mean having to meet that thing which wasn't the best of ideas. If they were to go on ahead head to head, he'd be crushed. 'It's coming to us Tom, from above! Just go ahead and run as fast as possible. 'Without think, the boy listened now, going as far as possible in what would seem to have become the part of the tomb which had all the bodies. The various corpses and coffins laid inside the walls. Some laid in holes, or atop to one another while others appeared to have melted in.

Some of the holes had a few bodies of various creatures stuffed as well. 'Quick Tom, it serves a purpose if it knows best of what it had to do. Burn the corpse. "It won't ignite. "Just wait and keep at it, keep pushing the flame around the body, something should ignite soon. 'There laid some truth to that just as he glanced at how the body suddenly burst into flames. 'Just think of it as being in flames boy, it just needs be that way. 'The more power of thought he gave in, the hotter it appeared to get, just as much as the smoke trail got bigger and bigger while it started spreading.

But all things would come to an end as well. Despite being a giant, the tremor it created from that small leap managed to warn Tom of its presence. 'It's close, we need to spare no time now, that's enough. 'It was obviously clear where it was heading to. What wasn't as clear as he wanted to know was the fact, once the light went as a pillar of light, revealing just how tall the tunnel was. It was enormous, and an endless thing that was lit by a layer of light. For the size of it appeared to rival twenty corpses high. 'We will be caught now, boy. There's no other time than this for us to go. 'At this final warning, he refused to stay and be surprised by the mere facts regarding the size and the various forms he saw inside. Stone carvers made statues at the end. 'It's a wide hall, perhaps we're safe!' But at that, he thought and looked through it only to stop at the edge. Looking around, this was just one of the many holes which bore through, leading at the end of a colossal room. 'So many ways to go. 'Though only one of the square-like holes had a giant trail of smoke leading into it. Two statues laid inside, pointing to one another, despite their form, he hadn't the time to explore. 'Thow the torch and climb down before it gets here. Look behind, how the flame is about to fail. 'As Tom threw it, after that dark glance, he saw the light vanish. 'Feel the ground and stay silent again. It may not be able to see where we went. 'It was a harsh thing to feel the stone around and let it go only with the help of fate only so he wouldn't fall on his own. 'Damned thing, we need to get through. 'Stumbling and trying to go on about his feet, he felt the various bricks which were lent in a pattern. Someone built this hoping to be climbed. And apparently, he would do well to abide. That dark shape was about to come now that the light finally died. It'd be twice as mad after a roar which shook the entirety of the roots and dirt of the cracks of the earth. Now it laid walking slowly in a trance, knowing of no other path. With his eyes closed and guided by nothing by his blind-self, he was already halfway through. 'You're doing well Tom, just go on. 'Then even Ian came to a silence and waited for him to get below. Though this malfunction of the device last for this long only to fail. At once it started on its own, giving in a light that was faint. For the least said, is seen from above the tunnel by a hulking ancient beast. Starving and without water, it wasn't any wonder that it didn't respond as well to something that faint. It kept its pace the same. 'We need to get below fast before it sees the light. 'With the bricks in front of his eyes, he knew where to go, what to grab and just how fast he went, the crow couldn't tell. But to say the least, he was forcing himself to do the best he could. 'I'm trying Ian. "Jump now, you're only some feet away. 'As he asked for this, he managed to land with minor trauma on his feet. His hands slipped around the device and as he turned the small cog into one direction, perfect darkness. Both of them had a look on their faces as if they saw a ghost then. Ian and Tom seemed surprised to see it get so close and have such a good look at its massive body. Even if it was darkness there, somehow it wasn't possible to avoid gazing at it. Closely, it stood there sniffing but to no avail. Something inside this temple apparently managed to pull in some of the sweat. Masked by that, there was virtually no trace. 'Don't move yet. 'Whispered the crow, as he stood the closest he had ever been to his ear. Apparently, he wasn't going to notice or even look too further below. It didn't leave its area but returned at once, having a mad look in that dark veil. 'Let's snick, slowly. I said slowly boy. 'Immediately, Tom became almost like a small crab, taking breaks, and making sure to step like one. At least, if there was a sound of some kind, now there just didn't lay even the slightest sliver of a bell. No sweat came or hit the ground as he walked. With the torch in his hand, it was obvious that now he only needed to find the right direction on where to go towards. 'Do you think every one of those entrances above has a monster like the kind we've seen?' Strangely, Ian was doing, more or less guesswork than anything else. 'I'm not sure of it Tom.

Something's about it that I dare not think it has. But we would rather have to think that if we're to get out safely without a scratch. 'The thing of which they were both aware by now that it wasn't quite possible. The various stones and the fall had already made him take that rugged appearance of a rugged boy. Now, this looked the most dangerous. Rooms that were taller and at the level of the ground. Whatever dimly lit this entire thing didn't travel far enough, leaving the complete violent darkness forth. 'I have to risk it, Ian, there's no other way. Can you feel that as well?' The cold wind was even colder coming from there. With only a problem being the fact that this temple was sunken, which they realised it barely just now. With a flash of the light, they looked just how bad it was. Going down wasn't the rightest of ideas or the brightest as a matter of fact. 'Whatever happens, I'll stand beside you, Tom. 'The boy nodded as they both passed the pillars and the stones, bearing through the halls. Pillars and broken vases had become the recurring thing. Despite the fact that they still stood there, perhaps it was clear that not everyone was prepared for this. 'What could be the reason for the growth of these roots? I'm not able to see any possible explanation for it. 'As much as he desired that, it was clearly a thing of foulness which bore them through. 'Don't look at the corpses boy. 'Tom wanted to look away though the image of it just took him by surprise. Various corpses were entangled by the roots and taken below if they were lucky enough. Others had roots just grown through them, disintegrating, slowly at least in the process. It was a mess, especially the cracks which laid on the walls, that had destroyed whatever writings had once been. 'You know it may become even more dangerous than this, right?' Slowed, afraid, hungry and tired, he felt at least. It was a deep question now, whenever or not this was a dream. This must be, it. . . The thought of it wasn't as sharp, just as he raised a hand close to the flame and felt the heat through his skin. 'It's real, but it couldn't be. 'Let's escape and think about it later. 'Such was that they went even deeper until entering a room that had been entirely encompassed by roots. Specially grown in this certain way, it didn't block the passage leading forward, or below. Somehow it had grown around everything, including the grand coffins and what would've been once the armoury. 'Even more of those here? What sort of people would bury their dead everywhere they found?' Not even he knew had a clue, but so far, it appeared to be bleak. With one hand going forward and slightly crouching, he had done his best not to start a fire. Seeing how those roots were starting to rot as well, the fate of this temple was certainly sealed. 'This may be it boy, a way out. 'Ian said after noting that they had reached a pair of stairs, leading to a somewhat rising room. There were other tunnels standing by the side, but nothing could beat the sight of having to rise above everything. 'Could that be?' 'Light, Tom, I see it by a hole. 'A stone wall laid there, covered with what would seem like mounds of dirt and rubble from the looks of it. He started pushing it until he finally saw the exit. Right off the ground, Tom came without a doubt scared and confused, looking behind and seeing that he came out somewhere, lost between the plants. Tom had confused artificial light with the natural daylight as he came out and escaped. He had already unwrapped the coiled cog and stopped it from going. Another pair of lights which were left by those explorers and miners. 'We need to snick back on the ship before someone notices. 'Half snoring and dazed, confused at it, his eyes took a while to adopt again. 'Wait, boy, cover the entrance before someone notices where you came out from. We can't have people come stooping around where they aren't supposed to go. Think of the consequences and of the fact they wouldn't be as lucky. 'Frowning at it and stooping down, Tom was still caught by his feelings. Not only was he not aware but he wanted to stop and lay to sleep. But dirt after dirt, in his hands, started filling the hole. Soon there'd be no way to tell past the grass level that there even was an entrance there. Despite the fact that Ian knew that there it might lay spread anywhere, he knew that the boy had earned his rest. 'Return Tom, to the ship, it's waiting for you down there. 'Past what seemed to be the city gate. Again, there wasn't any guard to be called or stay. If it wasn't for the mere fact that the various boxes didn't look like pillows, he would've fallen on them for certain. 'Keep on, we're almost there. 'His numbed legs almost managed to crush something under them, at least until they both reached the stairs. That's when it happened for them to stumble and to stand. 'We almost fell. Be careful boy. 'Though Tom refused to listen or do anything of the sort. From the likes of it, he still couldn't think straight and feel forms that weren't supposed to be there. Dark passages that laid inside the walls, still bearing the damned signs and coffins. Atop of that, he still carried the lantern, though there wasn't any light in it. 'There, just go on ahead and sleep there. 'As the door opens, he saw no one at the top of the ship, making it seem obvious that the driver wasn't there yet. From the looks of it, Zeppelin was the only one in an unnatural state. He made it seem like he was trying to imitate sleep. And there came the problem, which silenced both him and the crow. 'The two of us are already standing there. 'Said Tom, being as far as he knew the first one to say something about this entire conundrum. Fear ran amock, what could they be?'Has someone taken or places now?'Both of which almost jumped at the sight of an involuntary jerk from the boy. Despite sleeping, he acted normal. So was Zeppelin, making it seem like there was certainly no care for the second pair he was attached to. It needed no sleep from what little they knew of it. Despite that, it was certain that one of them couldn't be. 'We need to get out and say nothing of is. "Yes, Tom, come outside and close the door behind. 'As he did so, making it certain that there wasn't any distraction or that they woke up the others, he suddenly started wriggling out. Certainly, he wasn't hurt, from the likes of it, just confused and afraid. 'There's something we need to do now, just run outside. Trust me on this. 'Despite what his heart told him, there just wasn't any way he'd stand in this place, now that he knew what was going on inside of there. One of them was more than enough for a crow, but this was far too crowded for a murder. As they made their way back, it had happened close to the middle of the night, from the looks of it at least. Something of his mind made him break something down there, just as he went past the bushes and the green. Straight to the point where he fell on himself and suddenly fell asleep, hidden away from the eyes of the stumbling fools. It came only as a whisper, though the crow said. 'We will return the gem in the morning, understood?'With that, they both had fallen as victims to the plague of slumber. It was a harsh night, cold but also warm from others. From the coming of the morning, Tom woke up seeing how the man who laid on the captain seat was ready to go on already with the platform. 'What's going on?'Protested the boy, having not even be awakened by it. 'Oh, good, you're awake. 'It wasn't the tone he thought he'd hear, henceforth, he was quite surprised. Still, the bitterness of having to go through the same dream of rowing and of the murder of the crows. 'Had a good night Tom?'Whispered Ian as he came out to throw a look. He was merely lucky that there wasn't anyone turned towards him to see him come. 'Good enough, but. . . Pardon me if I may be rash, but what about the ship?'Oh, we got what we were looking for, a special delivery, even faster than expected. "But the miners? And you left as well. There was that thing too now. "Relax boy, it's in the past, we're still going to get some unavoidably long stops now so no need to fret over it. The man smiled at that, to say the least. 'Now, don't mind this request again, but how about that drink, now?" 'It's barely morning sir. "That's true lad, an even better reason to do it now rather than wait until I'm manoeuvring this and I'm drunk. Isn't that right?" This did certainly press itself into a problem, though the boy accepted. And just as the light of day reached past the brushes of green and tall trees, another woke up crawling towards the mound he made. No one was around since they were preparing to go on their journey towards the next spot. 'Tom, what are you doing now? 'We can't return like this. 'Both Ian and Tom appeared to be certainly tired and the worst they had appeared. But as it came at once, Tom said to the crow. 'Listen, Ian, I tried to look around inside my clothes. The gem disappeared, we need to find it before the ship leaves, or else we may not get the attention of the king. 'It's true. 'The crow knew it to be that way. What followed was a gust of dust when they well pulled inside.

It appeared that the boy had dug in the wrong hole and managed to go far too deep into a different part of the underground tunnel. Without guidance, he was lost and confused. There laid no one to help him around nor even tell him whenever he was going the wrong way or not. 'Ian, where are you?' Tom howled at the loss of his companion. He laid somewhere in the darkness, lost without the ability to fly. Could there even be a darker fate than that? I need to find the lamp as fast as possible, thought the boy. Without denying the fact that he was fearful of what he'd find once the lamp ignited, he went on ahead. There were better days he could've thought of but this wasn't one of them.

A giant mummified beast, such as the one that chased them laid shoved in the ruins of one of their burial holes. It appeared as if this lowly slave creature was no exception to their burial rituals. At least, that's how it seemed so far.

Tom stumbled to his feet and looked around at rubble. He was in tears after being left alone, without Ian, without Zeppelin and certainly without the gem that they have decided to return for. For all the intent they had, this was a failure, for every side involved. Seeing how this would turn up like, he went ahead and turned his head towards the only thing he knew there laid for him. The tunnels. He'd run through and shout, going on as far as his lungs could go on ahead, until that point where he realised that his shouting was heard. All the voices ran silently when there came that blind-like beast from above and fell in the great chamber where the statues laid. It saw the light and grabbed the child. Though there was no one around or strictly above to see this entire ordeal happening, it went on as quickly as it could. Tom stopped on his way from the deck. 'What is, boy?' Asked Ian as he peered with his claws around the gem. Something was felt by him as well if he was determined to do so. Certainly, something of grandeur would come and bring them home, it had to be so. 'What was that?' 'Are you all right Tom? You don't appear to be out of the water yet. 'I'm. . . I'm well. There's something which seems like it's missing from me and I can't explain what. 'As far as he could tell, that might've been quite common for them, seeing how everyone was just done loading everything on the ship and being ready to go as well. 'We're leaving lad, better go inside before the wind blasts the ship again. There's word of the storm. "Again?" The woman growled as she returns back to arranging the tall boxes and the barrels. Apparently, they were all set on the initiative of grabbing, moving and trying everything to the ship. The most expensive was chained at least with a good pair of good iron chains. Segments ran with as many of those as possible. 'Better head inside and give this to him. 'Below his chin, Ian nodded and kept gazing at the boy. 'You don't think something's happened, do you?' 'What could it possibly have happened now? We're going to rescue that girl, whenever you want it or not. 'That arrogance and trust made him feel better, at least for the likes of him. He was proud to go on saying he could possibly rescue the girl and keep his promise. Certainly, nothing would stop him now. As well as that went on the ruins laid there once again abandoned, with the lost boy and his pet crow being lost. No one had seen them come and go, and no one ever will. 'There you go, old man. "Here's something for your delivery boy, don't spend it all in one go. 'The ship-captain gave him a small round coming of silver. Real silver, big for his hands alone to hold, the shine of which got Ian's attention right through the curtain of his shirt. "Lad, you'd do better to strap yourself to that chair now, we may be leaving sooner than expected. "Why is that?Did they really finish what they were doing so fast?'After the downed the pint, there wasn't any going around. 'No lad, that's not the reason though. That sky beast, another damned one is coming. And it's so close to where another male of its species had been. "What's that supposed to mean?"Tom could see the presence of concern in the old man's eyes. It was clear that something was going to go on and there was little to nothing which they could do to stop it. 'Please lad, just get in your chair and strap yourself to it. I can't seem to stress that enough already. There'd be great danger coming and I'd rather not have you be part of it if you understand. "I understand sir. 'As he went off ahead, there came the noise from above. People were already arguing about this and that, going as far as throwing things and making loud noises. 'Boy, let me see that coin now. Show it to me now and don't try tricking me or else. 'There was a silent threat that came on, just as the clouds were forming in the distance. 'What's that there?'It wasn't obvious from the driver seat, in which his entire view appeared to be modified by the glass. The man couldn't see as far the boy could in that far away spot, as much being clear. Tom had to get his attention yet again. 'What's that over there captain?"Boy, I can't see anything you're pointing at. "Come and taken in a seat then. 'As he cleared the seat, the man decided to leave at once and accept this challenge, seeing how the boy appeared to have seriousness tied to his face. To say this, the man trusted the boy had nothing to do with it. Rather than anything else, he was still dizzy from the drink, which made him slightly more subservient than he was necessary. 'Now, do you believe me?'As he took the seat, the same one the boy took, his eyes widened. Far in the distance, it appeared like the clouds were being pulled inside a small point, a ball-like thing. 'You're right lad, there might be another beast coming in our direction. Damned things are trying to get a jump on us when we're least expecting it. 'He was grinding his teeth in no time, unaware of the fact that they were still watching. Lumping into one that was in the air was harsh, but not one that was moving. 'This means bad trouble if you understand. We need to prepare for immediate departure. 'The scruffy man lifted himself by the collar and darted towards his desk. When he arrived there, another alarm came to be, his own thing. He laid there unaware of what had happened, being prepared to say. 'Boy. "Tom's the name. "Tom, stay in that seat now and wrap yourself up. I think I may need your help in this one if you think you're capable of doing it. 'Immediately came a nod and the thing of excitement became present. Being called useful by the captain. 'We might even cut our time by a lot because of this. 'Whispered Ian. In truth, he was just as afraid as everyone else on the ship. The size of the clouds was enough to make it appear that behind them laid a beast twice their size. A frightful thing would come to be and there was no denying in it. So much fear had come to be since the alarm hadn't stopped, people started recognising and seeing the change which happened in the air. 'Another one of those?'Filthy breed, they just won't stop coming into being and disturbing my work. If I had just a harpoon with me or a spear to throw at it, I'd show it. "Calm down and let's pack before it comes even closer. 'Someone on the deck still had the guts to follow orders.

They were the last three left there to finish the job, being more of a personal endeavour than anything of value. Each of them was carrying boxes, or pushing barrels with their personal jewellery or merchandise, whatever they used for storage. One, in particular, had his barrel full of fish, though he hadn't the time to tie it properly, waiting until the last moment to do so. 'Let's go, let's go, let's go! It's going to be too late already. 'Shouted one of the men who stood inside a storage room. There were two others there with him, just as the other houses or trade buildings were occupied by a few. 'If we wait any longer, there won't be any more of a place for us to go to. You'll be hugging that barrel all the way down towards the ocean. 'Her job did nothing to calm the men down, despite the fact that she was already done. So was the man who stood beside her, leaving the only man who still waited on the deck stranded. At least, to say, stranded with a barrel filled with fish. Hard to lift and push around, he saw how the clouds would start becoming dark once again. When the first sign of a strong lightning bolt came, he cowered down and looked in fear. There'd be no saving him now unless he let go of his barrel. 'Come on already, it's getting too late you fool. 'The wooden pillar which stood there, holding the ship suddenly got smashed by the strongest gust of wind that came. It felt like the wind had a will of its own and it desired them to stop waiting for this to happen. Everything around started being destabilised, as for the man. His barrel started pushing him around, being a lot harder, heavier and impossible to control. 'Wait, I can do it, just let me be. I will be able to return. 'But before he could say anything, the man who had grabbed his barrel had fallen, once the alarm stopped. Everyone who stood by their doors and peered looked in terror how he fell off the ship. 'That damn fool!' One shouted. 'Since there was no one standing on the deck and it was getting dangerous, the men on the ship started clicking their signals. At once, the captain received a small bright pale yellow light which made him stop the alarm. He looked behind to make sure that the lad was strapped to the chair as he started the ship. 'Hold on tight now. We're going to descend deeper into the clouds. 'They cut through and pushed away, making it seem like they weren't even going to care about what laid hiding in those clouds. In its full might, the boy could only see that dark belly with a cut. A beast that went into battle and survived, cutting the very clouds, still dripping its dark-found blood. Floundering and snorting around the air, something cold, a gas came into being. 'Try to bear with its stench lad, that's something none of us can really do anything about. 'It was only increasing in intensity the more they got exposed to it. Though from the likes of it, there just wasn't any way around. The ship just fell through the clouds and stood there, slowly drifting in any direction that they thought it'd do. 'Just pay attention and tell me what you're seeing from there, understood?' Tom nodded, though unaware of just how dangerous one of them, being so close could become. It was apparently a fully grown adult from the likes of it. Coiling from it, at it went, a few tentacles grabbed small pieces of clouds and held them wrapped as it continued. 'It started grabbing clouds. "That's a bad thing lad, we need to get lower. "What's trying to do with them?" "Have you ever seen a lightning bolt boy? The flash of light that comes and sparks and has the ability to break the land? Tress spark and get cut in half, stones get crushed and people die with only a touch. "I remember. 'He saw in his memory, how it would come during rains, though there wasn't any need for any. It's been so long since he felt the cold drops falling on his face and felt the cold embrace during the summer. Somehow, it brought mesmerising memories just for the mere fact that he was glancing at that and thinking. A bolt came suddenly, small and jittering. From the looks of it, a tentacle dropped clouds, letting it become a bolt on its way down. It almost broke to the glass and came close to blinding the man from the mere distance it came from. Pain ran through and he yelled as far as he could. No one but Tom could've heard him, though the people who were staying above of them had their own problems. Looking out the closed windows and chained doors, some saw the bolt falling and looked above. That wriggling thing still hid inside the clouds and bore its hatred for its own kind. Behind, far above, the furthest people who occupied the tallest floors, looked past the crown of the sky and saw another heading its way. 'Another one's coming!' She yelled, at the sound of which, every door that was slightly open immediately got shut off. This was without a doubt no joking manner as two of the beasts were prepared to go into a fight with one another. Immediately after the sight, the lady that noticed it lifted the small receptor and almost made the captain's ear to fall off. 'Another one, there's another one and it isn't far behind. "I understand. 'Tom noticed that the clouds around them were becoming grey, darker and some in the distance were already black. Lightning bolts came from them as well, though there wasn't any sight of it. 'That's a tail, I'm sure of it, in the distance!' Yelled Tom, once he noted of that, the man tried his best to focus, though as far ends went, he couldn't see that well enough. 'Which means that there are at least three of them lurking around in the sky. 'The man started pushing his beard and struggling to look for any other way. That was a big crack all over the window, one which came from a small bolt that shouldn't have meant anything to any other ship. But the damage was irreversible. To top that there was another. 'We need to descent even deeper lad, so hold as tightly as possible. "Won't there be a storm. "Ian, listen to me, don't move and stand in your seat, this may be the best thing that happened. 'All of the sudden, the sound of metal came from the deck, its ringing being far too loud to be unrecognisable. Something was dragging the ship. 'It's one of those limbs, it doesn't have a cloud but a chain wrapped around it. 'That dark sight, being dragged into a battle would mean death for all of them. The captain started the alarm and forced the ship to fight against that strength without a doubt of defiance. To no avail, as they were ready to go on and force themselves on their knees. 'Someone has to go on deck and pull out the chain. I repeat, someone has to go on deck and pull out the chain!' The men looked and saw just how high it had been lodged, against a piece of the roof, by the tallest building that laid about. A decision such as this, making their houses out of iron came to backfire at last. It worked against them once every onlooker realised that the chain was attached to a part of the roof. Too many looked in fear to act. 'We need to go and do something before it's too late. "You're just a boy, stand in your seat lad. Wait you'll get yourself killed if you. . . 'Tom left before the captain got his chance to finish his sentence. All three of them waited at the bottom of the stairs, having to go through. 'Tom, is that a drawer I see? Open it for me. 'There laid a door which was apparently left unlocked, just by the stairs. 'Of course, I find this now. 'A small raincoat waited there, black and making him feel like he was covered by the belly of a snake. 'Are you all right Ian? Can you breathe through this?' The awkward silence almost reminded him of the fact that most of Ian's organs were screwed. He couldn't possibly breathe even if he had desired to do it so. 'Right, excuse me for that. 'As for what was about to follow, it was obviously something he didn't truly think of. At least, so to say, he didn't desire to tell him about his small aggression. 'Wait here Zeppelin, I'm afraid you couldn't possibly help us on a wet platform and all. You'd only fall off the ship. I promise I'll take you on the next time we go. 'There was no one on the deck when they arrived, being for a good reason, to say the least about it. Clearly, most of them had some sense to them if it meant not falling off. Everything was tilting back and forth, though he couldn't get his cold feet now. Not with that. 'Look, Tom, just mighty it is, wriggling in the sky, dragging us off. "This isn't the right time to admire it, Ian, we're all in danger in case you haven't noticed. 'Right as he said, he was almost thrown back into the hole, coming close to falling on the stairs. Tom grabbed the edge and stopped himself, making sure to propel himself a few inches forth. 'We're doing this. 'He said and tumbled on his own, taking each step with care, tilting himself not to fall even further than he had already. As it learning from his mistakes, he was forced to the door and found the right building. 'This is it"Look, boy, the window at the top, we just need to get through. 'The violent knocking didn't stop and from the other side, no one would've guessed it was a boy. 'Let me in at once. 'Without a question, when his voice began to yell, they immediately opened the door. It was a man and a woman who were almost standing behind the stove, frightened at what was going on. 'What's the matter?Get inside before the wind gets you, boy. 'With a pull, she closed the door behind and got ready to get a towel. 'It won't be needed ma'am, I only came to use the top floor and window. 'Once they heard that, they both looked at the boy peculiarly. At least, making it seem so. 'You can't do that, you'll be taken by the wind and fall off the ship. 'Despite both of the attempts which followed, Tom explained the fact that there wasn't any other way. That chain would certainly drag them into the very eye of the storm, perhaps gripping and ripping the ship apart on its way. 'Fine, what do you need then?"With their assistance, though he hadn't expected it to happen, he has wrapped around with a rope, just in case, he'd fall. It was a long rope, laid on the top floor, held by both the woman and her husband. Assured that he wasn't going to fall, he went on ahead and opened the window. The wind was still just as strong as it came in without any pressure from the sky. The rain came through, leaves and small other insignificant things that might've come in his eyes. It was only now that he realised just how dangerous all of this truly was. At least, as it came to obvious ears, he had to get close to one of the slaps which he had grabbed with both of his hands. From below, the man gave him a boost and held tightly, only so that the wind wouldn't have taken him on the way. 'We're on top Ian, I can see the chain. "Hold as tight as possible on the roof tiles and don't let go of them. 'There was just enough space between them and around to be grabbed. As he reached one and held, he pushed himself one another. It was then that his foot got inside the space of one that laid behind and he stabilised himself. That damned storm will take the boy if he's not careful enough. 'Watch out Tom. 'A small stone came from one of those wriggling things and broke off against the metal that laid on the roof. Clearly, something was going wrong now but he wasn't about to admit it to himself or to the crew. There wasn't any turning back without that chain taken off. 'We're just in reach of it, close to it. 'Said Ian, just as he laid as a witness to the progress. There was plenty more, but the chain laid so close, barely wrapped around, pushed inside. 'There. What now?"It looked as if he needed more force than he had at his disposal. 'We need you to pull it off, can't you see that the tiles are barely holding it now?Its strength will be its greatest weakness now, just give it a push. 'Tom started pushing the chain but to no avail. The boy wasn't forceful enough to do it. 'Try again, we can't return unless we get rid of it. 'Suddenly a voice came from below. "Hold on tight, I'm coming as well. 'Leaving his wife behind to hold both of them there, her husband was already in the process of climbing the rope. His raincoat and gloves protected him from both the rain and the risk of falling off the roof. The first sight of Tom was him laid around the chain, trying to make it budge, only to see that his attempts came to no avail. 'I'm almost there, just hold onto it. 'Still, a man in his prime, came to the rescue, holding onto the rope, reaching the boy who still had no idea how they could possibly unwrap this. 'Don't worry about it. "But we can't push it, it's far too strong. "I said don't worry boy, it might be the strength that's pulling us, but we can outlast it at least. That's a man-made chain, not made by the beast. It might've grabbed it from somewhere else, but look at it, how each of the segment's being coiled around and ready to burst. For that reason alone I bought this. 'It was a small cutting tool, actioning as a precision cutter, just in case things like this might happen. He laid just by the side of the boy, holding on the rope as well. Tom just stepped back as well, not to be reached by the recoil of the chain once it snapped. Now came the real challenge. The man stooped low and started working with his small machine, starting the process which would cut at last. Sparks became clear in the rain, as their reflection bounced against each drop until then. 'Look, Tom, it started giving in. 'Announced the crow after seeing the sight. A piece of it was already deeply pushed and cut through, slowly making it melt. 'There, it should not start disintegrating on its own, let me just get down and I'll pull you in. 'He hurried on his way below, making it seem like in a few moments he'd just disappear. Left alone, he watched in fear, thinking of the consequences that'd be once the damn thing popped in. That recoil would crush his head or at least bash him off the ship, with or without the rope. 'Boy, this seems like it's getting dangerous to stay. 'Curiously he seemed to notice as well, just how much it started danging back and forth, throwing small pieces like shrapnel around. Part of it was coming down far too fast for him to think of a way out. 'Come down kid, I'm done. 'Shouted the man and as he did so, he felt a pull around his body. Despite being unaware of it, he was slowly slipping off the roof, being pulled inside. 'You can hurry on your own, just get to safety, boy. 'What he didn't think of wasn't the fact that the chain alone would hurt him, but something else was about to come. Lowered by the roof, his feet fell into the air, only to be grabbed by the family who lived below. The same one which pulled him in for cover and protection. 'Thanks, what's going on?' Both of them held him tight as they stood against the wall, almost in a kneeling position. 'We need to embrace for this, it won't be safe for the ship once that chain snaps. I believe we may be free falling below, in the best case scenario. 'Though it didn't take long for that to happen, at least, as they watched and heard. Ding, came sound as the chain was ripped and bounced against the roof. It was almost as if the entire ship stopped for a moment and was heading below rather than straightforward. The winds were unforgiving now. As they watched everything being launched into confusion and the engines stopping for a moment, getting closer to the ground, it was then that the captain sounded the alarm. Inside the buildings, everyone stood by one another and looked in shock as the alarm went on and stopped. Before they reached any dangerous altitude, the engines finally started again. Full on power, the ship regains composure, though they were already far too close to the storm for anything to be forgiven anymore. Through it, a line of storms was made by the wriggling beast, the same one that chained the ship and momentarily dragged it on the hunt. 'We're safe now. Are you all right honey?' The two lovers stood by and watched, though it wasn't long until Tom was heading below. 'Wait, kid. 'He turned around before getting ready to go down the stairs and head to the level below. 'Thanks for helping us, I wouldn't have figure the ship was chained if it weren't you. 'Giving a slight nod, he made it to the platform and rightly so, below. Zeppelin was waiting past the stairs, looking mightly surprised on how both a crow and a child managed to do it so. 'You waited for us, haven't you?' A patch of steam came close to his brow. It was warm, enough to make his face get close to being hot. The same appeared about everything else about the place in a better day. 'Let's go to the captain, I've still got a request. 'Wet and drenched, he threw his coat to the side. As he went on, there was only one thing in his mind, reaching the majesty without any other stop. For he waited as well for his bride, which was very much alive. Standing on his throne, his giant citadel of a city waited. Parts of it were still being sent to salvage whatever remained of the world. 'Your Majesty. 'A voice said, in his hall of torn pieces, burnt and devastated. His hall was once pure, during a time of peace when the world was still erect. 'Speak worm, though make it fast, I tire easily. 'Other than the eighteen guards which stood by each pillar in the room, most of which being hid in the dark, the man was alone. Alphonse, a poor servant tried watching past him though failed in his attempt. There wasn't anything to peer by. He always wore that damned armour around his body, with that wicked helmet which had horns. And the matter of the fact was that they weren't the normal kind of horns. No, rather they were a special thing made for impalement, to say the least. One that brought nightmare on prolonged exposure. And the man stared, gazed and tried taking his eyes away, making it seem far too mesmerising than it was already. 'Well, did you need something?' 'The preparations are complete your majesty, she is on her way. "Good, I'll be expecting her in a few months. "Your majesty, that would be quite, well, it's too short of a gap for her to arrive in the city. Not to mention that there are plenty of. "Silence fool and listen to my will, for my will is your command and you must obey!" That thing appeared to grab around the ears, straight to the neck and make him cower at least as he appeared to be frightened by that voice. As he said it, as well, he didn't even bother to get up. The power of his voice was enough to make the poor man stumble on his feet while he was on his way out. A face that spoke enough words of fear and distaste laid on his face. 'Why must I deal with this kind of incompetence here?' Each generation had a tiny bit of defiance lying in them, that was certain. The king thought as he took a look through his sky cubes. The sky was being taken over by beasts that were beyond his control. Yet again something which had come against him to raise his people in disobedience. What would they say if they saw the beasts? Aren't you the king that prevented the dawn of men? You were supposed to be our protector, not a coward hiding in his den. 'Damn them all, damn them to the most hellish depths there are. 'His hand ran over his helmet, covering a part of his face. For this action alone wasn't thoroughly enough for him to go on and ignore the plea. 'Call in the peasants then, let me hear what they have to say. 'At his command, a giant armoured being started moving towards the one which stood at the door. The king rolled his eyes at the entire process. It was only after the command came from one to another that the one at the door opened it. 'Are you done with your play?' Immediately, the next peasant came into the room, trying his best to stumble, nor to fall on his feet. He was dressed and acted, smelled, yet the stench of the commoner hadn't left his body. 'What do you beseech of me now?' 'Oh, yes my lord, if you ask what I want. Well, I've got a problem, my lord. 'It would be my majesty, damn simpleton should be just carried off and thrown at the edge of the town if I had it my way. That thing about him really felt bad on the hindsight. Fools and peasants coming just thinking they could insult their king. 'Go on already, didn't you see the line outside?' 'I did my lord. Oh, my king, your kindness. Well, one of my sheep got stolen, you see? It happened yet again, stolen right under my nose and the nose of my guard dog. That's where the problem comes from. "Is that all? Am I supposed to be impressed by the theft of some simpleton's sheep?" 'My king, I mean no offence but those were my sheep there, and it's really strange how they disappeared. "What do you expect me to do? We live in a land of harshness and hardness without green and any kind of pasture. That's no life for you to hold a flock of sheep. "I know my king, but, like I said, the way they were stolen is strange, perhaps too strange for me to tell the guards about it. "And how might that be?" 'I think it was one of that wriggling sky beats that came and feasted on my sheep. 'At the entire idea and the absurdity of that, the king's hands just strapped themselves to the chair. His feet sprang and he suddenly stood straight. 'What are you implying here little man?' He dawned him, standing as tall as they came, being perhaps the tallest man one could've ever laid his eyes upon, which spoke much of his stature. 'I asked you a question, now if I may receive my answer and you could be on your way. "It's true, no one believed me but I'm speaking the truth now. The captain of the guards didn't want to check my yard but there are marks. "Marks of what exactly?" Black spots on the ground, for each time it came to steal a sheep, it hurled a lightning bolt and smote the ground under the spot. "This may be quite intriguing. 'Said the king and his gauntlet almost squeezed the life out of the poor man's cheeks. 'Indeed, I believe that we may just have something if what you're telling turns out as being true. "Guard, go and bring me the captain of the guards. You, open the door. Which leaves us with. ' 'Me your. "Careful how you address to me, you've done just enough damage already. 'His grip grew tighter just as the sweating peasant tried his best to remember, just how he had offended. It became obvious once he thought of the times he eavesdropped at the entrance of the throne room. 'Your majesty?" Good boy, now begone! I've got other matters to attend to. 'As he released his grip, one opened the door and another one went through. One man wouldn't look a second time at the sight of the king's guards due to the size and bulk they had. The other mention to be told would be about how easily they moved, whoever laid in the armour, despite the obvious heavyweight they bore. Without a doubt, if the simpleton had stood more than that he would've been thrown out, with or without a head. Regardless of which choice, it wasn't up to him, hence he ran through and thanked. 'Your Majesty. 'Patronising little fool, but he might be useful if it doesn't turn out to be a charade. Before being prepared to call in the next fool, one had cut through the line and ignored every single one of them. The outrage had ended as she turned, revealing herself as the lady of the bent towers. With one glance, especially one which came from the guards which accompanied her, everyone went silent. They were shocked and surprised. Usually, the nobles ones thought they were far too good to be waiting in a line. At least, this was true to some extent, though not everyone fell into that category. Such behaviour was certainly wrong and unaccepted but soon dismissed by the people once they recognised power. Being left inside, she had to follow the same condition as everyone else. Not that they stood a chance against the guards the king had. Beyond the size difference and the bulk, they were known to be able to take at least ten or twenty swordsmen one their own. And some even couldn't even lay a scratch. With a nod from them, the lady of the bent towers came inside unaided, after the two men stood by the door, glaring at the peasants. 'Greeting your majesty, I may desire to make myself acquainted. 'She followed it with a bow, though the king was left unamused. He looked and felt surprised at what came next, a needly desire, a command, something that she needed and wanted. 'I'm aware that you're in the process of seeking a bride for yourself, isn't that correct?' The thing of which had to be a secret that needed to be utmostly kept beyond any ear and doubt. 'How did you find out girl?' It was still enough of a difference for him to be an entire line of generations beyond her, though, in truth, the ones he looked after were quite vile and young. 'Then you're here to propose, little girl?' The arrogance could be felt just as he lifted himself and started walking by her. It didn't take long for her to lift herself by the skirt and stand her ground. 'And what makes you think I'd be interested in you when my options are far wider and closer to what I truly desire. "Well, for once, your majesty. 'As she said so, she appeared to be brushing past him and just as she did so, it was revealed just how much she knew of it. 'For once, people wouldn't start a riot after finding out how vile. "Bite your tongue wench! I could have you flayed alive for the very insolence. 'This was a thing that had a stench of a gamble, as obviously as it appeared to be. She hadn't fear in her eyes, but a desire to know what he was intending. 'Go then, say what you came here to say. 'The king continued, holding onto something sharp that could've cut through her at any time. 'But watch your words. "I meant no offence your majesty, but I was merely concerned for yourself, nothing. As someone who's interested in another should be. "You know of my choice of bride, don't you?"I've had a glimpse or two. 'She revealed though this was something that had pierced her gut one way or another. 'And I might say, it's not the best choice you might've made your majesty. 'Her eyes tried piercing through the helmet to see his face, though the darkness had swallowed what remained. Just what did he look like under all that armour and that helmet of his?No one managed to pull it off in a long time. It was almost sealed to his body. 'I'm just trying to do my best, your majesty, and make sure the people won't be outrage once they find out. 'And as she started listing it as if it was nothing, she moved in a circle around him. 'Too young' Came the first whisper, which managed to come through his ear. 'Barely breathing. 'Then the second one that made him finally feel like shivering. It was almost as if this was nothing but a mistake he had taken in a most delusional state. 'Pale and white. 'The third whisper which prepared for one final blow, one of which would bring the final strike he'd get. 'Dead. "But she moves, I'm certain of it. 'The king was immediately cut off by her simple concern in the matter. 'She's cursed my king, nothing more than that. She died but touched the ground, abolished by the fate that might've swallowed all of us if you might've not saved us all. Oh, what will we do if people find that out, your majesty?The outrage, the fear!"It. . . It must stop, are you certain of that as being true?"Oh, but there's nothing else I could be more certain if I wanted to, your majesty. "I've got to think it through then. "I'll be waiting in my towers, oh, if you ever change your mind. 'With that, she left untouched and unmolested, going out like a flower in a land of tall green devourers. 'Open the door for her. 'Ordered the king and as it went, she gave one look at him. 'Don't forget what I said. "Wait, you haven't told me what you wanted. "Perhaps on our next meeting your majesty, perhaps then. 'She went out and the door closed. The king went on ahead and sat on his throne, beyond and thought, taking one of his skyboxes and crushing it under his gauntlet. Damn thing, how could I have been such a fool?"Using those damn creatures and taking one such as her?"This had to come to an end. Thought the king. Past his door and beyond his innermost fortification went the lady walking past everyone in the city. Two fine guards by her side, truthfully, not strong enough for them to take a royal guard, but anyone else down the ladder didn't even bother looking at them. 'Volgar, Urum, may I please be left for a moment?"But lady Katherine, we cannot. "It's just a moment, I needn't be seen with the two of you for now. 'She went around the corner, barely looked at them on the side. It was an interesting thing she noticed, at last, a royal hulking thing and the captain of the guards. What could he be up to now?What could it possibly be?Her lips were immediately wet from her tongue, as she could feel the moisture in the air. This was certainly going to be an interesting turn. At least, now that she knew something was going on, beyond whatever he might want to do. 'I've had enough of this place, we may return to the bent towers now if we're done stooping around. 'The two men nodded their heads and began to follow her once again. For most of the part, the fact that she was a lady wasn't even present in her appearance as much as in the way she spoke and looked at people. And there also laid that air about her. A thing that wasn't supposed to come to the noses of the commoners, that she'd thought of it. Large oxen carts being dragged around the town, something was indeed on its way. 'I've always hated those dirty creatures. 'The lady spoke in a tone which bore through the men and returned no reply. 'Well my lady, we cannot just go on ahead and kill them. It would be as worse as killing a horse or a mule in terms of the law. "But what if the pay was good enough for it?"Then perhaps we wouldn't do it in public. 'Said Volgar with a grin. The scars across his face didn't leave much warmth upon any attempt he had to grin or smile, making it seem like a rather improvised thing than anything else. 'Very well then, let's just observe for now. Tell me if there's something that grabs your eye. 'As she did so, both of them started looking like a bunch of ants trying to get anything of the sort. Sugar, food, perhaps something other than the grains, no, those were for cover. Something was definitely hidden from her eyes, but what could it be? The thought alone drove her to want to find out, but without having to lift a finger or be direct about that. People didn't seem to mind the woman, despite the avoidance of the street she was on after seeing the two men standing beside her. With her beauty, this was certain, over the fact that at least two men would be fighting over her. Without offence, a younger lad, who would be doing his work, looked past another one's shoulder and thought. Could they be both trying to get her? She hadn't the looks for someone who'd hire men, henceforth, this was certainly peculiar. 'I've had enough, people will be starting to stare if we spend too much around. "Yes, my lady. 'Both of them followed her with immediate care after this discovery. Something which was soon covered once one of the people around the carts noticed as well. They might've been clever if it weren't for slipups from time to time. But those were iron rods and conductors which could be helpful against something. It seems as if the king is preparing for this coming menace, she thought as she made her way back to her towers. The wind was indeed, frankly, rather silent for the time being. Once the storm settled down, and once again, anchored on another island in the sky, this was the time for Tom. He took on the veil, this time taking Zeppelin with him and just as he waited and ate, they were up and away. 'This shouldn't be that dangerous to go around, kid, but don't get lost. "I won't, there's no need for me to get worried about now. 'But something did manage to make him wonder. The sight of the men on the bridge, with their mourning, faces as they watched as if something might arise. Despite the fact that their grim expressions spoke of so much, it appeared as if no one wanted to tell him what happened. Has something happened to someone? Did something disappear? Could something have fallen off? For every question, he was told not to bother, which eventually made him related to this barren island. Nothing laid on it but stone, dust, and the remnants of what used to be. Either an ancient town or a city, whatever it might've been, it was levelled down from the looks of it. With the presence of that, there appeared to be retreating into a mountain and a system of caves. There were two groups of people there which were different than the ones on the ship. A few were trying to carry stones and whatever they could find by digging with their tools. Judging from their clothes they might've been living there. And dirty as grey and stone, none of which would bother even trying to talk to him or any of them. Everyone minded their business. At least until it came for the second group, which laid inside the caves, with torches, iron helmets and other mining equipment. 'Do you do that often?' Once he stopped sniffing around, he turned towards one of the stone pickers and asked him as it went. 'You're a child. 'The woman said, mightily surprised at the fact. Perhaps, it was the fact that compared to her, Tom had remained to clean, without any visible scratch that could be seen, or rather, anything of the serious sort. And his skin was pale but warm. Without asking, she started rubbing her hand, something of the sort of a tribal thing to get to feel the boy he was talking with. Tom gave nothing but a glance and pulled his cheek back. 'We don't do that from where I come from. 'This gave her an even stronger thing, that of which she didn't understand. 'I'm sorry. Don't mind me, I should get back to my work now. 'There was a slight notice from the others, but everyone had to pick their share until the night came. Rocks, stones, even small pebbles were taken. Despite wanting to explore the caves this was something he questioned more. 'Why are you standing here, how come you haven't tried to come on the ships that dock? Ships do dock here, don't they?" Life is good enough here, there's no reason to leave. And yes, boy, ships do come here. They take what they want, push us around and then leave with what they're due. 'Which had some bitterness to it, at least as it came to the obvious. 'I didn't mean to sound. "I'm busy, do you mind if you may leave me with my work?' As much as he sounded patronising, this was still far too important for her to do, rather than stand and talk to a child. Most of the people who laid around were old men, with her being the exception. 'How come you're not old?' 'How come you're such a bother boy?' "I mere asked nicely, that's all, I didn't mean to offend you or anything. "I'm busy, trying to pick stones with the elders" This went towards nothing, as he needed to go on ahead and try seeing what was happening inside. Though this bothered him more than he thought. Since nothing would come from her, Tom started walking in the darkness. Guided by nothing, he stumbled on rocks, crawled on the ground and started guiding himself by the only thing he could, the smell. There wasn't the usual light Zeppelin might've created in the darkness. Not to mention that neither Tom nor Ian could see a thing. 'Take a left Tom, I think it may be right. 'Go there, do that, the crow won't just shut up and let me handle this on my own. Thought Tom, though as much as he wanted to do as such, he still had far too much on his hands and knees. 'There's a light, not too long now, can you see it, boy?' "I can. "You should've gone with the others if you wanted to explore, now it might take far too long than we expected. "I should've known you wouldn't be able to handle yourself. 'It was the voice of the woman, or rather, now that he looked at her, she wasn't that much older than him. Within her hand laid the torch which illuminated his way and from the looks of the size of the bag behind her back, she was done picking stones. 'Well, are you going to stare or are you going to come?' "I'm coming, right away. 'Stumbling the boy used Zeppelin's back to lift himself up. 'Did your toy just grow?' "It isn't a toy and yes. Yes, it did, apparently, it does that in the darkness or at least in places that are partially dark. Though I wouldn't speak of it in an ill manner as it can hear and understand as much as anyone can. 'She raised her hands as a sign of surrendering. A puff of steam came and left just as fast, dissipating into the air. 'Well, do you want to see the excavation site?' "That's what I came here for, I think. 'With uncertainty, he let her get ahead of him, just enough for him to follow but not stumble on himself. Just like a puppy and a small machine, as little as he notes, he felt like he shrunk in shame as much as Zeppelin had. Only but now, could he see her alone and wonder. 'Why did you come here to help us?' "I couldn't let a stubborn boy go crawling and hurting himself inside the caves. You do realise that it's far too long a way for you to go alone, right?" The boy nodded as he followed. 'I'm Tom. "Ayles's my given name. "What's this place exactly then Ayles? So far, I've not come to many places such as this since I left home. "It's mainly just what you're about to see. A small town inside the caves. We're visited once and again by people who want to use or deep grottoes for mining. "What exactly? I've seen people on a mountaintop and they were just heading and taking rocks as well. "I don't think they would be taking rocks, silly boy. 'As she said it, a smirk was followed by a bit of laughter. As Ayles had shown him just around, more paces, she went on. 'It's what lays inside the rocks that they're most likely looking for. Diamonds, gems, metals and anything which could be used in its most primaeval state. "And what about you and those elders?' "Well, someone had to clean up after you people come and leave a damn mess every time you come around. 'Just as she finished, the entrance had become clear, lighted by giant glowing stones stuck in the wall held by giant statues. Now they laid at the epitome of beauty. A giant city of stone, which laid protected by a wall. Everything around it seemed to span towards the infinity, as far below as it went. 'Everything there?' "That's right.

'Answered Ayles as she looked at the shocked face of Tom. She even gave another glance one she saw the head of a crow just come out to peek at the sight. 'Everything was used for stone and minerals even before my people came here. A few generations back and you'd find stone pickers, bearers and miners down my line. Now I think you may wonder what do we use the small stones for, right?'But the boy was far taken back by the sight of how colossal the sight of it was. Taken abash, there were no words which could speak of her. 'Are you coming?'Oh yes, I am, sorry. "It might get hard for your little. 'Ayles pointed at the small machine, which already had problems going on its own. 'I'm sorry Zeppelin. 'That little thing threw out some fits of steam all the way back as he went through the darkness and at the point where he was always left. 'It seems to happen way too often that we send him back, he'll be fine I think. "If you say so. 'Said the girl after making way for them to go. As far as it went, it didn't take long to go across the bridge, not to mention that there was a guard standing at the city gate. 'He's with me. 'Said Ayles, and immediately one of the city guards stopped opening his mouth and opened the gate. It was nothing filled with grandeur, and the bridge was plainly safe from anything that fell. The small bars of stone around it prevented anyone from even trying that, same that could be said about the gate. When he finally entered the town, he was not disappointed to look upon their population. It was filled with legions swarming everywhere around. 'Did you?Is that sand, white sand?"Soft and there's no spot on it. It's a gift from the company, rough enough for us to carry heavy things of it and soft enough for us to grab it with your hands. 'As much as he didn't want to believe her, this appeared to be far too clean, no to mention that there wasn't any littering. There was another shock as well. Tom noticed that most of the houses around the area had at least two other levels on top of them. Tall with many roofs and pointed, created pillars on top. 'We discovered this abandoned city once and claimed it for our own. "You mean someone used to live in there?'Ayles nodded and pointed at the various inscriptions which laid on a tablet. It was the only one that laid around, apparently. Apparently, some matched and seemed rather curiously familiar to him. 'None of us could manage to decipher it, but whatever it might be, the common saying goes the way that it might've been left as a gift?"A city gifted, why would someone give off a city?"There went again that crow. Ian was quick to hide away once he noticed that woman following him. 'Gifted it might be a rather bad word, let's just say it was passed and we took it for our own. That's all. 'And about then, he started hearing whispers from the people which were walking around. Most of which were dressed tightly to cover them from the cold. Though neither Tom nor Ayles felt it momentarily. 'It takes a moment to adjust, we should both get dressed up if you plan to stay here for a while. "You don't mind showing me around, do you?"Ayles only smiled at that and carried on. Both of them were already inside, henceforth, they could already go on ahead and show him around. 'This would be the public chambers, take a coat and wrap it around. Somewhere in there, one of your sizes should lay just about the corner. 'There were plenty of boxes, tall and sturdy which stored them inside. Various scents of salient fear came from inside, among scent, it bred with the air. It was something about this coat that had belonged to a kid just like him which suddenly disturbed him. This made Tom threw this tainted blanket away and take another. An act that was brushed off by the woman as she tried lowering her backpack and dress up for herself. 'Tom, is the woman gone?'Ask Ian, without having bothered to head outside. 'She's out there, dressing, why?"I think she's following me, try turning around so she won't be able to see him. 'As ordered, Tom turned and did so, without having to worry about being peeked upon. The robe just went around his suit like another layer of armour, making him feel quite light. Without a mention, the cold started letting them know of their presence. 'We need to be careful around them, far too many people and Zeppelin aren't here to protect you boy. 'With a sudden lift, Ian tried looking past his shoulder but was only met by that peculiar glance coming out from the woman. She tried rubbing her eyes but suddenly the crow went back into hiding. 'Just don't try smothering me with that when you're dressing into it. "You know I wouldn't Ian, I just need to see what this town about and what's going on. We'll be back outside on our feet in no time, you'll see. 'Despite his best intention, Ian only growled and muttered like another animal. If one didn't know better, he'd bite. 'Wait, wait, you're doing it all wrong now. Let me. 'She was already dressed and made it seem like Tom didn't know anything he was doing. Two other men came by the side and started dressing, leaving as much as their picks on the ground, taking a pair out of the boxes. It was laughter under their moustaches, seeing how one of theirs was helping him like you'd help a child dress. 'You don't need to help me. "And you don't need to freeze to death down here. Now look and learn, you twist around the ankles so the cold won't have a way inside. 'Suddenly as she did so, the material appeared to close in by itself, making it appear a lot warmer than it was. 'Done, now, where were we?"Without even a break of any kind, she pulled the hood over her head and brushed right in-between the two men standing there, who were still watching at Tom in dismay. 'Are you coming to Tom?"On my way. 'These weren't the type of people he wanted to bother, at least not after noticing that bag of rocks. She was making her way towards one of the machines. Tall and obvious, one was still there, lodged inside the mountainous cave, ready to start again. 'That thing needs as much fuel as it can get in order to go on ahead and crush the stone. Just pay attention, I'll show you how we're supposed to put fuel in it now. 'At the point where she laid in front of the machine there came the process. One of the many compartments at the back of the machine opened such as a waste abandoning thing, where she pushed all the small rocks and stones she had in her bag. It made an obviously loud sound as they banged across those tight walls and on their way down.

'How does it really work then?"I don't know, I'm just the one being sent to grab the stones, nothing more. 'The mechanism behind it worked in some manner that was beyond his imagination. Tom wasn't able to think of any possible way it managed to work. Using rocks as fuel was a strange concept for him to grasp. He noticed that the machine started producing heat and lights immediately after. Immediately, there came a confirmation to everything that happened. Not only had a sound come, but it was also obvious once the lights came to a sudden approach. 'Every single of them needs to be full of rocks in order to work. Follow me. 'By the looks of it, she had only emptied a small part of her bag. Tom became as curious as a shepherd, following like a sheep and now he was sniffing around her like a wolf. 'How many of them are there?"Oh, there could be tens of them there. 'And by the looks of it, round and piercing, crushing mechanisms at the end, which might've been able to cut the very stone they stood in front of. 'Why do you do that?Other than the materials?Won't it become way too dangerous if you go too far and, well, make the entire mountain collapse?"You're quite new here, aren't you Tom?This was all planned a long time ago just so we won't have to worry about it, not even the slightest bit. Everything goes and is set to go on after a few months of being filled with rocks for fuel. Making this process perhaps go for years if need be. "But how could you have planned for so long?"We haven't, our ancestors did and rather, they made a great job out of it than anything else if you understand what I'm trying to say. 'Tom shook him and as he looked around, the various workers who were passing by were looking just as peculiarly at him. Perhaps even at her as well. 'They planned for a lot longer than a few generations, trust me on this. To the point of that. 'They reached a point where she pointed at the ceiling.

Apparently, someone had carved on top of the ceiling various numbers and differential equations, most of which Tom couldn't tell apart. 'That's mostly thrown here and there from time to time. Call it something of a homage to the people who used to live here before us and wrote on that tablet. 'What does it mean though?' 'Believe it or not, the first architects that landed here had their own ships go around the mountain, right from the very bottom to the very top in order to make a scheme. They made plans for every single side and the magnitude of the work that had to be done without having to go through and cause the mountain to crush. 'Before anything went on, Tom had to interrupt her immediately and ask her. 'Well, then how can you be certain that you won't cause the machines to go on too far than what they planned?' At that, she grabbed Tom by the hand and brought him closer to a dormant machine. 'Do you see any place for anyone to drive it? You can't because there is none. They have something inside of them which goes on a timer. Not two machines go on and crush the stones at the same time. "But what happens if you don't have one then needs to go fueled?' Ayles grinned at the idea of it. As far as she was concerned, nothing was going to happen, though it didn't hurt frightening the boy at the idea. 'We all do our jobs here from day to night and morning. You needn't worry, as this went for at least a few generations back and will still be going once I'm dead. 'With that in mind, another one was loaded. Making that little dance of flash lightning and various colours were slightly entertaining but didn't manage to distract him from the problem. 'So what are you going to do then?' 'About?' This was rather confusing, seeing how they were descending deeper into the mountain. 'Well about this life of yours? Are you going to spend the entirety of it here, locked inside the mountain?' 'It's not like I have much of a choice now, have I? It's all I do, all I have, everything that I've done ever since I was a child. Certainly, it gets to be a bore, but what am I supposed to now?' 'We can't all have everything we want and dream of Tom, in case you haven't noticed, just looks around for a moment. 'People were worked, having to clean, and fill, even do it manually when the stones on the ground weren't enough. And most likely they did this every single day of their lives, without much considerable breaks or holidays of some kind. 'How come they're not unhappy?' 'Why wouldn't they be? The least we can say and what we leave behind is the message that we were once alive. And that is our legacy. 'A note of pride hadn't left her, just as she was done filling the last machine. She was hiding something which he wasn't supposed to know. 'Let me show you this. 'She said and as they went on further, past the gasp and tunnels, into the mountain, there came the scenery long awaited. 'Oh yes indeed, there was always another temple under us, recently discovered I'd say. Perhaps it's something that laid always beyond our knowledge but we're working on making it whole. 'A temple of such colossal stature was too much to note by himself alone. 'Another one you're saying?' Ayles nodded and as she did so, she started noting at that. 'They really don't teach you much about the people living on island and mountains, don't they?' He nodded his head, bobbing from left to right. It was the same motion that Ian had made. Though being hidden inside the coat made it hard for Tom to notice. 'Well, what do you suppose they needed so many temples now?' The temple held a lofty appearance. It became obvious, from the design that it had somewhat close to the one he had gone in. If neither of them explored its insides, chances were that a beast still laid dormant inside of it. As likely as it went. 'Ayles, wait, I think I know what's there. 'Looking around, as to make sure he wasn't going to be heard, Tom pushed her to the side in order to explain. Everything that went over inside the temple, including the encounter and how he arrived at it went past any other ear than hers. The only thing that was omitted from the story was, after all, the small glittering red gemstone which he had taken. Rather, both of them had taken, of which value would perhaps gain him an audience with the king. 'That's hard to believe. 'Said Ayles, as she brushed past him. 'And even if it were, I doubt we could break through those gates in our lifetime. "Aren't you worrying about this at all?What if something as wretched as that tried going in now?It could possibly escape at any moment and start ruining everything you've ever worked for. "Oh, that's enough, you're even more paranoid than my siblings and they are young that they could be your children. "I'm not trying to mess around Ayles. If you're not listening to the truth, people could suffer because of it. 'After a closer look at him, seeing how serious at least he was, she said. 'Well, how about you show me then?"Show you what?"The temple you Tom-headed boy. 'Said, Ian, as he lavished on the top of his red gem. That came enough as for a whisper, though he doubted still. How would I be able to go through if I weren't able to open the gates?Unless there was just another way that laid buried under the rubble and the stones. 'Verry well, if there's a way in, I will lead you to that point, is that a deal?"It might as well be if what you're saying might be true. 'Both of them remained certain as they made their way to that. It was a steep and hard to traverse set of ridges, held by stones of supreme magnitude. The more he looked at the above, the sharper did the fangs of the colossal grotto appear to be like. Perhaps even the plants that grew appeared to be leaking below. Melting, passing from descendant to descendant. And then the scent hit hard, as they approached the gate, Tom noticed it still. The workers had their site far away from the temple, leaving in stuck in the middle of the cavern, surrounded by a sea of emptiness everywhere around. From what he could tell, nothing but a pillar of stone held it from falling into the abyss. 'Here Tom, just in case, it might be getting far too dangerous past this point. 'Before he realised what she meant to say, a rope was already wrapped around his body. There wasn't anything else he said, but look in dismay. How haven't I noticed the hollowness of the ground?It was almost as if he only noticed now and wanted to cower in fear at the very sight of the height. 'Are you sure it's safe to be around here?"Certainly, as long as you don't fall. When accidents happen or people tend to go missing we just assume the worst. There's definitely no return once you fall there. Luckily for us, there's just enough space to move around, right?"Right. 'There was a note of desperation that shouldn't have to belong to a boy of his age. Perhaps it was the grey-faced girl, sprinkled with stone dust which made him feel protected, as the stones that she once carried looked rather heavy. 'Well, we don't have another way around, other than finding a hole of another secret passage they might've used. "Did they used this kind of things?"I think they have, well. I personally went climbed to a door which laid feet above the ground. But this feeling certainly seems as if it's something I've encountered before. Am I making any sense?"Just try looking for a way inside if there is one. Unless you can open that door. 'Obviously, that thing had its might strapped around, wearing it almost like an impenetrable armour at least. 'Well, how many of you have tried going through it?"Before I was born, once again. "But they're not trying now. "No, most of them gave up, because they thought it to be cursed. "And you're telling me now?"Tom's face became almost red with anger and he looked away. This was certainly not something he expected, curses, tombs and cities inside the mountain. He wanted to see what lays inside nonetheless. This one in most particularly since it seemed like it still remained unmolested and unexplored by any at all. 'Well, we should get started then, just follow me and what I do. We should be able to at least cover some ground together. 'Ayles followed and said no word as they started going around the stone. Everything from dust particles to the smallest of stones that might've been covering it was lifted. All that was done might've been in hopes that they would just find that entrance into the temple. To no avail in the first minutes, not that anyone would mind or bother to come and check on them. 'We should check behind of it at least. There just doesn't seem to be anything here which we could use to get through. 'She nodded once again and tried harder to accommodate this search of his. Dust might've covered something but this was stone. 'I don't think there's way in, you'd think they would've found one if. 'Around the corner, the sound and sight of it silenced her. Perhaps it was something Tom pressed, or it might've been her. Nonetheless, a small square-like hatch opened. It revealed that there was just enough crawling space for both of them to use. Universal size for one person at a time. 'I told you. "You were right Tom, to that I've got to give it to you. What not though?We don't have any means to see inside. "That shouldn't be a problem, I've got Zeppelin too. 'Ian stopped him from that well-thought thing. 'You sent him home, remember?'I sent him back on the ship, that's right, damn thing couldn't even get past the rocky bridge. 'Well, can't we at least try to get in and see if there's a light on the other side?"The look of confusion and uncertainty shook her far too much for her to forget this. 'We're not coming back if we're heading into that hole without a light and a way to block the hatch from closing on us. Let's head back to my house and we'll grab some tools to explore this. "Wait, Ayles, before we do anything. 'Tom paused in order to look around, just to be certain. 'In case you were wondering if someone else might be able to see that it's open, they won't. That entrance into the mining area is far too high and this temple is far too close to the wall for anyone to see anything. "Right on point then, lead the way Ayles. 'For this return, they both attempted to look as inconspicuous as possible. Since they would do it anyway, there wasn't any need for them to untie from one another. Without a care or a bother, it seemed as if there wasn't any mind on the untying of it. Both of them were tied together until this was done. 'Here, my house. 'She said as the long way ended, after avoiding any other unwanted looks. Despite having a torch to use on their way back, it just wouldn't be as good of use in a tight passage. There was also the smoke which they couldn't avoid. 'Nice house. 'The inside of which, Tom noted appeared to have rugs and table, caved in stones but covered in wood. In a way, they were painted and appeared to imitate whatever the outsiders had or had brought in their many journeys. From one of the apparent closets, she dragged a giant chest all by herself. Right before Tom could ask her if she needed any help, she was already done with the dragging. 'Well, what's that you're going to look for?"Tom, you're not the only one with those toy, mind you. Your machine might've been too big for any other purpose though I fancy myself a collector of the kind. 'She took out a small oval-shaped creature of metal. Its eyes were round, plenty of small legs to move around which stretched when lifted. Immediately came the light at her command. 'Is it voice activated?"It's a fine thing, isn't it?They say that at a primal level, they can think and feel like humans, these little things. 'Desperately, it wanted down and started shaking its little legs. 'All right now, settle down, we'll release you once there's need for light. Tom, that thing should do, if you don't mind reaching the top of the desk. 'There laid a couple of tools which didn't really mean much to him in any other way than being peculiar. 'Are these all yours?"Not exactly, they're my father's. He's a rather strange man and an inventor. "Won't he mind if we take one of those and. . "That took that extends, it has a. Right, that one. 'She pointed at it and watched him closely as he started playing with it momentarily. 'If you're done. 'Ayles was already midway pushing the chest before Tom came to lend ahead, though as much as he wanted to help her. Well, there just wasn't any trying for him, whatever they were, this was far beyond him and any strength he had. And there wasn't any mention of the fact that this was merely just pushing it. Aside from that, he wanted to come. 'Are we going now?"Let me check this for a moment, light and way out, this should stand, at least, that's what I hope for. Just in case, see that thing?" Tom took another one of those off the table. It was a mere act of precaution, in case the tool alone wouldn't be able to stand the pressure. With their preparations done, it was time for them to return to the place. Neither of them was prepared to go through, though Ayles took a few small cakes, wrapped them around and placed in a small carrying backpack that she'd drag around. 'Now we're ready. 'As she said, she burst through the door, dragging Tom with her. Looking around, she was certainly aware that some eyes were on them. Her father was a respectable man and he was nothing but an outsider in their eyes. 'If he'll hear about this. 'Her muttering fell on deaf ears as she started to go on ahead, pulling the nod which was wrapped around her. 'Wait a minute now, you're going far too fast for me. 'Tom tried protesting, though he noticed that she was heading far too fast for him to do anything about it. At least, anything other than going on with the flow just certainly didn't do for her. 'We can't be seen together, that's why I'm in such a hurry. My father would kill me if he saw us like this. 'She hadn't realised it either, but somewhere along the way, she had grabbed him by the hand in order to pull him faster. It was something fairly new for Tom. Well, rather, not as much as he wanted. Once the caverns started pushing the cold from outside, as they were on their way, he decided to ask Ayles. 'What's on the other side of the mountain?' Curiously unaware, he felt something about it of which he didn't really want to know. But he needed to be certain that it wasn't what he thought it to be. 'It's cold and white wherever you look on the other side. Why would you be asking now?' Just curiosity. 'His free hands still had some scars left around from the pain he had felt. It left that grim memory every time he felt cold. Just as well, the dark had him to an extent. 'Be careful now. 'Ayles said, while carefully dragging Tom even closer to her, to the point of uncomfortableness. 'Well, it's time to go inside, isn't it?' 'You don't seem as excited anymore. We are going to go back after this, of that you can be certain. 'Rightly around, they both managed to reach and see that it was still fairly open just as they had left it. 'How did it open though?' 'I've got no clue, there's just something from the way I pressed around the wall. A secret button perhaps of a slab. 'Before he was done explaining the two tools extended and blocked it from ever having to go down on them. At least that was the best they could hope for. 'He should be useful now. Wake up. 'The small fellow's eyes suddenly came to a strong light, which only grew in intensity. 'Well, now it's time to choose, who's going in first and who's to follow?' 'Ayles, I've certainly got more experience than you in this. 'That of which there was nothing to be proud of, especially since it was a pity to the poor boy. She nodded and handed him the small construct. It seemingly stopped from jerking or trying to escape once they switched hands. Making it seem like it almost knew that Tom was able to take care of it or of any of its design. 'All right, I'm heading inside. 'After he started kneeling and faced the construct in front of him, he decided to whisper Ian. 'There's the hole, switch sides. 'I'm already ahead of you Tom-Tom. 'Ayles noticed that go on, as obviously as she came to question it. 'Did I hear someone talking now?' 'No, you haven't. Could we focus on ahead please?' Answered Ian, as well as he could imitate Tom. Despite his best attempt, he wasn't certain if it worked now, but he did it anyway. 'All right then. Lead the way. 'His voice was pale and as she followed, she didn't bother asking what was going on. The light came close to lighting the entire tunnel. As they went on ahead, they realised that this entry and the symbols raised another thought. 'We may encounter a burial site if we keep heading this way. 'Letting the construct walk on his own, Tom was standing just well enough to be crawling in his position. 'Are you feeling fine back there?' 'Just keep walking, it's getting cramped in here. I'm not entirely certain we'll be able to get through if it keeps getting smaller. "Wait, Ayles,

I see an exit to it. 'Before long he had reached the point where he could get out and stand on his two feet. Ayles soon followed him in this mysterious place. Though, after looking around the area which was covered in light, Tom realised that this was nothing like the place he had first visited. First of all, his hands just roamed around the walls, noticing that there wasn't any dust or dirt, to begin with. There weren't any plants lying around as in the previous temple he had visited. At least that became obvious with each glance. Stairs leaving down and above with the intermission in this small room. 'Should we got up or down?' 'Are you asking if we should go on ahead and split?' Her question didn't make any sense whatsoever. Tom had immediately made her listen to sense. 'We got only one light with us and a rope in case anything happens. Oh, you were. 'Her face was already half contorted in a smile, just as she began laughing at him like he was a fool. This was certainly not entertaining for neither him nor the crow. Though he did profit from this distraction as he went on ahead and spoke to the boy. 'We're not going to separate any time soon, better get used to the idea. And since we may spend so much time with one another Tom. 'Before she said anything else, Ayles pointed at his chest. It was obvious what she was trying to get at now. 'Who's that little one inside there? I saw something crawling inside your coat back there in the city. At least I waited until I saw more before I could get anything. Other than a head at least but even then. 'At this Tom turned around for a moment, trying to think of what was better to do. 'Do we tell her Ian?' 'What other chance do we have? She already noticed, hasn't she?' It was tied up with what they wanted to do, not to mention that they were spending as much time together as they wanted. 'Well, it's time I guess. 'At that Ian dragged his head out, still grasping with his claws upon the gem. There wasn't any denying that he wasn't going to let go of it. 'It's a bird, oh, you were carrying your pet. 'I'd say I'm more than that lass. For I have carried and saved Tom more than once on our journey. 'A slight shock came once she saw that the crow had had a voice. Then again, nothing seemed to shock her anymore or any less than the obscure and the mad. 'Well now, should we introduce one another?' 'I already know who you are Ayles, I've heard you speak to Tom. As a matter of fact, I've heard and felt everything so far. 'Tom interrupted the crow before he could go on into an unneeded spoiled talk. 'Well his name is Ian and he's been, my friend. And she's Ayles, Ian, the girl that had been helping me so far. Now that we're done with the interruptions, could we go and explore this place already? It's not like there's a joy being in here locked with whatever may roam. 'Both of them nodded at his suggestion, though this was quite a lot to swallow and process. 'Ian, is it? How come you can speak?' 'Wait a minute, so it's decided then? Are we going to go down and try exploring the depths?' That got both of their attention, as well as it seemed to go the other way, it was the time to head down below. 'Could we at least check for a quick glance?' 'I guess that's a good idea. 'At which, upon hearing Tom be as patronising as he were, Ian continued for him. 'That's definitely what I was trying to say. 'Talkative bird, isn't he?' 'Definitely not as much as you are stone-girl. 'As they ascended, the stairs were steep and it got darker. She had to grab the lighter off the ground and point it up ahead. It appeared that the choice had already been taken for them before they even got the chance. 'We won't be opening that door now, at least not with the tools we have. Not to mention that there's no bringing them down here through a hole that small. 'We at least have the depths to go through. Shall we?' Making way for her to go almost left something on her cheeks. Short-lived as it were, the crow had his dark glance as he buried himself in the warmth of the various layered clothes Tom had. 'Don't show her the rest of my body boy. The less anyone else knows, the better. 'That whisper was short lived and noted. It seemed as if Tom wasn't planning on doing anything close to the sort, other than exploring. 'Look at these things on the wall Tom. They must be ancient, at least for the likes they were carved of. 'It was the first sign that made both the boy and the crow impatient and added a slight twitch to both of them. In particular, he pointed.

'That, we should stay away from that. 'A giant creature standing and carrying their dirt and stones, sticks and whatever else they needed. 'What are they? From these drawings, they don't seem rather human, do they?' Even as the interest came to a melting point, it became obvious that something needed to happen to her as well in order to understand how serious this was. 'We've seen them, in flesh and bone, or rather had an encounter. "Have?" "Shh, girl, keep your voice down, if they hear, neither the boy nor I will be able to get a hold of you after. They might slumber or be kept alive, but as we've seen they don't appear to be able to starve or die of thirst. 'Which was indeed bad news, for the deeper they went, it was time to reach the living area and go even farther below. Ian noticed as well as any other human that this wasn't the best place to be when everything went array. 'I'm no afraid of what's out there. And let's be plain about it, there's not enough space for it to be here, is it?' Both Tom and Ian looked around, from top to bottom, trying to note whenever or not one of such stature would fit. They've already missed too much information carved on the stone walls. Though this was on a different level altogether. 'No, I don't think it'd fit here unless it started bashing and crushing the entire floor with us on it. "Then keep as quiet as possible Tom, wasn't that the plan we started going with?" He had to presumably modulate his sound, as it was already hard for him to whisper in a condition such as this. What they saw in front of them was nothing more than a short-lived commodity. There was plenty to explore nonetheless, at least as far as they were concerned. No human remains and nothing which was wrapped around laid on sight, at least making it seem like they had the decency to avoid overpopulation. 'This smells like cinnamon. 'Said Ian, with beak all around. It was a sweet scent that couldn't be tainted by anything of the sort, be it the old age of rotting corpse. 'He's right, I do smell it as well. Far too sweet to be avoided. 'From the looks of it, one of the doors wasn't properly locked. Inside of which, as the three of them noted, laid spices in bags and jars, among various other things. 'Open that girl, it seems like there might be something sweet inside of it. 'The crow pointed his beak at one of the most peculiarly shaped containment which laid inside that tightly shut storage room. A stone-like material held it in place, having intrusion all around, though none of which went deep enough as for what laid inside to spill. He had the right idea as it turned out, upon unscrewing the top that it was honey, sweet honey, which was never seen by the girl. Tom immediately pushed a finger inside then into his mouth. 'Manners boy, there's a guest with us. "I'm sorry, but, it's sweet. So sweet, you would've thought it might've been stale by now. "It isn't and doesn't take too much or you'll be sick, boy. 'Ayles screwed it back shut and took another, refusing to take whatever substance laid inside of it. 'Let me see, this. 'Before taking another, she opened to see that there laid something which resembled the honey until it was thicker. 'Careful how you handle it Tom, don't take too much honey from the jar. 'Without listening, he pushed another finger, only to have difficulty pulling it out. 'This isn't honey. 'He announced and judging by how far it stretched, this was some kind of resin which pushed and dragged along with him. There wasn't any cutting or being outstretched, this was being made solid just in front of his eyes. 'Ayles, help him before it becomes too hard to shatter and he'll lose his finger. "Tom, lower your hand, I'll let this bottle down. 'The boy appeared to be shocked by this declaration of his finger's loss. 'Do I cut it then?' At which his eyes widened even more, at what the girl implied. As much as he wanted to go on this venture of theirs, a finger loss meant he'd return. 'No, girl, search in another jar, there are plenty of them, and hurry. 'In another laid another thick substance, at which the crow nodded. The more they went through each one of them, the more nervous and unaware Tom became. It was merely his finger but he was frightened by the idea of cutting it here and now. 'That one girl, that liquid, it's pale enough. 'And most importantly, it resembled somewhat of water. From the looks of it, contaminated, but as long as it had the chance, it was immediately splashed across his hand. Whatever resin that was, it immediately started disintegrating. Tom drew a mouthful breathe of release from what he noted. The next problem came, as small burning spots came on his hand. 'Tom, rub the substance off your hand fast. 'Ayles pushed the jar in the back without covering it and ripped a piece of the skirt she was wearing under all the protection. It was light but at least she managed to work as fast as possible. Despite having seconds before those burns could extend and be permanent, she grabbed him by the wrist and started rubbing with the other hand. 'It stings so much, I can barely handle the pain. 'He said, and as obvious as it were, this was hardly something to complain about. Either permanent scares or this. Once she was done, there was nothing to look about, though she threw away the rag as it started disintegrating as well. 'All right, I think we've had enough with the substances here, we don't want to lose other limbs playing around, do we?' Though there were more than two hundred different other jars stores, she was right. 'We should be more careful now, I think. It was never as dangerous as this back home. 'Thinking of it, really made him seem like a liar, at least for the time being. 'Should we return then?' 'No, no, I don't. We said we'd do this and we can't return from a small accident, can we? After all, we've been so far already. 'Ayles only blinked at him thoroughly, looking as if she wanted to see any chance of his expression or whenever or not he was content with what happened to so far. Both of them finally managed to get the full extent of the rope at least, as each started carrying over a side of the room. Checking the markings and the doors, some of which were locked. Other had, well. 'Look Ayles, it's what they used to wear, robes and what not. Headbands. 'Wrapped and golden, they were held upon thin stone cylinders, rightly above the other pieces of their attires. 'Well, how about you try this on?' Tom placed it carefully on top of her head. It appeared like it'd be a perfect fit after all. That white band gave her a pleasant look on her round grey face, making it no mere compliment. At least that's what Ian thought. 'Look they even have smaller ones for pets. 'I doubt they came as small as I. 'Said Ian, watching how the boy failed to find any match whatsoever in that pile. 'I don't think it looks that bad, I might even keep it. 'Ayles might've nodded if she wasn't trying to hide her face. Even as a compliment, this bore through her like a sharp knife. 'Well try that Tom, it might suit you as well. 'Ian pointed with his beak and the boy noted. 'I couldn't wear that over my face, it wouldn't fit me. 'Just try boy and stand near the girl. 'Out of the pile, there came a small mask that might've been the same size as his face if it wasn't for some roundish forms that bore it bigger than him. It stood around nonetheless, though as the boy noted, he wanted to see what he looked like by himself. 'Come here. 'Said Ayles, as she pulled Tom by her. It was awfully close but he understood why they both stood in front of the wall. With its golden arches, there came a reflection that made it obvious what they looked like. It acted like a mirror, allowing them to see what they looked like with those things on. That mask bore the strange symbols and large ears that were sharp and solid. Perhaps it was just an illusion. It bore the same feeling as the jars they previously encountered. 'Well, I'm definitely not carrying this around. 'Keep it, Tom, what if you may need it in the future?' 'Why would I?' He stopped and gave it another thought. 'You may be right about it. Here Ayles, there's another mask down there, just hold one as well. It might get seriously necessary if we go further below. 'Again with that thing, there's nothing there as dangerous as you think. Just look around, whatever laid here might've died hundreds of years ago, perhaps more. "That's what I'm afraid of now. What waits for us there might not be as alive as the rest of us. 'With a nod, she grabbed both the mask and the small construct off the ground. It was time to leave these living quarters, seeing as there just wasn't anything else left for them to break through. The deeper they went, the more they realised as well that this was in the stone. Somehow they were reaching far too deep into the uncarved, the deep below and perhaps the unexplored. 'Careful now, the steps are getting steeper for us to go. "I can take care of myself and as a matter of fact, so can Ian now. We made it so far, haven't we?"But barely from one of this boy, Listen now, both of you, if need be, drop everything you have and run as fast as you can. Don't forget we'll need to crawl if something happens, at least in order to get out alive. 'Ayles frowned yet again at the idea of something happening to them. 'You don't need to remind me of that. I knew the risks before going inside so don't shove it down our throats. Why did it have to be an annoying crow out of any animal that could've been hidden inside, Tom?"I'm only trying to help. "Well in case you haven't grown a light now, have food or did anything other than annoy me, you haven't. 'That might've cut deep into the crow if he wasn't already. Though at a sign from Tom, Ian didn't say a word to the girl but waited. She'll see how much she needs me, as well as the boy. Soon, though the crow, soon. Enough of the dust and they arrived at the lover living quarters. They were quite different, though they seemed as if they held the second battalion inside. 'Just how many of these are there?"Tom Asked as he set his foot on the floor. As obvious as it was the same, this had a rather pleasant scent and a rustic appearance than the other. Perhaps it was the fact that no one had bothered to clean it up in whatever period of time had passed. Rather, another reason might've gone through, though this was the reason they chose to explore. 'Wait, you see that?'Ayles pointed rightly at the first difference she noted and perhaps the only one worth noting so far. It had a statue that stood high enough, sitting as if on a chair. Two heads bore feature that was unrecognisable, chained to one another as they tore through the robe. The detail on it was amazing, going down as to have every single detail in order. Even the human hands it bore were made to look as real as they were, with the only difference between them being that it was made out of stone. 'What do you think that maybe?"I don't know, but that body doesn't look right, does it?"The closer they got, the more distorted their sight became. It was almost as if they were approaching the realms it stood as a guardian to. Perhaps it was the fact that the scent changed the closer they got to it. That was a thing of nightmares, created from candles and sticks that had long lost their light but still managed to get through. It didn't take the long exposure for everything around them to start coming to life, rather than be as pale and ancient as they were. Stone almost looked like wood now. Both Ayles and Tom were holding one another as they approached, instinctively doing so. Now, there was something about the quality of the stone statue that bore it from the appearance it had to something rather pitiful and repulsive. It turned stone into the skin and borrow from other materials and thoughts only to make it seem alive. For Ayles it appeared that it had an ashen skin, having the cold look on its many rotating eyes, as the light of the sky glittered in them. One large green feather and a band of leather laid rolled everywhere around its body. Such presence made her shudder for a moment, just like the others. For Tom, it appeared like a tall figure which laid in the darkest corner of the room. As it stood there, the light fell and he was aware of that thing and how it gazed at him. That's when he thought it made a move and prepared itself to leap at him and harm his body before he even realised it. 'No, this can't be, stay away!"Said the boy, making room for the crow. Ian saw the tallest of his order, perhaps bigger than anything he has ever seen. As

obviously the decrepitude of the illusion didn't sit well with him. Such might, with its giant black feathers, refusing to talk to him in the common language of the man. 'What's this blasphemy?' He asked, at last, making it seem as if everyone was affected in a deeper way than the other. 'We need to get back before it gets us!' That voice came from somewhere though most of them were unaware at this point. Neither of them knew what to do or where to run. At least they were pulled, or someone decided to take the lead and run down the stairs. One last look behind and everything was gone. What had taken hold of the rope and managed to pull them down the stairs and out of that grim presentation was that small light construct. As small as it appeared to be, it had just enough strength to pull everyone out and save them from whatever that was. 'What was that?' 'Don't Ayles, don't climb the stairs yet, it might still be there just waiting for us to come to it. Just don't fall for it now. 'The girl nodded and as much as she was afraid of the unknown, they both stood on a step. Each of them got closer to the wall, waiting for the paranoia and for the calm. 'I can't wrap my head around what happened over there, can you?' The boy nodded, making sure to have it go for a while until she understood. Truth be told, it was rather the fact that he was still dizzy and confused from the encounter with that thing. Was it a beast? His thought ran with it for as long as he needed it to go. 'It wasn't a beast, at least not one that I've ever seen' Tom was surprised to hear a response to his thought. 'Have I said that aloud then?' At which he was ignored. This place will be the end of our days if we're not going to be careful about it. 'A beast? More like a mighty crow, perhaps the king of all our order laid on his throne. 'Why would a king lay on a throne in a locked temple, buried inside the mountain?' A few thoughts came as well at her question, after all, being a matter of the dread certainly made things interesting, to say the least. 'It wasn't the only dead one I and Tom encountered, girl. I certainly doubt that it might be the last one we'll get to see on our way. 'Despite their conflicting stories and as they waited, Ayles shared her cakes with Tom. She even attempted to share some of it with Ian, at which he refused with indignation. 'I only eat the finest lady. 'Right. The light was waiting for them to finish until one of them decided to finally thank him for what he's done. 'Thanks, by the way. We couldn't have done it without your help. 'A blink of the light, off and one is switched. Ayles had never understood just how clever these constructs were, as she saw them as toys and nothing more. 'You saved us, haven't you?' He certainly did, this little fellow, though I dare say that we won't get another chance if we won't be careful on our own. 'With that in mind, yet again Ayles ignored his warning and grabbed the construct by the horns. She took the lead rather roughly, after making her way down the stairs, finally getting rid of the sight of the living quarters. 'This wasn't. It shouldn't be here. 'Ayles said, and before he could see a thing, Tom arrived to see a long tunnel leading towards somewhere. Being at least fair to it, this place looked rather too common and rustic to be a temple for an unknown forgotten cult. 'A working place, then?' 'Storage I'd say, though for what? What did our predecessors make this like?' From her standpoint, everything that laid above, the closed door, unreachable chambers and the runes ended here. It was a cover-up for something bigger than both of them. 'Shall we go then, Tom?' 'Ladies first. 'With his manners at least out of the way, he made sure not to look back, or rather, he thought of seeing something tall running towards them. 'Shouldn't we return though? I mean this certainly seems like a long tunnel, perhaps far too much for a day alone. 'Don't tell me this is the moment you've decided to get cold feet. 'Tom nodded reluctantly at that. It was a long tunnel after all and neither of them was prepared for such a long journey. 'We won't make it without water and just a bunch of cakes. 'Her package did get lighter with each step. 'Very well, tomorrow we return, same deal. 'Closer to one another, as they reached whatever laid in that room, both of them turned their backs on it and managed to avoid even the slightest touch. It was, after all, time to see whenever or not they were indeed locked inside or this plan had worked. The hole was open just as they both had expected. As much as they wanted to keep it still, they crawled outside, past the bridge and undid the knot that tied them. 'We're going to use it again tomorrow but don't be late, understood?' 'We won't, the same place, in front of your house, as soon as the sun is up. Does that sound well?' Both of them agreed on their meeting and went on to gather up what they needed. As far as he was concerned, he needed better clothes, not just those stone bearer coat he had picked up on the way. Something warm was needed for this, which was far beyond anything the others could provide. That's how yet another day passed, just as he went back onto the ship, got everything he needed on him and even managed to talk to the captain. He offered Tom a small coat, which was fairly better suited for him than what the stone pickers had to offer. Tom took care of his needs, though not before taking time to talk with the captain. He found out that the ship wouldn't leave for days until the task at hand was over. 'Very well. 'Said Tom to the captain. 'I'll make do with what I have then. 'On his way, he almost forgot, this being fairly better than what he had expected. As a matter of fact so did Ian, as their reason was already far away. A hand slammed the bottom of the throne, being as far away as one could possibly get. It was the king who stood and listened to his various generals who were invited to his chamber. A giant dome-like hole opened on top of the room, only at their request so they could see the map. It was a giant thing which had every city and every single town, every island and every settlement created by man. Then there came the uninhabited ones and the unknown ones. Most of them had become that way because of sources beyond their control. Annoyed, he stood there, trying to gnaw at the throne with his claws, though remained unable to do so. Everyone was talking to one another at the same time, discussing, speaking and thrusting words. Yet none of them decided to take the lead and tell him something as important as this. 'Enough of this. This isn't what I called you for. Don't just stand there and talk on top of each other when I need to know what's destroying the islands now?' 'Excuse me sir, your majesty, your grace. 'Came a rather fat man, wearing a pig skinned collar and wolf braids around his coat of animal hair. 'Well, I think I speak the best for everyone around here when I say that this may be much more obvious than you. I mean that any of us thought of. 'Foolish lord, do you think I know it couldn't be one of those wriggling things? Captain of the guards, come forward. 'The man was standing in the dark among the other royal guards, waiting to come back at his command. It was rather amusing to see him come bowed to the point where he was surrounded by various lords and others who used to look down at people like him. 'Tell me, what was reported to have attacked the far end of our town? What killed our livestock now?' 'My lord. Your majesty. Well, it was a wriggling beast as you've said, your majesty. From what the shepherd had said, it came at least a few times and each time managed to grab a few sheets before leaving. 'And is there proof of the coming of it?' 'Yes my lord. 'It was a strange act to do so in front of a lord, though this request came from the word of the king. Two more men came from the shadow once the king made a slightly visible sign on the hands. Both of them took a patch off the ground, dug it out and carried, wrapped around in a piece of cloth that hold it still. 'That, my lords is no fire and nothing that could've been made by man. It was the strike of a lightning bolt and not one of the usual ones. 'But your majesty. 'Said the same lord that was still talking with the king. 'That could've been just one of the natural ones. 'I'm fairly sure that it doesn't prove anything now. 'Said another, while still holding her nose above the rest. 'You can't be certain that you called us all here for this.

'Every single one of them appeared to be baffled despite having known what happened. They're all trying to deny what's happening. 'You may be right, but then again, how do you explain this?' He pushed the men to get out with the patch of dirt and called another from the dark. This next one had a bag of bones, which were revealed to have been broken, burnt, cleaned and having pieces of stone and various other materials lodged inside of them. 'How do we know this isn't an elaborate ruse now to get us to agree on something?' 'Because this is beyond all of us, it's something that may threaten our very peaceful existence here. Perhaps even more, it may mean the coming of another war for power. And be certain of it, you're aware of what happened when the first one came, aren't you?' This land was his by right, that he knew, and he needed to show them no further proof. 'Believe what you want but this is important to know. Upon the map, there are zones marked which have been destroyed or made uninhabitable by something. I'm unaware whenever or not it's one of those beasts or something other but I'm certain that whatever it might be, it might come for us next. 'This court of theirs was a mockery of him. None of them listened to what was to be done. 'Listen to fools, if this doesn't stop, my kingdom will come next and I think there might be little that we can do against a legion of them. "Then what do you suppose we do, Lord?' A slight hint of pity and distant laid in that tone as he said it. He bore nothing before him, as he was still needed to say the least. To one another, both of them were slightly entertained by what they had to say. Though now, it came to show them what his plans had come to. For this time, came no man but one of his royal guards. What laid inside the grip of his gauntlets was a giant spear chained, with a chain as long as it came, wrapped against itself. 'Drop it on the map. 'Though the table upon which the map of the entire map spanned upon as far as it went. Covering up what came close to the entire room, the spear managed to span on at least two more heads. It was not only long but thick enough to take down a ship. 'And what would this do against them now when it could send a shock back to one it fires?' 'Well, isn't it obvious you petty little creatures? Have I not thought of all? Look upon the metal used and understand that there's nothing that could make the energy travel back. It's not that kind of metal I've used for my new type of spears. 'Double-headed at the end, sharp enough to cut one's thread, it was the final weapon against the beast that threatened the sky. 'Once we will be done with it. 'At which he nodded for the guard to retreat with the spear back into the shadows. After which was done, he carried on. 'I will have every fort around the city armed, as well as every ship that's part of this very city, have the means to take those beasts down. "Then why did you call us here, If I may not intrude my lord. 'That moustache and the shortness of the fellow highly disturbed the king, at least to make him wonder how was such like him a lord. Doesn't matter, they might all be as well as they can be, rats. Though one was missing, which he noticed only at the time. It was a woman who cared to come here earlier before any of them had the chance to arrive or present their points. 'Well, it's simple. There's something else out there that's bringing down isles and these spears aren't cheap to make. I'll have you all pay for manufacturing the protection for each of your region inside my kingdom. "And if we refuse? What, are you going to force us to abide by whatever silliness you think of next?' 'I would've had you hanged at least for trying to do such a thing like mocking me inside my throne room. His thought bore him something of pettiness and despair. Just wait for your turn. 'Well, let's just say that we will have to make some room in order to expand. By that, I mean that we'll split off your region or whoever's tries to drag us down with them. And believe me, it may come to that if we don't prepare for the coming attack. Look again at the map, all of you!' The king almost leapt up from his chair and stood at the end of the table. It became evident the moment when the king pointed it out. Those attacks and the destroyed islands left a linear path which those beasts seemed to follow. 'It seems as if it follows a pattern. "That may be quite a bit paranoid, to say least for being mad. Can we really assume that beasts such as them are actually thinking and acting in a militaristically fashion? Saying that, or even thinking it remains to be called preposterous!' Her voice almost cracked upon the effort, while others agreed.

'Whatever you may have thought of it, the fact remains. We lost ship and land because of them without any explanation. If this isn't another sign of. . . ' Everyone stopped what they were doing and looked at him almost like it was him again in the stories. Acting both like a prophet and like a king. 'Of what?' The first lord asked, then followed yet another. Soon, all of them were silent and aware of the stories they were told as children, everyone in the kingdom was. But before anything could be said by him, the door opened. The same cutthroats that accompanied that lady, just as she came far too late. And the door closed. Past the veil of darkness came and into the tunnel. Down the temple where, both the boy, the girl, the construct and the crow came through the same path they had followed. Through it, they arrived again, this time with covered eyes, as they had managed to find out about the illusion. It was a mere thing, reading through the paintings on the walls. They spoke of a statue that sent mists upon bowed figures. Something which they could've more than easily avoided if they were at least sharp enough to follow the writings. 'We're truly doing this, aren't we?' Tom asked as the light came back through the tunnel. Nothing appeared to have changed in the time they had to spend away. Other than a night, this day had barely started, quite the first thing in the morning. 'We are going as far as we can get before being caught. Luckily for me, my father hasn't heard about what I've done. "Hasn't your father noted of something missing from your house, girl?" He did mention he couldn't remember where he put his. . . Oh, that thing that we took, right. ' Her thought went immediately on the open hatch. That crow certainly has a memory for the most uninspired things that happened. Ayles came to the conclusion that it wasn't as important as she let others know it was. 'Well. I'm certainly sure he won't miss them for at least the time we're on our way. And we're returning them as soon as we're done. "Unless the hatch closes and we're stuck here for the rest of our days. "Ian that's enough, no need to start this now. We will be able to return, you'd better be certain of it. Unless you do want to be stuck here with the rest of us for the rest of your days. 'Tom looked as young and full of energy as he had ever been now. Something in the air ticked him off that something was wrong about the place. Whatever it was, both Ian and Ayles were able to see that change into him.

'There. 'Ayles pointed, after noticing a change in the tunnel. There it was, a slightly curved thing, which wasn't as noticeable by the normal eye. As far as they were both concerned, it shouldn't have been that way. 'We should hurry then. We're not covering enough ground this way. 'Both of them agreed before starting to run along. Out of their laps, both Ayles and Tom managed to keep up fairly with one another, even to the point of having the crow and the construct sweat. And the matter of the fact remained that they were still just standing and looking. 'There, I can see the curvature you were talking about Ayles. It must lead to somewhere. 'As they approached, the more it began feeling as if the ground was moving under them. Before long, it turned out that it truly was a turn, leading to nothing else but a dead end. Standing there confused, they both looked in silence as how abruptly everything ended. 'This can't be it. 'Protested the girl, though there wasn't anything she saw that could've been used to open this. It was too much of a stone wall, uncarved, untouched, not even by a pick or by any hand. To be certain, in a matter of words, this was the end of it. 'Tom, you need to look for another one of those secret entrances. There must be one hidden around here, I'm sure of it!" Ayles, stop for a minute. The girl even untied the rope around her and dropped the light producing construct on the ground, being alone in her search. Regardless of how hard she tried for force herself to see something, there was nothing other than the stone. Everyone in the village would've enjoyed hearing about a new mining site, but this hadn't thrilled her whatsoever. As much as this pleased her, this wasn't what they came for. 'Enough Ayles, you'll only hurt yourself if you do this. Tom managed to notice by now that her fists were red, at least around the knuckles. Something about this made this image of her make him give her his pity rather than anything else. 'You don't understand, nothing else happens around here, ever. Nothing but working with the stones, cleaning and mining, every single day for the rest of my days. "Why don't you leave then? "I can't Tom, I've got nowhere to leave to. Nowhere to stay. I've barely managed to follow a boy in what I thought it'd be an adventure which turned out to follow a dead end. "Things like that happen all the time Ayles, but that doesn't mean we have to give up now, have we?' Having come off her knees, she just pushed Tom as she walked by. There wasn't any getting to him now, that was certainly true for the time being. 'Well, at least she's gone, back to the basic, right?' It's not the time, Ian. 'With that said, he tried to follow the girl but managed to stop when she saw her standing still. As mad as she appeared to be, at least Ayles stood still for a moment, looking at the ground. Something she saw, glittering on the ground, something which Tom hadn't seen either. 'That thing Tom-Tom, don't let her touch it. 'With a shout, both the girl and Tom realised it was too late. As the ground under them snapped, they came down with the ground, sliding off into the distance. Tom held still as the light revealed that there laid a secret tunnel underneath. Whatever it was now, as both the boy and the girl shouted, it ended just as fast as they had landed on a pile of dust and bones. 'Nooooo!' Tom shouted as the pain. Rightly so Ayles thought, but it turned out that his rage was pointed towards that trap door above which closed behind them. Seeing how they had come into a sea of dust and bones, he looked at her and having nothing else to say he asked her. 'What have you done?' 'I don't know Tom, I saw something off the ground and I thought that it was another secret way. "We're going to die off now, and this will be our grave. Do you understand that Ayles? Have you any idea what you've done?' 'Stop shouting at me, it isn't my fault. "It's all your fault, now we're. We're stuck here with no way out. We can't get back there and just look at all of this. Was it worth it for your damn adventure of a lifetime?' There wasn't any visible way out, not to mention that the air was thicker and hard to breathe. From the looks of it, at least, some of the bones which stood around looked rather recent. It wasn't as pleasant as it appeared. The more they move, the farther down they started sliding. Sooner or later, it had to happen, this wasn't an exception for either of them. 'Don't make any sudden movement unless you want to be buried under all those bones. 'Tom's voice cracked, just as he grabbed upon a spine that laid somewhat taken by the piled. It was connected, perhaps caught in-between a pair that formed a small box of bones which stood aghast, holding still. After that, he grabbed the girl before she fell off into the distance. 'Don't let go, I don't think there's anything I could stand on. The bones might shatter under me, Tom. 'Everywhere around them laid piles of crooked bones covered in that grim dust. Judging by the looks and the scent, this wasn't just a burial ground they found themselves trapped. 'This isn't dust, is it, Ayles?' As she started sniffing, his thoughts were partially confirmed once she felt it as well. 'Those are ashes, I can feel it as well. How did you know?' The boy saw the bones girl, just look around at everything. There's a reason they're so brittle and weak. 'Ian was the first to notice though he said nothing at all. Another piece of information came to his mind that he wanted to let them know before it was too late. 'Not to mention that the room might've been used to purify the bodies, it might be nothing short of a fully operational furnace. 'And their light was lost somewhere below, shining on them, though unable to pull itself off. 'You don't suppose it's working, do you?' 'Boy, Tom-Tom, you said some bodies were recent, haven't you? And those ashes might've been the ancient corpses that once roamed here. "It can't be working, though, could it now?" Stop trying to deny it, boy, find a way out before we'd be forced to find out. Or to say the least, before it's starting to get hot around here. I wouldn't enjoy ending up like a crisp thing, burnt to ashes, it just isn't the way to go. "Tom, I can see something there. Let go of me for a moment. 'He slowly lowered her to what appeared to be a strange path made of bones. From the point where Tom stood, there wasn't any way to see if there was walkable ground under him, just within a foot's reach. Tom nodded and released his hand from the spine, following her, but not looking behind. 'Do you think we stand a chance if this place starts being on fire?' Asked Tom, looking rather genuine about this fear he had. As far as they had known, this was an ancient place, it shouldn't work for centuries. 'They were known to make buildings, temples, towers that lasted. It wouldn't surprise me if this managed to work as well. "Is that all Ayles? Would that be all you had to say?" The crow had already retreated into him the moment he heard him start talking. It should've been the next course of action, to find their light and get out before either suffocation or the fire came. Though this was rather quaint. 'What do you want for me now?' Perhaps an excuse for being the reason why we're here. That would rather be a start, though I wouldn't be bothered if I received one as well. "For what exactly would I apologise for you at least? Perhaps I might've been wrong in trying to find an entrance to something below but how should I have known it would've to lead us here?" That's not all Ayles. You used me for your own purposes, that's all. There was nothing else to me than an escape from your mundane life, which you even came to regret immediately after finding out there was nothing there. Well here you are, a pile of nothing everywhere and the adventure you've always wanted. Are you happy now?" "It isn't my fault. 'The girl's teeth were already bouncing upon one another, trying her best not to crack under stress. It wasn't either the time nor the mood, though she turned her back and tried ignoring him. 'What do you have to lose if you just apologise or at least admit it. "All right, I didn't want to be interested in whatever you had to do. Even this damn cord snapped on our fall and as far as I'm concerned, it's the best damn thing that happened in our journey. "Right, because it's my fault, somehow that you wanted to come with me and explore inside the unknown ruins. "It isn't my fault, how many time do I have to repeat it?" A sudden change of pace made them both cower in fear. A giant ray of dampness clogged the sight over the ceiling, rightfully above, managing to be revealed only by a slimmer of light which came from below. It was a pure thing that moved around, and at a pace that couldn't be outraged. 'What was that thing?' The girl asked in silence. It was even lower than a whisper, though their noise wasn't as unnoticed as they thought of it. 'Lower the light. 'Ayles said, as all of the sudden, the construct came to the point of making it a local thing. One light waited alone, as they got closer to its source. From the looks of which, it had a fall which broke some bones and pushed some of the ashes away. There was dirt as well just laying around. It seemed as obvious as a reason why they would freely walk now without breaking through the bones. 'Help me pull it from that ribcage, 'It was blinking the light as it became anxious once it realised that neither of them was going to abandon him now. As little of a gest as it appeared and since they both needed the light, both of them decided to comply. Their need came first now. 'Where to now?' "I told you, there might not be an escape from this place Ayles, are you that hard of an ear?" There has to be a way out. What if they planned for something like this to happen and they made a secret exit in the hopes that the one of them who caught himself inside might escape?"Low chances for that but I suppose neither of you has the alternative. "Why is that you ragged pet?"It might be since I don't have a need to breathe, though I can feel the air just fading away. You can feel it just as well. Soon you'll both be puffing the ashes rather than the air and finally, succumb to the sickness. 'So said Ian and as much as he thought, Ayles refused to believe him. Though it was rather strange that he said such a thing. He doesn't need to breathe, what a damn lying bird, no wonder he has a tongue as sharp and lousy as that. She didn't make a move but tried looking. If there had ever been an exit or a door at the bottom, somewhere below, they would have to forcefully try to dig inside the mountain of ashes and bones to even get the chance. 'There isn't any way through. Keep the light, it's yours after all. But I and Ian will find a way out for our own. "Don't leave me like that now, this isn't the time to act childish. "No, it isn't Ayles, that time was when we were up there and you wanted to find something. You have, now if you'll excuse me, I don't want to end like of those corpses there. 'Regardless of what he thought, he saw his shadow get greater in size. Both the girl and her light came following him from behind without saying a word. Good, at least she's starting to feel guilty enough that she won't talk back. It was all he needed now, as much silence as he needed to think while walking in what appeared to be the garden or the road of bones. 'Well, what do you think then?Do either of us have a shot at escaping this?'Ian was rather silent again. There were as many chances as there for him, though there weren't plenty as he thought. No opening, no sign, nothing, this appeared to have nothing that would suggest an exit. 'I'm sorry Tom-Tom, it's a bad place to die in, not to mention being buried inside of. If there had been a way for me to find one, I would've looked. 'What about that thing?'As he pointed his finger, Ayles suddenly raised the light. It was that manta which flew around the ceiling, without making any noise of interacting whatsoever. 'Can you see it as well Ian?"I can boy, though it doesn't please me to see it now. "Let's go then, I think I might have something. 'There was only a slight hint that he had a plan, which manifested in finding themselves now climbing on the first small mountain of ashes. As for her, once he arrived at the top, he landed a hand and pull her over at the top. 'This should offer us a good enough view of the entire thing. "Tom-Tom. 'Whisper which was immediately ignored. It was obvious, after seeing the woman sweat what was happening. Before anything could be said, Ian had started again, but this time even louder. 'Tom-Tom, I know that that thing might've been. "What is it now Ian?"We're all in grave danger, can't you feel it, boy?What about Ayles?It's becoming far too hot for any of us to stay. 'Soon there was no need for light, as they were, standing in front of the answer all along. At the end of this furnace laid its mouth, which had rugged metal teeth which started shaking. One smaller light which was immediately accompanied by the another just came into being. 'It can't be happening. "It is the boy if you had a plan just make sure you put in motion while you still have the chance. 'The moving mouth started making upon whatever it had in front of it, releasing a small burst of flames around. Puffs of black smoke started flying as far as the eye went. 'What are we going to do about that now?Can we even? Aagh. 'As he face became even hotter, so did that metal machine which laid in her hands. It fell with an immediate crack of bones, back into a cage from which there was no escape. Thoughtfully, the red gem which had Ian nesting remained as cold as one could be in a situation like this. 'We need to escape now. There might be no chance now that it started. "There, I can see it, it's the same little metal brass thing which opened when Ayles pressed it. "Good eyes lad, what now?"It was fairly further than them, at least to the point where they wouldn't have the chance to reach there by climbing. 'Ayles, how had was it for you to get it open?' 'I don't know. 'In a second, they were almost shaken, making it seem like an illusion. Though they all saw it get a bit further than where it laid at a second ago. 'Grab a hand then and start throwing at it. 'As he did so, ripping apart, then grabbing a skull, he hit the mark, leaving but a loud rippling thing as it bounces back, broken in half. Each attempt made it seem like they were approaching the end, at least for the time being. Both Ayles and Tom attempted and had thrown, picking even the sharpest and the smallest bones they would find. 'It's of no use. "Just keep throwing and come closer, soon we will have nothing left to breathe from. 'The bones were pulled no longer inside. They became aware after glancing around. Such a reason was tainted, but the entire room was to be ignited. Seeing the flames start expanding made Ayles quite desperate, enough that she would listen to reason now. 'Keep trying before it's late. 'That of which they have, crack after crack, they kept carrying on with this, until the flames and the fumes reached obnoxiously close. It would be soon that they'd pass. 'We won't last long now. 'Said Ayles as she succumbed to that poised smoke that came out from behind and threatened to swallow them. 'Ayles gets up, we're getting out I said. "Look Tom-Tom, there!" Ian directed his glance and it was soon revealed that the laid a rock pushed inside a skull. It was the cause of death most likely, of which would be the cause of their escape. 'Make it a good attempt!" 'Don't worry, I will. 'Tom grabbed it, making sure it was heavy enough, plenty of distance for it to have some force as well. 'If this doesn't work, we'll have to say our goodbyes here. 'Within the confines of his strength, the boy threw the rock directly at the small metal joint, which opened. The giant side of the floor fell and slammed against the pile of bones. 'We're safe. "Tom, she's not breathing. 'His face became pale as the flames approached and the wind pulled the veil of smoke, riding through them. It was hard to breathe already, though he tried checking her pulse without knowledge of doing so. 'Stop, unless you want to join her, we need to leave immediately. Look boy', it started raising itself, there might be a timer to it. 'The crow almost twisted whatever it had of its body in order to warn Tom about the peril. 'There will be time to mourn her after, but you must go on ahead and get out. You owe it for both of you. 'It was any easier, but he had leapt over the platform and started going, grabbing on whatever he could to keep himself on it. 'I abandoned her. 'Tom said at the ground, just as the edges slammed. It was fairly hot under him, but not exactly what he'd feel after. 'What have we done, what are we going to do now Ian?" 'Return back to the ship and say no word, we need to make it through. You've done nothing wrong here other than caring for your life. "Then why aren't I feeling remotely guilty for this?" 'It was a grim thing he said, at which even the crow scowled and stood silently in awe. For one, it would've been expected for him to mourn and feel bad for what he had done, though this seemed rather strange. Standing there in the dark, it didn't take long for him to guide himself, going by the wall, without even taking a glance back. The girl died and Tom doesn't feel a thing about that. It might be that this place's getting to him, one way or another. As much as it may be getting to me. Thought Ian, in his twisted way that it somehow made it right. 'Well, I think I know the reason behind them having this. It was a way to purify the dead before they came to the other side, you know? A method for them to make sure that those who were missing limbs or had grown old and crooked had their shells start again with the destruction of the old ones. The runes as well, they told of it, as much as the idol. It was the guardian that warned us all that we need to return from where we came from. But we refused to listen. We refused. "Tom what are you talking about, how do you know all of this?" 'I don't know, for some reason, I seem to have that. 'Some time had passed and it seemed as if it wasn't. 'I should've been disturbed or at least heart by your presence and that gem standing so close to me but I've grown used to both of you. 'It seemed as if he was taken into a trance induced by the puffs of tainted smoke. The boy knew where to go, to the point of having been guided by what would seem like forces beyond his controls. Even as they ascended, the idol, the statue or that feathered black thing had no other effect on him. 'We must go before someone notices us, they might recognise you on the way. "They won't, I'm sure of it. But there is one place I need us to go through before we leave. 'Ian stood silent, after seeing him go towards the next pair of stairs rather than getting out. As much as he had wanted to escape, after everything that happened, this came first. 'Well, Tom-Tom, what are you planning on doing?' Without a word, he touched the door in a pattern which made it open. His eyes had almost lost their pupils. It seemed like he was still in that trance he once came out from. 'Well, now, this seems rather cheerful. 'It was a small room, ornated, nothing short of a treasure room, though everything was rather stingy looking for their prices. What interested him was the dead thing which was wrapped around in thin metal sheets. Rather, had it slept or were it entirely dead, there'd be no interest to him whatsoever. 'It's one of them. 'Noted Ian, after their previous encounter, there still came a shivering drop of his voice into a whisper. Though the size was fairly the same, this one was different. Tom appeared to be all knowing about this, even more than usual, to the point where he started unwrapping the entire thing. 'Ian, you should've known by now that there's a reason you're here with me. "I don't like where this is going Tom, could we just leave now? Before something wrong happens or we both get caught inside. "Nothing bad's going to happen now, I just need you to look at this thing. 'As he started unwrapping whatever laid on top, both he and the crow felt it hollow inside, without even needing to touch it for confirmation. Something was indeed the way it shouldn't have been and he was truly certain of it. 'Now, Tom, don't do something you may come to regret later after you snap out of it. 'The head bobbed for a second and that thing suddenly opened its eyes, tracing them around the room. It resumed watching Tom work, quite intensely on the matter. 'Now then, I need you to see reason Ian, I need your help to understand this, whatever it might be. 'At last, the wrappings snapped and the hollowness was revealed. It was the same condition which affected Ian, though it made it through a far worse state than the crow. That longevity was extended, at which price, he wasn't sure of anymore. Such a beast now waited on a table, unable to react or twitch anything else than the top of the head and the eyes. 'Tom, shouldn't it be contagious now? Coming from a rotten thing like itself? From the looks of it, age had torn it apart to the point of pushing out whatever it had laid in order to protect this treasure trove. "No, there'd be none of that, we have something that's worth more than everything here combined. And to top all of that, even more. 'The red came immediately to mine, at the point where they both felt it pulsating at the sight of that thing. A stronger reluctance stopped either of them from pulling it out, rather he was completely caught in awe by the beast. Rightly so, as soon as it ended, this little show, it finally succumbed to age and the hurt. It died rightly so under the unknown circumstances. 'Come out Ian, this is for your own pleasure. 'With a jump and a jabbering of wings, Ian came and stood on top of the far edges of the table. This is what he was planning all along? It came as a surprise, the green, the yellow hues and the visible liquid and solid matter that covered both of his pupils. Regardless of what had come unto him, how grim and much older he appeared to be, the boy still was in need of his service. It was big though layered, to the point where Tom managed to create several smaller layers after breaking the material apart. He immediately wrapped it around the crow's belly, making sure not to get the wings, pushing whatever fell from him back inside. There wasn't any know to keep them still, as it just worked as well. 'They won't be able to grant you immortality, but at least you should be able to survive longer than you should've been able to. I can do no more in the matter. "I asked for none of this Tom, but tell me now before we get the chance to move out. Is this what you have become?' A disturbing look on him came, the annoyance once the boy realised that he saw his real colours. With a grim grin, he used his hands to cover his eyes and after that, everything had come to normal. At least the colour matched. 'We have much work to do now, little crow, as it's time to hide. 'There wasn't any direct answer to this question. The thing which bothered Ian now was the fact that whatever condition affected Tom showed no signs of leaving. 'What about all this gold then? Won't someone know that we were first?' Rather second, judging by what happened here, wouldn't you say? It won't matter anyway, we're going to close the doors, both of them and never return to this place. This made everything a lot easier and I'm quite aware I have you to thank for, especially for the gem. 'With a snap of his fingers, he closed the gate behind of him, leaving the thing there. 'Don't worry about the next generations that might find this entrance. Now that I have unwrapped that, it should finally start rotting and spreading whatever ancient type of disease it once had kept it alive. 'Was this boy right? Could I have been in the process of decomposition? As grim as it sounded, the boy took both the metal tools out after he crawled out and threw them into whatever abyss laid a few feet away from him. There was no one there to look upon the deed. Another touch and he was ready to do it so. It closed behind, both inside and outside, making sure that whatever was trapped inside would never get the chance to escape. 'It's done.

"Not yet, boy, someone has to be aware that the two of us walked together. You were even wrapped around one another. "I don't care about the matter, we shall go to the ship at once and leave this place. 'The certainty was bizarre and frightening. It didn't sound like the boy at all, as a matter of fact, the knowledge didn't either. Though Ian never complained, the wrappings removed the feeling of being hollow inside. It made him feel as if that dream was true, where he was flying with his flock again. Before time was pale and before the pain. 'I will be taking over the ship now. There's no other way that this might go. 'Tom said, as he just passed through the tunnel. 'The others won't take this act so lightly Tom, not to mention that you're alone against so many of them. "I take it that you won't help me. "That's not the problem, Tom-Tom, you're just a boy, and I'm a crow. They have the numbers and the experience. What exactly do you think we have to stand against them?" Isn't it obvious? By now it became apparent that the jeweller spoke to the rest of them during our stay from the ship. They all know about the stone, it's just a matter of them coming to take it sooner or later. "Why did he wait for it then? He could've taken it at any time, he doesn't know about me and you're just a boy. "I used to be nothing but a boy crow, but you'd better learn that things like that are better-kept silent. Especially since I'm about to get the better of them. 'Well now, let's see what they think of me now. It was a thing that the boy had never bothered to look into, at least not until now, though he started watching their eyes. Tom would've noticed the presence of greed and the callouses on their hands if only he had paid a bit more attention. All that work and there'd be nothing but a lousy pay that wasn't enough to keep any of them satisfied. Even as he walked past the two lousy reeking workers, he felt the tension they had built up inside of them. 'Well, it seems that most of them had returned. 'Said, Tom, as he looked around. He stood there in the middle of the ship. No one in town had seen him go, and barely anyone had noted his arrival on the ship. 'Listen now, for I'm only going to say this once. 'Within his hand came the red stone, having a glow that was strong enough to pierce through everyone's eye and managed to get their attention. It was quite the fit, for it seemed as if it wouldn't have started glowing in any other possible encounter than this. A simple touch got their attention. Even as he stood there, on top of a box, Ian looked as well as the glow, which had subsequently taken his attention. 'Well, now that you're all aware of what I have. You might've spoken around, whispered behind my back, planned on ditching the boy and getting this little thing and claim it as your own. 'He could see some of them licking their lips at the sight of it. If that was their damn reaction, it was a strange bother to think about what they thought of doing now. Tom pushed the stone back and went on. 'I will say this once, from as much as I have heard, this gemstone would be enough for me to buy your ship and pay each and every one of you quite handsomely. That, if you decide to come in my employment and abandon this rancid life of going from island to island and having at the cracks. "How do we know we can trust you now boy? You're an outsider, came here within our ship, if my memory serves me right you were even a small imp that grew into a boy. "Whatever my past be, it doesn't matter anymore. What matters is that I have the means to take the hold and the least off your backs and give you something greater than this slavery you were forced into. 'This had certainly got their attention. Rather, Tom's voice had become softer despite his constant shouting. He became aware that past every window, everyone was looking and listening to what he had to say. But before long, an oaf opened his mouth. 'And what stops me right now from coming and taking it from you? Lad, I'm the same one who put you back in your place when you tried leaving the ship. I say, let's all band together and teach this frightened boy a lesson. 'Foolish one, the thought of him being punished was quite appealing. 'Would you now?' Tom asked, approaching the man. 'And who would stop the next on after you from slitting your throat in your sleep. 'Before the man noticed, Tom had already managed to move his hand over the small dagger the man wore at his belt. A shameful display, or having the weapon standing in plain sight and easy to reach. The head bobbed only to find out that there was a knife in his throat. Perhaps it was the difference in height which made it peculiar though it had done its task. A knife laid cold and the man could barely speak a word. 'Go on, put me in my place. Each and every one of you can try as well. I made you a fair offer, from which there'd be no foul blood lost unless it was necessary. Don't make me change my mind. 'With that, the dagger went flying into one of the small houses on the ship. Let's see if they'd listen now. The boy thought of it, even before the man managed to get a chance to catch his breath and retaliate. 'Throw him off the ship. 'Two larger men grabbed him by each side and stood there for a moment. 'Off the ship?' 'I know what I said, not on the ground, throw him off the ship. "Mercy, mercy, I didn't mean what I said, or what I've done. Please, mercy!' His shout fell on dead ears as they obeyed. Without reluctance of even a cold shoulder, they had thrown a man overboard without a second thought. His voice died as everyone else looked in shock at that. 'Good, well, now the next step is to come. We leave immediately and are to make it to the throne, understood?' Tom signalled for an addition of four other men to follow him down the stairs and towards the room where the captain laid. It wasn't locked, not that it mattered, though something was to be understood by everyone. Not even Zeppelin approached Tom as he opened the door and came to the conclusion. 'The captain isn't here, I guess. Is there anyone else on the ship that knows how to drive this thing?' The boy pointed at the man, just in case he wanted to speak, with a demeanour that couldn't be classified as something less of a wretch. 'What do you know about it?' The captain, sir, he, he's usually leaving and getting drunk before or after any stop we make. I'm afraid this might be one of those occasions where this happens. Oh, you mean, no, no sir. There's no one else on the ship that knows how to make it run. "It's well enough that I'll handle. Every one of you will go and take the word on the ship that we are to leave in an hour, with or without the ship captain. 'There was a slight reluctance as they all shared the same look in their eyes. For them, at least, it appeared that the boy was about to do something reckless. A thing which wasn't worth every rich he had promised everyone, not that it would come if the ship fell apart. They will listen to me nonetheless, I'm sure of it. 'Don't you want to be rewarded and abandon this life of yours? Isn't it this what the people above you would want to happen? Trust me and you'll be rewarded past your wildest dreams, more than you can imagine. No longer will you have to risk your lives during any attacks, no longer will you have to work. 'The rest was filled with the excitement felt by some of the men from behind. As a matter of fact, the entire tunnel was filled with curious folk who tried looking and seeing what all this fuss was about. 'He's right. 'Finally, the voice of agreement came. 'We've already gone too far with this, we threw a man. "I knew that man, he wasn't the most pleasant company, but there just wasn't any other choice. I can't return to my life again after doing this. 'And in a certain way, he was right to say so. Not that it would bother him or anything. It just didn't sit right with him for the time being. How the others looked at him, what he felt like after doing so. 'It's settled then, isn't it? You may all go and start the preparation. I claim the captain's room as my own from now on and I believe there's much to be done. 'Dismissed, the men looked at how Tom closed the door and listened from the other side. Neither of them knew how to react, as it took some time to understand. 'Are you planning on?' 'Not now Ian, we may have to wait a few seconds before that. 'Any sooner and they may notice something was wrong. The moment the key came into contact, they may force the door open and rebel against him before he even got the chance to leave. It didn't take as long as he had thought for them to go in their places. Sooner or later, it'd come, just as he went on and closed the door. 'That was certainly something to behold. "Tom, something's certainly wrong with you. "There's no one to help me Ian, not anymore. Isn't that right, little construct, Zeppelin, was it?' One gaze and Zeppelin retreated in the dark, being as reluctant to go out as it was the first time they met. 'Now, speaking of the ship. "You told them to make preparations for an hour Tom, it's far too dangerous. 'Though he wasn't concerned with any of it. As far as he knew, there wasn't any stopping now from what he had become. Tom started pulling the lever and pressing the various buttons, manually twisting cogs and trying to figure out as he went on. 'Press the lever at least, before the steam blows up. 'In the corner laid a small clock-like device, which measures how much of the steam built up as the ship-work went. 'Good call. 'Once pressed, it managed to go out before it could reach too intense a level. Far from the ship though, just as the engines were stopping, the drunk noticed and heard the terrible sounds it made. A grim black smoke arose and the sounds of metal piercing stone. It managed to cast upon the town quite the unsettling pair of looks as they heard something happening. But most importantly, out of everyone, the captain finally arose from his slumber and yelled. 'That's my ship! It's my ship and they're leaving without their captain!' He said once he lost his grimace. Covered in stone dust, he started racing towards it, throughout the town and into the fray, past the stone plants and into the dark. Once he came into the light, the captain noticed that the ship had already lifted itself a few feet off the ground. 'Catch me if I am to fall!' The captain shouted, with quite a few glances from the people behind which decided to follow to see what was making all the noise. 'Catch me I said, there'd be no one to stir the ship if I am to fall!' The man went on again and spoke of nothing short of this madness is the end of them all. Damn those people, none of them would listen. 'I could've fallen if I decided to jump. This, I can promise you, every single one of you will regret this decision I'm telling you! That ship will fall. 'Said the man, until his speech turned into an inaudible mumble. A small bottle was thrown into nothingness, just as well as it fell, never to be seen again. There were worse things that could've happened but at least the ship remained in the sky with most of its people on board. It went slowly but stable, lost in the clouds, at least going as fast for the time being. 'Well now, Tom, what might it happen after we reach that point? Something's telling me you're not planning on repaying any of them. 'As tightly shut as the door were, he was more than aware that no one would hear there the conversation between the two of them.

Henceforth, there came the truth of the matter. 'No, I wasn't planning on either paying or even making this entire journey with every one of them alone. It's the extra weight, you see and from what I could tell, there should rather be enough for this little cabin alone to reach the capital in no time. "Could that even work Tom-Tom? There were engines and floating devices that I've seen outside, certainly, they would keep this ship working. "Everything's incorporated, let us just see. 'At once he left the captain's seat and just looked how Zeppelin was out of sight. He was still there, hiding, though this was slightly disturbing to be left alone and unattended. 'Well, it should be here. 'From under the table, Tom dragged a map and started unwrapping it over. Curiously, at least, Ian asked. 'How did you know where to find it? As a matter of fact, how do you know where we are and where we should be going? "I don't entirely, for a fact, I'm mere guiding myself from sight and memory, nothing more. But take a look at this, and just how much it would've taken for us to reach this point. There are at least a hundred mountain tops, and that isn't counting the fact that there are stations everywhere around. "This isn't what you wanted to show me, though Tom. "I know that Ian, but first I needed to show you the reason why I'm doing what it had to be done. "Won't they be stranded here, alone, in the middle of the sky? "There was some ponder on it as well as on any other issue Tom encountered. Though, Ian still didn't understand. 'None of them will, the closest island is just mere hours away and I realised that if they know how to start the engine on their own they will be fine. 'From under the table, there came the schematics which were needed. Further explaining was fairly needed now. 'For you see, this is equipped in every detachable part of the grand city, every house, every single thing that has a roof, a door and people on it has the ability to fly. "Then why is there a need for the floating devices and the bigger engines below. "Simple thing my feathery friend, it's because of the weight everything has added together, with the fact that once the buildings start coming together, the engines can't work. 'At least, there came the last thing Ian could've thought of. 'Well now, this is most important than, how will they be able to stir and control the ship without a wheel? "They won't. 'With cold hands, he went back to the wheel and started pressing the buttons in order. 'Damn thing is stuck. 'There also were some audible mumbles past the door. 'Don't worry about that though, there won't be anything passing past that. And from the looks of it, there's another storm to come. 'On his feet again, he looked around the room, grabbing a small illuminating device which stood just at the bottom of his feet. The captain's delight, written on it, a rod of some kind of light turnable at both ends. A peculiar device which seemed to have the light caged, in a systematic set of metal bands. It's good enough that I might use it. With that, Tom appeared to have not troubled to find the first lever. Standing against the wall, it seemed to have been covered by a pair of saggy clothes. His own as a matter of fact, making it seem like the captain either had no care of he had more than entertain the thought of abandoning the others. Nonetheless, after he snapped it back, with a strength that shouldn't have been there, the crow came to its senses. 'We can't abandon them during a storm. "They most likely deserve it. Even now, they're above us, plotting to take the gem and over the ship. 'Even if he was right about it, the men started to rebel. There was little to none of what information was to be given as they stood there waiting impatiently. 'He gave us an hour and he lied. Not to mention that he abandoned our captain and made us kill a man in cold blood. Why have we even listened to the boy?' As the haze in which they were in seemed to diminish, most of them managed to snap from whatever they were in. 'We need to take care of him before he starts doing something reckless like driving directly into a cliff or a mountain. 'A bunch of uproars came from the crowd. They were all on the top of the deck, each and every single one of them who laid foot on the ship. It was fairly more than serious now in what they were to do. 'We can starve the little beast, I bet he'll come crawling and licking his boots just to get some bone to chew on. 'Neither of them was able to hear what was going on below. How every level was turned and how a piece of the ship started shaking violently. At least that was the point when he had their notice become apparent. What follows next was the last one, as quick as it came, there wasn't any time for any of them to come up with a plan. The piece of the ship came off as easily as the levers went. No wonder why this happened whatsoever, as it came to him below. 'Now we're done. 'Ian and Zeppelin both appeared to be looking in dismay, though there wasn't any doubt about the fate of the people on the rest of the ship. The rest of what he had was fast, but not fast enough to outrun another storm. It wasn't the fact that there were shouts there, but the rest of what laid behind started slowly descending than anything else. 'It's too late now. 'Chaos was in store for them, another voice came shouting, and soon enough everyone went into their homes or regions, ready to do the same. At least those who knew, others didn't. But standing at the threshold of the winds and clouds, it appeared as if there wasn't anything they could do anymore. For the time being, it appeared that it was as far as they could go. They had nowhere else to go as they waited for the wrath of the lightning and of the storm. 'We need to escape before they come. 'It was always a sign of them when the weather changed all of the sudden. Most hadn't had the chance to see it come, but it far from coming from above. As the beast came from under the ship, seeing how it stopped, it snapped it in half, pushing the engines away and crushing the floatation device. No time for shouting but despair, the only thing which remained was the fast-moving piece of the ship, which wasn't entirely safe. Tom was doing as well as he could do. But once he came at another threshold atop the sky clouds, a bolt of lightning hit his ship. It was the time he realised what happened to the rest of them, most likely dead in an instant. Burnt corpses fell with their ship, though he was unable to verify whenever it was true or not, that's what he had expected the moment he released the ship. Another bolt managed to land and shake the ship into another direction. 'Damn things must be pretty annoyed at something, but what?' 'Tom, don't take any chances now, just descent as far as you could get. 'No, that'd be the death of us all if we reach too far down there. I can make it even with a piece of the hulked ship. 'At the words of which, Zepellin stood by his side, locked against the panel of the ship. He was fairly big now, but it figured he'd come closer. 'So far I believe this may be the safest spot to be in. 'Even with the change in him, you could easily tell that there was reluctance in his voice. Especially in the moment, there came a full impact with one of those wriggling beasts. It came from below and raised itself as far as it could go, creating a point of destruction at point-blank which ripped a piece of his ship apart. 'Hold on, there's the wind!' With a warning, he noted that he was the only one struggling so far. Zeppelin felt nothing whatsoever and if it came to anything, Ian could easily fly and get away. For what it was worth, there was only a hole big enough to be covered. 'Be careful Ian. 'Said the bird on a cracked voice. At which he became reckless and started sprinting to the locker. It was heavy enough but the boy managed to turn it around and push it as far as he could. Luckily, it only managed to get a piece of the wall and not of the ground, for there wouldn't have been a returning after that. With the last push, Tom covered the wind tunnel or at least a part of it. Other smaller pieces were being pulled and soon covered whatever remained by themselves. 'We need to increase the speed if we're to make it through this storm.

'There were other beasts coming as well and this was no time to waste. Tom looked at the controls and started pushing every button, pulling levers and in the end, having to resort to something else as well. 'What are you planning on doing with that thing?' Above, there laid a small compartment which had some tools, most likely used for maintenance. First, the hammer and the pick became far too useful. Even though the ship started wailing and be affected by the various grasps of wind which pushed and pulled it from one direction to another, the boy had to go on. With a blast of the hammer, it became apparent that he opened the controls. Plenty of wires laid there and other devices on which dust had settled it. Some of them apparently left the impressions that it worked with the wind itself in order to cool everything down. 'Careful what you're doing boy. 'I'm more than certain on what needs to be done. 'With a few snaps and some pushes, he came to the point of starting to cut some of the useless ones. At least as he was working, they had caught him again at unawares. Two of them coming from opposite directions just slammed themselves into one another. And in between they came the ship, cutting through a great bulk and crushing whatever it was that kept it in the air. With the reluctance he had and the little time to think, he had nothing else but to grab onto Zeppelin and brace himself for the impact. It appeared as if the end came sooner than expected for all of them at last. Tom felt the pressure and started feeling fear again for his own life. 'Go away, you can fly Ian. 'The boy tried shouting, despite the fact that the crow was close enough to hear. 'No, I won't leave you now, after what we've been through. I just can't do it anymore, there'd be nothing better for me than to go on ahead and get a final end with someone that's worth it. 'Tom said nothing more and regret none of it, as much as he was changed, there wasn't any stopping to this. As they all fell through the various tunnels of wind, the ship finally reaches land. When the moment of the impact came, all three of them were utterly destroyed. It was a saddened day that of which was true, but the fire that sprang from below wasn't all to it. Tom still stumbled in the dark with Ian, far, far away, still lost and mourning. It was the mere fact that he was delayed by this and that of which he found light only after stumbling to get near to the point of crawling that he did so. 'Where to now Ian? We can't return anymore, she's dead because of my big mouth, isn't she?' 'It isn't because of you Tom-Tom, you should've known better than this. 'The boy nodded, as, again, stumbling upon the climbing of the stairs, he covered his eyes and went on. It wasn't anything short of an unlucky thing that he found himself trying to get out. Though when he reached the last room from which he came out of, his eyes widened as he looked in shock. 'Someone close the crawling door Ian, we're stuck!' As the shock came, it became obvious that something happened during the time he was away. 'It is, boy, you'd better find another way unless you're planning on spending the rest of your life here. 'I can't, we can't spend the rest of our lives without food or a place to sleep or. 'See to it that you search for a way out as fast as possible now Tom. No one's going to help us otherwise. 'Tom started going through the runes and the various objects in that dark room. It became obvious to it that something was fairly wrong as the room was empty, leaving nothing else other than the ruins. As long as the shouting came, there came the plea for help. The boy shouted and shouted until he got a sore throat and he couldn't do it anymore. 'Can we break the door open at least?' 'No one has ever done it before, keep searching now, it may be our only way out. 'Tom started crawling immediately in the small tunnel. He tried seeing whenever or not there was something out there which he could press. None of what he could do mattered now, as a matter of fact, it all came to nothing else but gazing at those tight walls. Nothing laid of which he could use and this was certainly something he wasn't going to let go. 'You can turn around Ian, it's safe to be on my belly. It seems as if we should be getting quite comfortable now, especially since there doesn't seem as if there's a way out of this. 'The moment passed when the boy had the chance to give up and he couldn't deal with it as pleasingly as he sounded. 'What do you think might happen if no one comes searching for us?' 'The ship might leave for once Tom, I doubt they'd be waiting for a lost boy, especially since there'd be people around to take care of you right here. And that man, Ayles's father. 'I know, someone needs to tell him what happened, if we may ever escape from this. 'The problem with that Tom-Tom is that we might never even get the chance to show him what has happened to his daughter. At least not without risking to go through the same thing all over again. 'The crow finally gave the accent into a crawl. It was a baffling this that he, of all, spoke as much as he could, at the request of the boy. Before silence fell in that dimly lit room, there came a thump. 'Did you hear that Ian?' 'The crow came with his head out and started listening to a lot more carefully than before. 'I heard it as well Tom, go on ask for it. 'Is someone there? Please, we're stuck inside and I don't know what to do. 'At least there came another thump and a striking voice he couldn't recognise that well.

From beyond a wall to another, it became obvious that neither of them could hear one another properly. Nonetheless, the violent pounding continued. Each strike made a distinct sound as they went on, both of which shouted at one another. 'He heard me, I'm sure of it! It may not be something he could understand, but someone's there, trying to help us. 'Immediately after what he told Ian, Tom went on ahead to shout his lungs out, making sure he'd give it his all until that which bore itself from below started coming. From what he felt like, someone was bearing far too much regret, to the point of wanting to come back. An immediate strike left a crack in the door, which made it seem like it finally came for him to be understood. 'Can you hear me now?' 'Lad, is that your voice?' 'He heard me, Ian, now I'm certain!' This came only to the level of barely understanding one another, though it still remained the best that they could get. It's all that he needed to succeed now in escaping. If this is Zeppelin, he won't be really succeeding anymore, at least not at this point. 'Listen to me, there's only one way to open this, it's a hidden button somewhere on the wall. You need to feel for it in order to find it. There's no other way around me, trust me. 'The man grumbled but started looking desperately at the wall. His voice was still barely there though he agreed to go on with the boy's plan. Despite the initial attempts, there was nothing felt against the wall. 'It will take a while but I'm on it. 'Came loud and clear once the pounding came to a stop. For the both of them remained just enough time to speak. 'Tom-Tom, you must listen to me and heed what I have to say. Keep what happened to the girl a secret from everywhere else, there's no other way unless you want to be blamed for what happened to her. 'But I've had no part in it, how could I possibly be called to answer for something I haven't done? It was her own fault that she wanted to explore. 'Listen to me Tom, no one will care about the reason why this happened in the first place. Everyone will only seek someone to blame and that person will be you unless you shut your mouth. 'Their whispers did well as he lifted himself above the crawling tunnel. Ian was sure that the boy might get punished the moment other people become aware that Ayles was with him the moment she died. It didn't help either that he knew exactly how it happened. 'A girl is no longer among us and it's certain that it might be because of you. 'Do you truly. 'There boy, come before it falls. 'Tom came to a crawl when he saw the man holding the gate from falling down with his

bear arms alone. It was an admirable feat of strength and endurance, well received as well. He wanted to tank them, but only after he was out. Tom knew that something had to be done. Once the boy was out of it, he looked behind at the dark figure that laid hidden. 'Am I being paranoid again?' The man left the gate but didn't hear the last part of what Tom said. He was concerned about him, as well as anyone who was left behind. 'You're the captain! How did you know?' Before he asked anything else, he looked around, as if to look in surprise for Zeppelin, though it wasn't him. 'I found him in the city, for some reason or another, it hadn't stopped following me. A useful thing I'd say but I've got bad news your you lad. 'There couldn't have been anything worse which he could receive now. Though he was wrong in thinking that, at the story of their abandonment, it made him lose faith and his will to go on. 'How could this happen? Weren't you supposed to be on the ship, making sure things like this don't go unattended?' 'I'm sorry, lad, but this was something beyond my prowess and I couldn't have laid there alone for my entire life, that's certain. For what's worth, it shouldn't be as long now. I sent a message, carried by a stricken bird. At least a week from now, a ship should be coming to take us. Well, unless something comes along which be fairly convenient for us to make do. "And until then? It's not like I have a place to stay or anything to do while waiting. There aren't even money for me to spend on food or the basic needs. "Don't worry lad, you'll be more than helpful, I know you will. Just follow me and we'll return to the capital when all is done. Though you may think we're lucky once you'll have the news to yourself. 'As they walked towards their new home, something still lingered inside there, left as the door cracked and locked itself. Someone seemed to have been abandoned in there without a chance to escape, being as silent as possible, without even bothering to raise suspicion. As they made there was, it was more than clear, that thing which helped them, a construct they called it. Tom knew from where it came from, making it clear that sooner or later, he had the chance to meet her father. 'Are you all right boy? Feeling out of the weather I presume, it isn't that worth it to lose your head like that. We'll get our chance to leave. "It's not that captain, well, what was your name again? I've known you for a while and yet I forgot to ask about your own name, for which I'm certainly sorry. "My name is Edward. "And I'm Tom, fairly excited to make you acquainted. Oh, and he is Ian, my crow. I mean a crow that's been acting as my companion for the entirety of this journey. "It's a pleasure to meet you, my feathery friend. Quite rare seeing one of these so far from the years before, well. There's a time where things need to be said and perhaps you may be tired, lad. It's been a long day and doesn't worry, I know the right thing. I'll need all the help I can get in order to stay afloat, we'll be working as partners from the next day on, deal?' There wasn't any contract or anything of which he had in mind about this request. Nonetheless, the boy trusted the man who saved his life and promised him shelter for the time being. Something got him to shake on it, or a hunch that would either bite or ensure his survival. 'Trust me, we'll get it through. 'Those words had to keep him as docile as they would, as far as he was aware, it wasn't going to take less than what he expected. A week already passed without a noticed as he entered into his system. For, the people around had given him simple jobs, that of which could be performed by a child. Tom worked as hard as he could with anything he could receive, being stone picking of sweeping the floors. Even at nights, when their cheap rooms held, they were standing on beds which were facing one another, speaking no words but hearing the mumbles. 'One week already passed, hasn't it?' Said the body, appearing as surprised as he remained. It was quite the bothersome thing, repetitive at most, having to go through the same process on a daily basis. For some time, it became apparent that he had forgotten what it was like since he was standing home with his real family and had attended parties. Even if it was from the distance, he could feel the warmth. 'At least the nightmares died, right? We could call that a victory. "If you're pleased by such a thing. One thing that hadn't appeared to have been noted by you Tom, the fact that they've taken Zeppelin. "We'll get it back when we reach the capital. "Unless someone takes him. "We will, now, if you don't mind. 'Despite being a city of stone, they still used some sort of technology that worked. Devices of metal that stored inside of the batteries that powered them. From where did they get the energy to begin with? It was quite the mystery they had become aware of, both him and the captain. As a matter of fact, there were other things that needed power, which seemed to have been used by denizens. Obviously, they had to take it from somewhere, to begin with, but where from?' Just go to sleep Tom. Tomorrow's the day. 'At which he did wonder, a peculiar thing at that. It's been a week and still, no one was looking for his once lost friend Ayles. No one asked, nobody even looked, to the point when she was missing after his arrival. Her, how come no one's asking about her? It was something which made him finally put himself to rest. As much as he was concerned, there wasn't anything he could say about it and walk freely to that ship that came the next morning. The only problem is that there wasn't anything to look upon. Both he and the captain stood in their position, waiting and looking forth for something to come. 'Well, I don't think it's coming any longer this day, lad. "Why is that? You said they'd come in a week and a week has already passed. Why, why is it so?" I don't know the lad, but it would seem like we're going to spend a lot more time stranded here until someone comes. Unless you wish to build another ship that is. 'It angered the boy for a good reason as well. The captain tried hiding it in from Tom but he had little to no avail on the matter. As far as it went, nothing pleased either of them and nothing would. Unless it came to the point of both of them returning home as safely as possible, there was only return to this life in the quarry. One work the mines as well as Tom swept the floors and carried stones. It was time to accept, for the time being, that there wasn't any ship coming as he had thought. Though nothing was as pleasant as it seemed to be.

Far away, in the kingdom, the capital, the main seat of power, the king stood alone, looking at the same map, marking the same spots. The ink was dripping on the floor, and at once he came back to the throne. He thought and looked into one of his skyboxes, peering into nothingness. Something made him shiver and made him mad and upset. It was now a thing stored in memory, converted from one of his skyboxes. Every time he looked into it, he saw the moment when that bride of his to be and his servants got destroyed by a wriggling beast. A snare came into his mind and his gauntlet smashed the box as his gaze went with a grimace unmet by a human eye. They will pay for everything that happened, I'll be sure of it. 'Even farther than the rage of the king, in the city where he reigned, commoners were unsettled to even look at the sky. It was something to admit to oneself that it seemed like this was beginning to approach the end of everything which touched the sky. Even as clouds were torn apart, most thought of ill when thinking about what those things reaping through the air could do. The Two Calves Inn, it was called, a tavern of some sort, in the lower regions of the capital. It was placed rightly in a region that had the entrance from the docks, perhaps fairly close to the right. Place with something in mind that would turn heads at the sign and the symbol it bore. Though even more pleasant was the attitude there had been inside. As much as most of the lords being worried about everything which laid in their possession falling apart, these people were filled with joy. Drunk perhaps, but no to the point of a blow. 'May I bring you another pair of drinks?" "Keep them going Galda, keep them going!" There were joy and the playing of the flute, going around from round to round. If this place was threatened to be raised to the ground, what else had they do to than to celebrate everything? Some tunes were more than what they expected, at least during those times. One would even go ahead to throw a dark glance at other people in the tavern who appeared far too happy indeed. As for others, there was no bother as that, other than the fact that no one could sleep upstairs from all the noise. Down the road, outside, as well, no one was standing still. It was fairly accepted over the fact that there were things beyond them that needed to be taken care off just so that their livelihood would continue uninterrupted. Roofs were reinforced with extra layers, the most expensive ones even had especially tiles attached to them. It was a simple thing that placed itself between two tiles and acted as both another layer and protected the blind spot as well. 'How's the work going up there?' 'We're getting through with the preparations sir. 'Supplied by the king, it was a special kind of metal that wasn't supposed to act as a conductor of lightning or any other detriment that would come. The man knew that sooner or later he'll ask for something in return for what's he provided for the city. Same went with everything that stood tall and pale, walls or poles. Being covered in thin metal sheets, made it seem as if the main goal was to misdirect whatever bolt of lightning landed on the house. It wouldn't help in case of a direct attack. 'You, girl. 'The Lord pointed, with his branded finger at a peasant girl who stood around looking. Usually, there'd be others to talk to them for him, but this was one of the rare occasions when he had to do it himself. 'Tell me, what's the reason behind everyone having scattered inside and how come you're out?' 'Everyone's scared my lord, that's all. They say that the big sky lizards are coming to eat our town. 'Nonsense child, well, perhaps not all of it. But how come you're. Damn impertinent child. 'There wasn't any answer for she immediately went out of sight, walking through the alley, losing herself in the dark. Times were harsh and this was certainly something they were more than aware. Desperate measures had to be taken everywhere around. Past the noon and in the dark, the poor and deprave, opened the valves and hid in the sewers upon hearing that of which was about to come. In the worse case, they though themselves as a tribe. Already they were a dozen of them, walking together, hunting rats and making their best attempts to stay alive for the duration of the crisis. Not everyone bode well with this, as it seemed as if a big part of the city started shivering in front of their eyes. Soon an announcement came to the king who peered from far away fuming at that. 'The nerve on them. Every single one of them will pay for what was done. Bring me a body, now!' 'Spoke the king with a thing that bore nothing less of rage and power. One of his protectors went outside and returned sooner than expected with a common man. He might've been tall, with dark hair or something or a moustache, still growing in his young-like appearance. From what he could tell he was at his prime of age. 'What have I done my lord?' 'Nothing, though, it would seem that you have been selected for something much greater than you might've thought of and for that I need to thank you. And I'm aware that it's a rare thing to do, but I can't stress it enough that I will make this worth it for both of us. At least for the time being when this rebellion or attempted thing comes into being. Go on ahead. 'Confused the man peered no longer. A hand came from behind and chopped the man in perfect halves going from somewhere at the abdomen. It happened too fast, or was it the poison placed on the hand that did it? Nonetheless, with his life extinguished, another one of his guards took a body, while there came a third from the shadows. 'Let's get it over with, I've got something to stop. 'With each of them having one piece of the body in hand, it was time for the final part of the process and for his time to come in motion. There wasn't any need for force now, as the royal guard pulled the king out of his lower half with ease. He saw it almost come out like a melting candle, seeing the metal act as nothing less of that. It came off without pain or blood but a parasitic thing that needed something to grasp and feel upon. From his lower half, already sprouted some sharp things that wanted or needed to attach themselves to something. 'Go on ahead. 'Spoke the king with a voice that had almost shown signs of weakness or being tired. Though this was easily got rid off when he had access to the lower half of the man. It was immediately tainted upon contact, as the armour grew out of the skin and covered everything which laid below. 'Bring the other half, immediately. 'At his command, the lower half tied itself to the higher top of the man, creating a perfect copy of himself. 'Good, good, this will do more than fine. 'He said after looking at the other, how I moved and checked himself. There was a period of time where he stared at his hands moving and then at himself. It was something to be proud about, as he hid now in the shadows. 'You will go and take care of it now, understood?It's your problem to bring resolve and avoid our loss. Two of the royal guards will accompany you as anything more than that might be an overkill, to say the least. "I will obey. 'He said something that would've never been believed to have been seen coming from the king. At least these halls were almost empty if it weren't for the two of them. Too thick of walls for anyone to eavesdrop and too dark and shallow for the lungs, in case one decided to stay too long in the room. At least that came without his attention or permission, a kind of punishment that was deemed only fair. 'Now go and make I will come true, solve whatever they started now and return to me. 'Hidden in the dark, the higher top of the king brooded as he waited. It was a strange thing, seeing the king alive and well, walking in the sun, when most people thought of him as a mere legend in a suit. Nothing proper or formal given by most people, though one could look at the fact which they were forced to hide. He only threw a look and it became apparent. 'Those damn lords struck a deal, it seems that the region is far too great and it extends too far away to be just one of them going rogue. 'I must see to it before it's late. He walked as if he wasn't bothered by the danger, not to mention that the least it caused, such a big piece of the city was the destabilisation of the entire structure. The thing of which magnitude wasn't made since ages long. With each step, it got worse. 'No, this might be worse than expected, we need to get there as fast as possible. 'At the rise of his hand, both of his guards heard his command. 'Run as fast as possible and bring me whoever started this entire thing. But not before you prevent this from breaking apart in front of my eyes. If that thing happens, we may not be able to make them return. 'They started sprinting as if they weren't even supposed to resemble humans anymore. No break or weakness of anything that would drag them back, not even the fact that they had to defend the king who was left alone. Those commoners dared look madly upon their king for asking his guards to go on an errand. Though none seemed to be as concerned about him as they were of the immediate threat. Clearly, there wasn't any return from what was to come now. 'Let us see now, how this will end. 'He said as he continued walking slowly. It wasn't supposed to happen, but at the same time, another strike came. From the opposite part of the city, the ground started shaking just as violently as before. As mad as it seemed, this was planned all along. The king needs to know. 'No. 'His voice came aloud once he realised the fact that there wasn't time for this. Someone had to stop this entire thing and there was no one else to help him since he already sends both of the guards there. I need to do it all alone now, everything's in my hands. 'Just like the times of old. I will save all of you now!'With that in mind, he was certain to go on ahead and prevent what could turn out to be the great start of a war. At least in the best case scenario if the ancient machines that held them above didn't fail. The weather didn't help either, over the fact that he came to the point of fighting against the stricken wind. No one was on the streets, other than few that watched upon him like they were looking upon a mirage. This turn of events didn't seem to bother as much of them as it did on the other sides. One would even think it was expected. 'To think that they would plot behind our backs, those vermins will pay!' His gauntlet touched the edge of a wall and broke it with ease. Certainly, that was a way to prove that he was no mere trick of the eye. The king came to the edge where it was slipping and noticed just how long it'd take, after all, other things were in mind. Levers had to be pulled, the lords had to talk with one another about what was to be done, not to mention the mere fact that he went through almost unnoticed. Breaking through the door of what appeared to be one of the bigger mansions were rightly so, familiar with the notice. It was something that bore him as he watched in the sky cube, in one of the memories that he had witness forth. The architecture was out of this world, at least. 'Fool, this isn't any time to be watching and to admire, this could turn out for the worse. 'Despite the size of the gates, he pushed them through, even if he was barely alive for less that would've been expected and had a fraction of himself. It was still a fit which made the guards that stood on the doorstep back. Once because of the initial shock and the second once they realised he was the king of flesh bone and armour. 'This ends now, I'll have no one destabilise and ruin for what I had fought for!' Without realising it, more than half of the region stood behind him, trying to peer upon what was to become. Not everyone was a supporter of the crowd, though most of them appeared to agree that this was a mistake. Good on them, now that they see the truth in all of this. It's time to act upon the impulses once again. Though, it couldn't have gone smoother on the other side, as the royal guards had no trouble pushing through the doors. Breaking them apart had nothing more to them than the mere action. What was more troublesome for them was the fact that there was a disaster that needed to be avoided. From the likes of which they were aware. It was a giant piece of the engine which forced the entire thing to move. That reason laid behind why the entire capital shook behind so loudly. Not only that, but the harsh wind didn't do much to help in this tainted conundrum. Both of them stopped and gazed around. There wasn't any lord or any other guards around. Someone knew that they were coming. It was certainly hidden away from the commoner but there wasn't any denying in it. This was the reason why the city moved, not to mention that it'd also become the reason why it would fall. Without a doubt, there wasn't any telling of how far would this ancient thing be able to lead the piece of the town into the air. Even worse was the fact that they needed to stop it under any circumstance possible. 'Wait, wait, I surrender. 'Yelled a lord, just as he laid at his table along with his fellow guests. 'Neither of them expected to see the very king standing there and peering upon their plans. At best, one guard would've been enough to do the deed. 'Tell me before I become really mad, where is that thing that's causing the destruction of my city?' He was lenient but stern, no one could read or see through his helm, but he was trying to look ahead. Where could she be, that damn woman who threatened me. Luck was about her, it'd seem, as far as he was aware, if she was there, to begin with, at least someone would immediately get punished for what was done. For now, this will have to do. 'I'm not in the mood for waiting for any fool that decided to. 'Pardon me, your majesty but this wasn't my doing, or any of ours, to begin with. 'Then what's the reason behind this insolence?' His voice crept it and everyone at the table started lifting themselves up. At once he leapt upon the table from where he was standing and gazed directly into his eyes. 'Lead me to what's making all this noise. 'As he followed the advice, he went ahead and opened a door, leading the king himself with a taken torch. Despite the fact that there should've been a trusted servant leading the king there, he insisted that the lord should come. Walls were shaking, and the man just went on ahead, to cover behind. It was a bother that everyone saw the fact that he had secrets to hide behind their backs, even though most of the people at the table already had more than they claimed to be. 'Go on, no tricks now, even though we are alone, I could crush your bones and dagger at the tip of my fingers. 'His voice ran through, not that he wanted to. 'I wouldn't even dream of it, your majesty. 'That of which was indeed something to think of, as merely so as it may. It was carried for protection and this was off when they reached the depths and the darkroom which had the machine inside. Same thing, hidden from the sight of the commoners. From what he knew, this wasn't much, to begin with, as he was one of the two people who knew where the third generator laid. 'Now, let's see, who acted upon this now? I'll hear no lie and won't ask you again. "I don't know my lord, this wasn't something which we planned or anything of the sort. 'Dumb fiend, if only you were later.

Though the man, after seeing the armoured devil go on and start twisting and working at that. Mere second and it was off, something which he had taught his guards to do as well, hundreds of years prior when one group of bandits did the same. Both of the sides stopped at once, at the point of being synchronised. Perfectly, they pulled themselves together, at the price of that huge abdominal noise that ran through. 'Now that we're done here, it's time that we would get some answers. 'It was too late for him to react as the king was half-way through the stairs. His gauntlet felt no flame as it came onto the fire and crushed the cinder without even a bother. For as far as it went, this place was far too deep for anything to be said or done, but the shouting went nonetheless for minutes at the time. 'Shhh,

I've come to realise that you won't be much of help to me in this form. That's why I've chosen you for a better purpose. 'It was the slash of the hand that ripped the man apart. For this thing was done in the dark, desperate and alone. He forced himself into two pieces and came together on his body. As this process went on, there came only one thing in his mind as he hid in the confines of darkness. He will have my memory but won't remember this. 'Take my place and return to your task is done. None of this exchange happened whatever. Remember, the traitor has been found and dealt with, nothing else is their concern. 'Cowered in the dark, he brooded, knowing what to expect upon his return. This copy of a copy went on and delivered the message to the other lords as he came on, though it meant little to them. Most of which expected that to happen. A strange air laid around the king, though none seemed to care. For their best, it was, rather, the fact that he needed to get away. At least, while the king down below was shedding his armour and crawling like the thing of vileness and despair. One step away from the mansion and the king was praised for saving the capital again. Another step and he was reunited with his royal guards. It was almost as if everything was far too easy than he had thought of, the least of which he had cared. People loved him despite never having seen him. For the most part, he was the saviour that came only when he was needed, worshipped and adored. Most importantly, in his mind, he was bored. These runts dare look at me as if they understand what I'm made out of, tainted things. I'd show you all if only I wasn't in such a good mood. Before his thought could finish, he was already there, standing in front of the entrance. One royal guard opened the door and as he came inside, the two finally went through with it. 'Now my task is done. Quite the name I've made for myself out there, isn't that right?' He was aware that someone was in hiding, just as it was planned, though one thing hasn't bothered him. At least, not until now that he came to face the fact. Sooner or later, there couldn't be two kings in the kingdom at once. Just as well as it came to it, one was out there, hiding in the dark and growing, coming to be more primal. 'This thing of ours might've backfired once on me. It's a sad thing, I'm aware of, to look upon your own face, flesh and blood and feel as if it's tainted. Though it's beyond my control. "What's that supposed to mean?" Just as two of the guards went into the darkness and around their designated pillars, two others came at last and grabbed the king by his sides.

It wasn't that he wanted to do so, but he needed to do it. 'You do understand why I have to do this, right?' 'This is preposterous, unhand me immediately, I am the king!' 'Barely so, I've instructed my royal guards to recognise those from myself. "Is that why you won't even reveal yourself? Coward, runt! No other reason remains, other than the fact that you're just as bad as the rest of them. The rest of us, we wouldn't even dare stoop so low as to end our own blood and flesh!" Enough now, I'm doing you a favour, it's not as if you'd like to end up like those outsiders or to be locked at our own risk. It has to be done as my duty to protect this kingdom from any threat. "I've done nothing more but what you've asked me and now I'm to be executed?" Guard. 'Finally, the third one came and place his gauntlets on the head and the eyes. It was an obvious procedure, though, in the end, he wouldn't even see that face that of which he was made out of. 'Aren't you, the least supposed to do this yourself? I am you, couldn't you care the least for your own blood and flesh?' Bone and cinder of my own. For this reason, alone I cannot stand to watch myself die again, like every previous time it happened. Guards. 'This came fast, at least as the gauntlet suddenly crushed half of the face, immediately followed by the second. It went as fast as there wasn't any sound or struggle, but a sudden fall from grace. Pieces of the armour fell like feathers out of the bird, revealing a rotten carcass that slowly turned to dust. 'That meat suit wasn't supposed to rot so fast. It must be getting through to me. Carry one and clean that up, I'm sick already of watching it grow on the bottom of my floor. 'As he came back from darkness, he laid on his throne, alone. There was just enough silence, though nothing was enough to hear. Far from him, in a mansion soon to be inherited due to the absence of one of the lords, it already came to it. A hidden door laid there hidden for good. Despite having most of the servants flee from the place, something was left behind, brooding alone. 'Soon. 'It spoke the word as it glimmered at the engine that kept a piece of the capital afloat. Soon it'd come to it. From the likes of it the memory cube still laid near the throne and as he watched again, he saw that sick desire. Smashed, crushed, burned by a bolt. That beast had done it once again, managing to take another thing of his desire. And no immediate response came against this type of threat, at least not one that of which he'd approve. In distance, so it rained, a common thing to say the least. Too much of it had passed, as island after island fell, the dread coming at the bottom of the world once their livelihood got destroyed. As far as Tom was concerned, it went as long as going on to the capital, taking what he needed and try returning home. 'What'cha be thinking lad? You were looking at the outskirts of the stone through nothingness for the least of the hour. It's time to face the fact that it might come to the point where we won't be coming back. "I need to get there captain, you wouldn't understand. It's fairly complicated, please understand that. "Everything is in this short life of ours, everything is. 'If only he knew what happened to Ayles, or at least anyone in the city. More than rock, their connections ran deep throughout. He had come here only in wonder but witnessed quite a lot. The machines moved, under his own sight, that of which was magnificent and made him forget about his troubles for a whole. Nothing that seemingly powered them, other than the pieces of stone it seemed to be fed with an already they had carved additional tunnel that went through. Nothing bothered him more than going past Ayles's father, the man he had recognised before and had his head put down by the fact. Neither of them appeared to know one another in person, other than sight. Even with that in mind, he had never seen the boy before, despite him wearing the same attire as the people around. What they wore and the silence they retained was expected to be kept by strangers and those new people who joined their ranks. Something managed to keep him thinking about that nervousness he felt while walking past him or seeing him from the distance. 'Feeling all right lad?' 'I'm rather well, still can't believe they left us here without a notice. "Oh relax lad, it happens all the time. "Have you ever abandoned someone on an island or a destination then?' 'Well not myself but I might've heard some second handed stories from people who claim to have been taken and left in places in which they shouldn't. An awful thing, incredibly awful thing. 'The mist thickened after the hard rain and a yellow light seemed to be creeping in the distance. 'What about that? Could that be a ship? That light over there, sinking in the darkness, it seems as if it has its route around here. "I don't know about that Tom, we may not know who's inside of it. That kind of light doesn't appear to be the regulated type of a carrier or anything that might've stepped upon the capital. "Relax, if it's a ship, we may use it to get off this rock and finally dig into civilisation. I mean a real one with kinder people and others who don't treat you with a cold shoulder. "You may want to take care what you wish for Tom-Tom, or ye' may get it. Civilised folk may be just as cold if not even colder than your average stone person. 'Whispered Ian as he raised himself to throw a glance. He was watching everything rather carefully, making sure never to take any wrong turn or something that Tom could do and screw everything up for the rest of them. It was peculiar after all that no one else had come outside. 'I should've known it, something's strange about this sip young lad. "What else might be waiting for us then? No other ship may be coming here, so it may be better to take our chances with it. And look, it's even waiting for us as if we're in a dock. Come on, captain, follow me! There was a reluctance to it since the ship was old, tainted by something, dirty under every side of it with some kind of sea life remains. Regardless, no one appeared to be in it, though as soon as both Tom and the captain came on the ship, it left the stone caverns and sailed into the mist. 'Perhaps you were kind of right on this one captain. This does seem a bit too eerie for my taste. 'Despite that, something made Ian feel rather at home. It was the fact that with every step taken by this ship, the air around it appeared to be curving around the form. From one look, the wind almost formed waves that reflected pools of water. 'Look at that, it seems quite interesting, wouldn't you say, captain? Captain?' 'Leave him be Tom, he might've gone there to explore, most likely lost himself over an ancient bottle of wine or two. "At a time like this then?' 'As good a time as any. 'Answered Ian with a twist of the tongue. Though he noticed it as well as he could, a rotten thing of wood that appeared to be spreading and corroding everything related to wood and in-between. For the likes of it, he was rather entertained by the idea of looking around and seeing a flock of ravens, though that never came. 'You're thinking the same thing as I am, aren't you Ian?' 'Reminiscing about that dream boy, you should know the better since on more than one occasion you were there with us. "There are others here as well?' 'We were a flock, as I have said. "And all of you have this ability?' There was another nod of the head at the question, as far as he was aware, this world was big, enough to hold an entire species. Though the boy hadn't asked, Ian was sure that this sudden ability to speak came only to those who died before and came back to life on this land. 'Well, Tom, you should start looking for the old man before he gets himself lost or killed. 'Ian's voice was rather cold and amused at the thought. It was the mist that did this to him though and the sweet, sweet memories. A rather calm appearance now laid on both of them, being left alone in a place that they could explore. Most importantly, it couldn't have happened without that small lamp which hanged just as the top, dangling from side to side. Three or four candles laid inside, and it was rather, a trick of the eye which gave it that dim colour in the mist. 'Someone must've lit those recently if I'm not mistaken. "Good observation boy, it might be that the one controlling the ship might still be around, seeing how it's still moving. 'With each step laid a creaking sound, at least on the other rotten planks which laid at the bottom. A single hole laid in one of them, which freed enough that one could peep inside if they desired. 'Just to make sure of it. 'Said Tom as he knelt to take a look. 'It was rather far too dark for him to say anything or even be in need of such a thing. Nonetheless, he tried. Something was definitely below, crawling or moving, though this appeared to be too much of an old thing to have those constructs on board. 'A quick trick boy. "I know, I know, that's what I was going to do. 'Tom suddenly pulled out his head and looked at an angle. It served right as the light came it, just enough for him to get a look. The highlight he saw there, despite not being fully fledged to light made him shiver for the first time in so long. For once the light came to an eye and as he covered his mouth, he realised who that might be. Blue eyes came to his mind, the captain's there. 'Ian, I recognise those eyes, it couldn't be his, we were separated just moments ago. How could this have happened?'He walked around thinking what to do. 'It's a curse, it must be. How else could you explain everyone around me dying in a way or another?It must've followed me ever since home, since the incident. "Calm down boy, there's nothing wrong with you, there's no curse but whoever did that might still be on the ship. 'From his teary eyes, he looked around in frustration. It was the fact that they were just the two of them on the ship, lost in what appeared to be the following mist that frightened him more. 'He's still here?"Yes, Tom, he's most likely still here, watching or peering. It could even be. 'Ian's voice suddenly dropped after crawling to the point where Tom could feel his beak touching his ear. 'That he's still down there listening to us bicker on what's to be done. He might even be planning his next move against us. "What are we going to do?"Move slowly boy and take a look inside the cabin. 'Tom moved with as much care as he could care to pass, making no sound as it came from the creaking on the floors. That came as no surprise. At least what followed was peering inside. One door which laid closest to the end, in which it came to be that the captain went. That's where he spent his last moments. There were ancient windowed panes that stood there, dirty and cracked. Even the metal that held them in place started rusting. One thing was made clear, whoever controlled this ship, if it ever came to it, ripped out the wheel. Regardless, about everyone who came on the ship had to fend for themselves. 'It's never that easy Tom. Psst, psst. 'The crow suddenly pointed with its beak towards its left. On the wall laid three metal bars, medium in size, just heavy enough to make an impact. 'Someone left this for us, I'm sure of it. 'Looking for his best options, the boy appeared to look at the door. It held something which bore a holding pair of joint at each end. 'We could just insert a bar, then quickly get another. 'He stepped fast and placed the metal bar into position, but laid silent. The sudden noise prompted whatever was behind to violently shake the door and beat it as hard as it could. It seemed strange, but Tom refused to think or move at any given time, for this mere fact that he was soo close to it. 'Take another bar, boy, that won't last for long. 'For the second and the third, he grabbed them both, ready to either throw both of them or the least to use another one to block the door. As long as he stood with them or did something. Ian protested at the fact. 'Do something boy, he's. 'It was the last stroke of heavy violence that pounded the door and broke the bar in two. When the door opened, it suddenly slammed against the wall then suddenly started making its way back, creaking just as hard. Tom's every sense laid tingling after looking in fear, ready to faint after the shock. 'Move boy, do something now. 'Faced now with him in the dark, he wanted to play it seemed. Looking at the metal bar on the ground, he realised that it was hollow on the inside, making it no wonder why it broke so easily as it did. Nonetheless, both of them appeared to be aware of it by now. Once his nerves suddenly calmed down. 'It's an invitation, he's welcoming us in. "What do we do Ian? I can't even move. 'Said Tom, after doing his best to try sniffing it out. Neither the weather nor the place did anything else than bother him to the point of fainting. 'Do we have a choice? Use those bars at least to keep him from distance. "Ian, there's no light inside of it, I cannot head there and expect to return. 'There was another way that of which he expected, which might've been too painful to even think of it. Not that Ian hadn't thought of it either, but one glance into the boy's eyes and he realised what he was thinking on. 'We have to move now Tom, slowly, go into his nest and return with that. 'Once again he pointed at what appeared to be an empty panel. There might've been a wheel there, at least once but it could only lay in one place now. 'Leave the bars next to the door and shove them both once you come outside. I won't be able to whisper to you once we're there. 'Slowly he acted, having each step just feel like a needle having pierced deeper into his lungs. He appeared now to be peering into something, wondering if he was there. Once there came to it and the bars were slowly placed in position, there came a hand and wrapped around the top of his head, where he couldn't see. A second hand came and covered his mouth and before comprehending, he was shoved inside and thrown across the stairs. The door closed with a distinct sound of keys shuffling. Before he reached the bottom, his nose was bleeding and he crawled into the first corner, waiting. It was uncomfortable but the smell was even worse. Perhaps it was even the fact that he knew that the captain was there, locked with him around. And the man was no one to be seen as a weak man, at least from his point of view. How could I stand and fight against him now? Please make no sound Ian, I cannot stand to be inside. The creaking of each step made him sure of the fact that he was coming. It was no mere wonder why he slowed down, just to take a feel of what was about to come and take care of him soon after. Nothing made him patient as this crept into his hand. Did Tom think of running and of hiding, crawling or anything but to where? There couldn't be a way out, not even Ian could've seen a way through. It isn't my choice to do so little man, but you'll understand it nonetheless. He felt only the slightest movement, one of which he couldn't understand.

But once the man got a hold of his blood, he'd just turn around and start following the trail. 'I'm sorry Tom. 'Ian came out and headed for the top of the stair, or the least that he could do. He stood just between the last step, almost as if he thought himself to be nothing more but a plank of the sort. It would've been certain that nothing would've happened, though it did. One step came forth and crushed a part of his ribs and body, just at the right moment when he slipped on the blood. The men fell and Tom only heard the sound of the crow. 'Take the keys boy. 'Heard Tom but didn't know, he crawled as close as he could and picked up the pair of keys which laid on the bottom of the floor, thrown around. 'Ian, your body. 'His hands wrapped around and as he turned inside, he noticed just how damaged the crow was. It felt as if his body was too thin, way too thin, almost belonging to an animal who has died from malnutrition rather than anything else. 'We need to go before he wakes up. 'The man laid across the stairs, that of which he knew to check. It wasn't that he wasn't planning on escaping but that he saw a twitch in the dark and retreated immediately. 'He's still alive Ian. "We got the keys, just hide. 'Inside of what seemed to be a grim place, there was a cover on top of the body in the middle of the room. With the exception of the clothes, it seemed as if he was placed in order to be operated. Hide, little, Tom. Thought Ian, as his look appeared to be scarce. It didn't seem obvious now but he cherished the boy as much as he could. Not even that, the lease he thought, it was something which he owed to the boy for taking him there. Even now when he was shaking covered and looking past those curtains he could see. Blood dripping from above, none of the keys rang. Immediately after the man lifted himself up, he felt mad about what happened. He threw a tantrum, going around the room, slamming objects against the wall. It was a sharp knife he felt that ran through the body of the captain, even though he was too far under him to feel. The slamming of metal against meat made him shiver. A sliver of those feet laid there and as he looked around, he saw nothing else to do. Tom waited, the man didn't know where the boy laid, it was a strange thing for both of them. Especially the horror the boy felt once he heard teeth start slathering upon one another. They must've been sharp, for he was hungry enough to eat slab after slab. For this reason, alone he wasn't fainting, at the thought that he was the next one to lay on that table as the next one in line. Each moment he appeared to be looking at the bottom of his feet and see how much more blood came out of it. Pieces soon fell, disgust made his attempt to throw up, but he caught himself by the mouth and swallowed. What followed was a complete stillness and silence, that of which he dared not do a thing. He could've noticed, but he stopped. After what seemed to be minutes of this he went ahead to slam thing against one another and try looking around for the boy. It was long before he turned and pulled the captain long, which stood now in front of him. Brass fingers missing, his ring missing, and pieces of his bone as well. Don't breathe through your mouth he thought, don't cry now, he'll hear. 'Despite his warnings as any other thing, he struggled to do that just as well. Just as he realised that he had a weapon there, which he might've used, that knife. It was dragged against the walls, making the most terrible sound that could be caught in a small space. At least, if it weren't for that small hole above the ceiling there would've been no hope to lay around. But it went on and on, with that terrible sound, followed by him returning and slamming against the body, then returning to that thing. And each time he got closer to planting his feet deeper inside the table, till the thought of him being found out came to be expected. He felt ill, to the point of having to constantly feel the acid in his belly come through. He'll find me if I do that, I know he will. Ian was hurt and that's when the thought ended after he came again to it. From this point, holding his hand atop of his mouth started hurting. But no amount of pain was worth giving in that he'd be hurt. He must've been hurt from the falling, though this didn't seem to be the case. Something drove the man into this hysteria and this rage. It made him rinse and repeat the same until he stopped and fell unto his arse and stood there for a while. From the little space he could look through, he saw his lay. Could it be a trick? The boy wondered just how much of it he knew. It was a small room and he needed the wheel. What made it even worse was the constant dripping blood that kept on dripping from above. Though there was no man to make that sound, he might've tired himself out. Crawling, the boy thought it but a hand. It was Ian, who tried whispering, with his broken body, back again. 'Look. Down. 'There came the words, perhaps something that couldn't be heard by anyone, even if it came to someone who might've come close to them. It was the keychain, which appeared to be bearing a small, sharp, key-like pick made of iron. Obviously, he knew what he implied, despite his best attempts not to cry. He'd hear them make their sound before it came to it, alas. 'Pull. It, out. 'Continued Ian before going back to covered. He was just as tired and as hurt as the boy, though they both appeared to have known that this was the only way to go at it. Wait for him to fall asleep. Slowly, he placed the keys down, making sure that he wasn't found yet. With a piece of his shirt, he held the keys and dragged the pick, which had a small hole through which the ring came through. Slowly, at the sound of each drop of blood and every whisper of air that came through that hole, he moved an inch. It took far too much time, but it was the only way he felt like doing it. The man suddenly grunted, at which he stopped. The danger was the least of his problems now, it was the fact that he wondered whenever or not the man knew he was hiding under the cover. It wasn't the time, but he tried getting it through, pulling through one of the segments and having to go through a rotation. At least now he felt as safe, once he released them. Tom couldn't even dare pick them up from where he left the keys, it would've made far too much noise. Just as well as that, he dared not peek outside, until he was certain the man was sleeping now. He might've hit his head and done something wrong to the captain, but the man might've still had something in him. One more minute, please, just go to sleep and never wake up. It was the first time that he hoped for something bad, the second time he had encountered with such a thing. There'd be no running now, just do it already, there's no one to save you this time. The voice in his head said something which prompted him to crawl, covered in blood, from the likes of it now. One chance he'd get, the man had a cleaver, after all, just one swing was enough to take the captain down. Even though it was a dark figure, he recognised it through the dark. First, the boy checked whenever or not he'd fall under the light. No, there's no chance for that, I need to do it now. Brave thoughts came, but the boy was shaking. The crow was silent, without knowledge whenever or not this was an idea to be entertained, but the man snored like an ox. Being just under his nose, this came to into his mind.

Just shove it inside his neck, be over with it. Could it be that easy? The boy both wondered and felt afraid, his muscles were frozen, his will to live was vague. But when he saw the cleaver far from his hand, he realised it was too heavy for him to lift it alone. 'Do it, boy. 'Tom thought of returning under the cover and hiding but felt the breath of the man going faster each second that passed. 'This is your only chance boy, just get it on!' His hand was shaken but he could barely stand without shaking at the thought of ending up like the captain on the table. But he was forced, a bite from the crow, just around him made his impulses go wild. His muscles jointed by themselves and threaten the pick deep into his neck. The man roars or tried roaring while bleeding and pushed the boy as if he was nothing, hitting his head against the table. It was shoved too deep for him to grab it but the pain prevented the man from grabbing anything other than his neck. 'Get the keys, Tom. 'Ian noted how the boy grabbed them and rushed for the stairs. Despite being too many keys to try, he never lost hope. Attempt after attempt but the fourth try came like a swooping thing. He almost leapt and closed the door behind, with the key. 'And the bars, boy. 'Despite having it locked with two bars as well, he immediately felt the man pounding on the door. It wasn't the fact that he hadn't any strength left but the sound he made once he fell down the stairs was horrid. Tom finally stood in his fetal position, seeing Ian for the first time. This was the worst hit that of which he could've gotten, seeing the crow broken to the point of marrow. A crooked body that was almost entirely crushed by a hard boot. 'This can't be Ian, it's all my fault, everything's my fault, it must be. 'But the crow spoke no more. It was the time for its silence to come, taken by the other ones now. Nothing could patch up what was truly dead, just as well as nothing could now make him either. Tom wrapped himself against the bird and held it there for some time. It was a gentle thing as he waited, that's until he gave in the exhaustion and slept. Here he is, Tom thought. The crows were all there flying on the ship, but the water came to be far too deep for him to enter. Tom laid at the shore, looking from afar, recognising Ian and the others. How they flew from pole to pole, sitting on the reeds for moments before flying away. Why can't I shout or speak to him? Tom attempted to say something, anything that would do, though no word appeared to make any mark whatsoever. He sat down and looked at him distancing himself away with his murder while waiting. It was the moment when he knew that they were never going to meet one another again. At the same time, despite knowing it so, he came into the water and opened his mouth again. Despite having no sound come out of him, he tried again, up to the point where the water came to his neck. As hard as it seemed, Tom managed to keep himself afloat, until the point where he felt the strings in his neck and mouth suddenly snap. He shouted at the crow. 'Ian, I'm right here, don't leave me. 'At which the crows, hearing that shout and noise, suddenly disappeared from sight. I've scared them, it can't be, he can't leave me. Tom appeared to be gazing at the empty boat at which he kept on swimming towards. For some reason, then and there, it was the only place in which he felt as if he had the ability to swim. Not that it helped to reach the boat, seeing that once the splashes came to an end there wasn't much around. The gloom made it too grim and all the crows are now gone. Even the boat stopped its advance, being stilled to something slower because of the weight. Though Tom waited there hoping that Ian would come. It took a while but there was nothing to it, as every crow had fled away. At least, it wasn't long until something bumped against the ship and woke Tom up. Bluntly said, the boy was caught off guard. A shock came once he realised where the body of the crow laid. It pushed him away like a small stray cat seeing a rabid dog on the street. And just as he leapt, he turned around and managed to see that fact that the ship stopped. It appeared as if there was a rock, sitting in the sky, floating, which blocked the advance. You would've loved to see that, wouldn't you?' Ian, I. 'There wasn't any point at that, though he felt as if this was more than a sign that anything else. Tom grabbed Ian in his hands and walked slowly towards the stone. 'I found you on a mountain, haven't I? I'm sure you would've liked to know that you've ended up on a floating piece of rock. 'A teary-eyed Tom-Tom, that's what the boy felt like, finally releasing the crow. It must've been a bother for so long but now it came to an end. 'Ian, I'm sorry. To have taken you for so long and dragged you here with me, you never asked for anything but only came to help me. 'The thought was ruined at least for him, there seemed to be something which made Tom realised just how much he had used the crow. Now both him and the captain, Ayles and Zeppelin were either dead or gone. 'For what's worth, I don't know how far I'll get without you but I know you're in a better place now. I just hope I'll get to see you fly with your flock once again, you know? Just like we used to dream about, together. 'Tom's voice seemed to dwindle now that the boat appeared to be moving again on its own. It took a turn now, as it forced itself to move forward to the point of going around the rock. Slightly deviating from the point, Tom moved and look at him for one last time. 'I won't give up on this, I'll promise to come back and have a proper thing for you! Did you hear me, Ian? Wherever you are, I'll return to you and bring you to that place we both saw in our dreams. 'After which Tom fell flat on his back and looked through the mist of the sky. It was often that he had seen that, but the light of the candles still seemed to be on. What could it be now?' The boy thought this might've been a trick of some kind but for a moment, Tom thought he had heard pounding on the door. He can't be alive, not after everything we've been through. 'You're not real, I ended your life now. Just leave us alone, you bleed to death, I'm sure of it. 'Though those hits were just as real as he thought them to be. 'Tom. 'A slim voice called, though once he realised like what it sounded like, he couldn't believe it. It's the captain, no, it couldn't be. His skin was carved, his hand eaten, how could he still be alive? It must be a trick made by that sick man. 'Tom, is that you? Help me, lad. 'Even from the other side of the deck, his voice was still as clear as a willow. The boy finally came to his senses and went to the door in order to see. It was a pity in front of his eyes, for the man saw that once the door was open, one metal bar after another and the keys, it was too late. He fell unable to stand tall, bloody, dripping, barely alive. 'I'm so sorry, we shouldn't have come here. 'Despite everything that happened, he bore no resentment towards the boy but stood there suffering, still waiting for someone to come. 'You need to throw him overboard boy. I know it's hard, but it needs to be done. There's no possible way that he might get to you now. Nonetheless, someone has to take care of the body. 'Despite the open wound, he waited for Tom. It was already harsh after what happened down there, but who was he to question it?' But he almost got me, captain, he almost did to me what happened to you. I can't go back down there. "You need to be brave, boy, just come closer. 'To the point of standing bowed to the man, Tom finally came to listen to what he had to say. 'Thank you, I feel more comfortable standing down now. This needs to be done if you want him to pay. He won't be able to bother anyone anymore now that's he's been dealt with. But do this one thing and his punishment will finally get through. 'Tom cried whilst nodding his head, finally giving in. It was hard, as far as going around the body and down the same path through which he barely escaped. 'Shouldn't I pull you out as well?' There was a grunt, which he took for granted. After all, he needed to make so space for the man to come through. 'Don't turn me around, boy, you wouldn't want to see at the span of the day what I look like now. 'Tom nodded and complied, going ahead alone just like any other time he felt as if he had faced danger. It wasn't as dark, but then again, this wasn't what he feared. For once, he stood and looked at a pile of meat and managed to see it in the dark. A grim pair of thought came to him, including paranoia and the thought that he might've been faking in the entire time, just like the captain. Could a pick in the neck truly end this monster?" There couldn't be any other chance, he's waiting for me to do something. It wasn't long until it came to it, at least, that's not what he felt like it. 'Get a hold of yourself, he's dead, Tom. He cannot hurt you anymore, he's dead, dead, no longer alive. 'The stench confirmed that at least to him alone in this room. 'I need a light first, I can't do this in the dark. Back on the stairs, he went ahead and avoided gazing upon the captain, working around to getting a hold of the lamp. This wasn't too far away from his reach, neither was it tied by some convoluted mechanism that held it in place. It was a hook that came into a hole. Warmth kind of started filling him, at least to a point. Now, this would do, somewhat, the presence of light made him more comfortable than having to drag a body through the dark. From the likes of which, a heavy body to say the least. One more thing came to it, whenever or not he was ready, he thrust himself into the woe. The captain had already lost consciousness, leaving him alone to deal with the entire thing. I hope I'm doing the right thing, thought Tom. For what is worth, there wasn't any telling whenever or not he did it. Just a sloppy thing, a grey room that had a bench stilled with blood, his many instruments laying there and most importantly, a steering wheel. That madman had yanked it right off. Looking around and seeing how many tools he used made Tom's innards cringe at the sight of the sharpest and lousiest. Most of which still laid stained from one point to another. Still, that painted man, looking as if he was a golden hairy beast, holding the meat suit of a human. 'Just drag him off the ship, he's dead. 'From all those stains and how his neck was placed, it appeared that he had died from that pick, never even managed to rip it out at least. Drag him, just one leg at a time, no less or longer than it should go. With a malicious intent, he placed the lamp on the edge of the stairs and came closer. It was the fear that stilled him to this, that he dared not throw a dark glance or even speak of something ill while there. No loud sound that might wake him in case he was still there. Just grab him already. Thought Tom, at eventually it worked. One foot at a time, seeing the body and the colour of the neck and the fat that amassed throughout the night made him swallow his heart and throw out. Right down the stair, some of it being dragged on the body. Look away but do it, the captain said. But the boy couldn't help it and did take another glance, furiously letting go and feeling nothing but a desire to grab something sharp and defend himself. 'He can't do anything now.

'With a gesture he never thought he'd find himself doing, he spat on the body, like a mad sailor, caught in a trap. Dragging him was hard, both mentally and physically, but the captain was sure it needed to be done, at least. There were a few ways this could've ended in Tom's mind, at least from the sight of so many tools lying there. At least some of them would've made it far more satisfying than having to carry the body and throwing it away. Carrying the body felt as if he was bothering himself with a giant sack filled with rocks. Dissatisfied with the restful, Tom looked away as he did it so. The fact that this man had almost come close to killing and eating both of them bothered the boy. 'Is this good now?' 'Almost, Tom. Throw it, overboard. 'Said the man, just before turning and seeing the boy carrying the body. For what was worth it, certainly now, he would be sure. It was hard to have to wrap himself around the body in order to push him, but at last, he had done. The deed was the done and the man had bored his last moment where he was in a piece. Without a doubt, he'd land somewhere in pieces by the time ground reached the body. 'He's no longer on the ship. 'Said Tom, with a final breath of release. I'll go get the wheel, just hang in there for a moment. 'It'd be the last trip down there that would've been made. Tom realised that he was still dirty with his own blood and the one belonging to the captain though that didn't matter anymore. What was important was reaching something of a shore. Fairly so, there wasn't even a need to have the light standing atop of the ship anymore. Before long he was carrying the wheel, managing to get back on deck on time to see the captain who had crawled towards the edge. 'Captain. 'With the wheel placed on the side, he went ahead and walked towards him, seeing that there wasn't any other option. 'I need you to do me one last favour, boy, before long I won't be able to feel my limbs anymore. 'It came to the lips but Tom already knew what he demanded, even before he even spoke of it. He had left at least a trail of blood from the table where he was used from, all the way to this point. The chances were against him, even with so much blood lost and gushing wound. Even the slightest glance at his eyes had revealed to Tom that the man had lost some of his sights now. 'Throw me with that man, we should both be there. 'Looking down, it was at least obvious that they had passed the ground, making it seem like the captain would be lost in the sea. A fitting thing at least, Tom helped the man get at least on his feet. Though one thing still bothered the boy, to the point of having to look away. It was the sight of the man and just how far it was that he was cut. For the likes of which, it couldn't have been more gruesome if one tried doing so. 'It's all right boy, I know this won't be the end, though even more so I know you'll end up the same way as the rest of us there. On the cursed shores. I'm certain that we'll meet one another, soon enough. 'With a grin, the captain lets go of himself and fell overboard, still letting himself have a last bitter laugh before going into the damned land that laid there. 'I'm sorry captain. 'There were no other words spoken in the manner, other than the fact that Tom chose to go on with it and plant the steering wheel, he had no plan, nothing to drink or eat as a matter of fact. And that point, he realised what the captain meant to say, he thought I would try to end myself once I realised what awaited me. Disregarding his opinion, perhaps he was right, thought the boy. He could stir the ship but wasn't able to know whenever or not he could handle it himself. The mist still appeared to be coming out of the small ship, no matter how peculiar that sounded. 'Another one. 'A voice said through the people asked for another. 'Another one. 'Came again, this with slightly more pain in the throat from the people in the crowd. They had gathered to throw their rotten fruits and vegetables at the fool who got caught and thrown in a pillory and shamed. He had stolen or was stolen from, in the capital it made no difference as long as the poor man appeared to be poor and angered some lord. Nonetheless that distraction, one lass hid in the shadow and peered at seemingly the sky. Lady Katherine was not satisfied with how this had turned around in the capital. It was almost as if this entire conundrum hadn't happened at all. Damn that man, he almost tore everything apart and pulled it back in place all by himself. Credit aside, she knew that something was truly made to appear it like he knew everything that was going on. And every calamity was being dealt with immediately before people could realise it even happened. I remember what those simple minded people thought when it was done. 'The king himself came. Look, it's the king. Could it be the one of which they speak in legends? How could he be alive?' Fool after fool was impressed, not that his height was something to be laughed about, but it was also that determination and fearlessness that made him appear invincible. In a way, without realising, she got affected just as well as any other, but in a different way. At least she had desired a different thing than the common man who couldn't look past his ear and go around at the sight of their king. Even though most hadn't seen him at least once in their entire lives, until that moment when their saviour had to come. Unlike any other lady, this thought made her look away and spit on the ground. One of them went missing and it was obvious what the reason was. No heir laid at his mansion, other than the third kind of relative, bloated man who already went on to use his assets in the worst ways imaginable. Damn that man, he could've made something out of it, but it came to pushing it too far. Bitterly, it made her just thought more ill that needed to be done. 'Just wait for the night, my lady. 'A voice called. Katherine listened and as soon as it came to it, another meeting came at last. It was the fact that they all had brought that special kind of distinguishable lamps which signalled the fact that they were, in fact, part of the same kind of cult. Altogether, in the dark, brooding on what had to be done, still mourning the loss. 'Shall we begin with a motion at least?' It was a hidden place, somewhat under the tower. Not as dirty but Lord Frediek owned it and subsequently everything which laid under it.

From what it appeared, there laid a two-headed tunnel which leads to nowhere, used by the people behind generations for storage. It worked as well as he could've thought of it. Though their use differed, it served just well enough. 'This plan failed, I knew that no one should've listened to you, tainted diamond. "Step aside mournful mist, it wasn't as well as that, neither of us planned for the king himself to raise himself up from that rotting place and deal with him face to face. "It would've made no difference at all if either he or one of his guards came to both ways. Haven't you seen it happen? Not even a handful, that's all, as soon as he arrived, there wasn't any stopping for either him or the guard. "Then what are you planning on doing now?' A deeper voice said, out of everyone there, even those who were present, he was the oldest around. At least to the point where he managed to catch two or three generations at least. 'Well, there's no point in arguing whenever or not it could've happened if we did this or that. We might as well try to deal with the problem as well. 'One thin man came, stating the obvious. It wasn't as if no one knew, but they weren't expecting one of them to both acknowledge and come up with a plan. 'We can defeat his guards and get directly to him. That way, we may be able to regain control over the city once again, just like we used to. "Punishments would come just if we seem to fail over that. And I do wonder if there could be a worse fate than death waiting for every single one involved. "Enough of that, he thinks he may be the only one who owns the forges and can cut through those beasts. But I seem to know something that others have missed. This weapon he supplied to us, just look at it, notice something. 'It was indeed a spear, though that wasn't the point, neither over it or any other face surrounding the weapon except one simple detail. A stained tip laid just as well. Filled with something that seemed clear. 'He might've seen it by now or not, I cannot say but you're all wrong. That one guard he sent was careless that day. 'It walked through and crushed any door that stood in its way, ready to bring everything to the ground if it came to it. From the point where it entered the court and the garden, no one dared glance at that massive thing. Since it was only fair that everyone would rather think of cowering if fear at the sight of it. Next thing it acquired was the sight of the place, making its way through. Even the common hired thugs fared against knights of people of higher order but dared not get against them. Such strength that ripped a metal door apart and it was as thick as they came. It almost felt as if those gauntlets shook the entire building as it came. 'And your point being? From the way you're talking about it, for me, it seems as if you're looking at them with quite the level of admiration. "You'll see where I'm getting at in a moment. They are strong, tainted, perhaps even impenetrable, or so did I think myself just like any other sane person who wouldn't try to get too much suspicion on himself. 'Which brings us to the point he came through, ready to that the engine at any cost. Luckily, it knew how to operate the machine, or else who knows just how much of it would've been abused to smithereens. Though the way to it was dark and steep, I made sure, right through the wine cellar, though no bottle was broken. It almost seemed as if it was a dream for one second before everything going on. From the first attempt, nothing happened, but one of my servants saw it all. 'He returns and just had himself scratched against the tip of a spear. "You already had one of them, you bastard! So, for how long had you planned on brooding with the king as well behind our backs?" Calm yourself, Batholomew, it's not worth it. "Listen to the broad, after all, she knows better. Now, behold just at the scornful tip of his creation. Whatever he had planned before, he now decided to supply every single one of us with weapons that could kill every single one of his guards. And of course, everything behind his back as well. "What about the servant of yours?" There were an awkward silence and a smile. Of course, no one knows what kind of information would be left alive to roam on his own. He died in the most likely, awful way, a thing to be looked at, but done in secret just as well. 'Worry not about anything, for I've dealt with the details. Before he realises what happened, we'll be aiming at his own throne room and shooting at it with no remorse. 'Henceforth, this is the plan, simple enough to work when you have him proving the own means of his destruction. 'Whispers and banters made the entire hall loud as it was. Everyone was thinking of what meant and how exactly it had to be done in the end.

'But what if they won't reach it in time?' "What if those harpoon launchers won't be able to turn towards the king?" Have I not told you all that I have thought of everything myself now? If that doesn't work, we should have just enough to stop his lackeys if case they try stopping us from separating the capital again. "Again with that plan? I thought we were above trying the same thing over and over again, knowing it'd be to no avail. "No, fool, just listen, for I'm sure you'll understand now. That's how we'll pull him out, the moment one of his servants come, we'll shoot right at him and end it so. When the moment comes and he'll have no one left, he'll have no other chance but to come out himself but it would be too late for that, won't it?" So we are separating this after all. 'Some men nodded in agreement, unlike the rest at the meeting. It wasn't that they weren't pleased by sharing it, more like the fact that the split was uneven. At least two of the size were unfit to be spared and given to some of the lords who wanted the entire thing for themselves. 'We'll be split into factions just like we planned in the first place and after that. 'The man looked around nervously, at least the having the thought that someone might've been listening at the door. 'No one was there. 'Hopefully, we won't see each other ever again from that point on. Or at least, not until we begin to trade.

"What about who gets what? I hope you won't pretend to have forgotten that the split from the machines leaves it quite uneven for some of us living on the side. "That of which I cannot help lady Fox. Certainly, you'll have to excuse the fact that it isn't my fault that it comes to it. But this city, this flying abomination was never meant to be entirely whole. "That certainly doesn't answer my question, now, does it? I'm fairly certain we'll be able to take something, one way or another for compensation. 'And she didn't mean that in the friendliest way possible. She couldn't mean, a war, could she? Right after the king died and everyone took their share, they'd be more than armed for everything. Not to mention that the old crowned fool was planning on placing reflective armour on every roof and shelf which laid around. It'd be quite difficult, though it was inevitable. 'Nonetheless, a toast then, since there's no need to think of it any further. Ever since its conception I've had this dream of finally taking over and becoming king myself. Though I'd be more than pleased to make it an equal chase. I'm more than sure that some of you might agree. For us. 'In a roar of voices, they all appeared to be blunt and precious as they said, for us. As well as anyone else could be, this meant trouble, everywhere in the night. Lady Katherine wasn't there, but far far away. 'John. 'She called to a man. 'Yes, my lady?"Has Rose return from that of which I sent her to?"Not yet my lady, should I send word or anything. "No, no, don't do that yet. We shouldn't just assume anything happened to her as of yet. 'Unless they discovered her identity as of yet, though he doesn't know where exactly she went either. 'Just have her come to me the moment she arrives, that's all. "Immediately my lady. "And bring me another cup of eating, I long for something to quench my thirst. 'With a bow, he returned to his duty. It was dark already, but sitting at her desk, she still worked at the lamplight. She wondered at the fact that her thoughts went immediately ill. What left those marks on the books? Sharp-like things, claw-like, but not that kind. It almost appeared as if there were a sword-wielding thing and an animal which accompanied it. 'But why would you come only to attack my library?"There had been a dress hanging on a small frame that almost came to resemble her. It was something that came as unintended if one were to look into it any further. 'Someone must've been after me. 'For what was worth, it wasn't helpful that she had sent Rose to masquerade as her, especially if it came to them finding out who she really was. All this for what? One needed nothing more than to catch her in her sleep, she thought, if the worse of it happened. Suddenly the light came to an end. It was alarming at best if it wasn't an occurrence. 'John, the generator. 'In the distance, it came as a murmur, though she knew that he'd deal with it one way or another. Or at least one of the others. From her drawer, she still kept and lit a candle. It was fairly an antique of its kind if it weren't for the fact that there were eight more laying just in case things like this happened. As often as they were, there just wouldn't be enough of them. Minutes passed by. It was important for her to finish the letter and send the announcements as fast as she could do. After all, it was important that every ship and every piece of the city came back with their provisions. There'd be no more going in and out without permission. That was a general idea, once it had become common knowledge that islands were disappearing. News travelled too fast for people own sake. 'Thank you, John. 'She said it as soon as the light came back and just in time for another letter was done. Such a peaceful night laid outside, that it was no wonder how he felt. Far away, the boy, Tom, starved, thinking of his thirst. Below the decks, there's be no coming or going. From what he saw with his own eyes, something had happened to the ship, that it lost some altitude and quickly regained it. Perhaps something else had happened, though he dared no think of it now. I need to drink something. Tom thought, standing in the middle of the night, going around the ship. Nothing in sight, but he knew that it couldn't be so, even that man had appeared to have had a bulk of water in his stomach. Doubt arose at the thought of him having drunk the blood of his victims to sustain himself. And that's where he stopped. Below the decks, it must be hidden somewhere. There he went and looked and seemed to have missed a lot. A pile of blankets laid around, of which he'd soon take for himself while the other would be thrown to cover the sight of the blood which laid on the table. Calm yourself, he isn't there, though he dared not even try thinking of the repercussions, at least not as of yet. Being seen alone with so much blood would do more than raise an eyebrow if someone were to ask. Water, just get it already, he thought. It wasn't in the boxes or barrels, though none of it had a strange liquid. Slightly transparent, perhaps having some oily thing in its texture. Tom thought of it as being that strange substance everyone's been looking for but no, something else made it a lot worse. Small creatures that appeared to have long bodies and almost appeared to be fish. From a second glance, it appeared as if they bodies split into halves and they pushed enough air to propel themselves from corner to corner. Though what disturbed the boy was the fact that they had their sharp teeth that appeared to be dirty. Something laid at the bottom as well, making it seem like there was another purpose to them. 'You'll starve as well as I unless you'll start eating one another.' Tom thought as he closed the lid on the barrel. If it came to it, he was aware of the fact that he'd be needed to drink out of the strange barrel if there wasn't any other option. 'Let me see, papers, tools, other useless things.' Many other ropes laid thrown around, a fishnet, though it made no sense whatsoever since they were in the sky. Could it have been the altitude then? Tom did get to the point of feeling dizzy, thinking as he would. He came back to it and looked around, walking the stairs and finally seeing just how high in the air he was. Clouds were being reached and cut, a headache came to him at last. I need to turn the wheel and head below. Left unattended, the ship had appeared to go on its own, at a speed that was unlike any, at least until the point where he came. One slam into a direction and he held the wheel while on his knees. The ship was finally going back to its place. 'Someone has to hold you now before it's too late.' Though the boy had the perfect idea to go on with it, taking the metal bar which was bent, he wanted to block it, but not before it was too late. If we're stuck going this way, we'll be too low. But where are we even going exactly now? At the point where a normal altitude, or what he thought to be a normal altitude, he stopped turning the wheel. It wasn't going either up or down but had a steady departure at best. Now it was a perfect time. Just to make sure, the other metal bars came from both sides and blocked any complete movement it might've had. It leads him back but there was no hope. Everything was barren, other than the barrel. But what was in it, what could it be? Tom decided to wait just another day, looking worse than ever, especially since he knew to have taken this decision. Sleeping on deck again, the moon was pale, thoughts of ale. Even if he never had the thing, any of it would've been good if it meant avoiding the alternative. Though the ill dreams came to be. Alone on the ship, even farther from the shore. He raised and pushed a hand through the water, but it was too bleak and dark. 'I have to survive.' It was justified a little as the first gulp of it came into his mouth. From what he had observed, originally he might've thought that it couldn't be as bad. No, after all, small creatures appear to be able to swim and breathe through it. At least that had made him think of it as being better. Though the taste certainly wasn't. A bloody thing, tasting like flesh. Even if he hadn't noticed, he ate one of those small creatures whole and raw, directly from the liquid. It did something to his thirst and finally, he could spread across the boat and stand. Now that he satiated some of it, he understood what went on. It was dark inside the room and he had been done sleepwalking, too tired to get. Once again, he fell asleep. Dreams wouldn't come as easily now that he came to have the stench inside his stomach rotting. It felt strange, to say the least, but liberating for his thirst. For now, he bore resentment after hours, bloody images of torture and of drowning.

Everything was there after the door opened from his room of darkness. He climbed and felt pulled it. Those creatures laid there, as giant as he was, roaming the sea, floating as he came closer. 'What are you?' Tom asked, just before one took notice and pulled out the many sharp things and started draining the poor boy. It was a while as they did it, floating there while he was sucked by the vents, going as far as in the depths of the ocean as they could afford to. For some reason, it felt really harsh to be eaten by something so small as the things he had accidentally swallowed, but it went to pass. Tom looked at the pain stopped and suddenly he could move his hands freely. It was strange, that of which wasn't a mistake, to say the least, that his hands and legs were pierced. Even worse was the fact that they shared blood from one another, exchanging to the point of it becoming some kind of transfusion. Parts of his body liquefied together and the first thought in his mind became. 'This is my life now, isn't it?' From this standpoint, there wasn't anything he could say or do, as it came beyond his reach. But it did appear to be at its most vulnerable during the process. With of sudden jerk of both hands, he yanked them off and released both of his hands. A shriek in the water made no difference to him, as he was aware this was a sea filled with nothing but those things. Soon after he pulled out his legs, beginning only to rip every individual long stipped thing that came into his body. 'I'll not be taken now. 'Said, Tom, as he swam in a pool of his own diluted blood. There's some sort of liquid I found myself inside. Though it made no difference since he felt pain again. Soon he was too busy to pull every single thing out of the body to realise that this was the process of digestion. Tom barely escaped, though now it wasn't any better since they were going deeper and deeper into the ocean. 'What are you trying to tell me now?' Some minor discomfort replaced pain, but he was sure that he understood what was going on. This was the sea of the earth, which held more than a plethora of many coloured creatures there, as far as they went below. Sharp and dangerous, at least, not the type of things he'd take kindly. 'I need to find out, is there a reason why you're taking me here?' Why am I even asking this dumb creature? Clearly, it had not even a brain, the transparency doing much to reveal that much. The moment he saw the predators coming after the rounded globe of sinking blood, sharp-fanged things, he decided it was time for him to get on with it. Escape came near, though he'd have to fend for himself. Outstretching, he pushed through and managed to force it to open, releasing all of his blood into the sea. Before he could act, he felt himself being torn apart, eaten alive, reminding him of the man of which stood there in the dark. Cowered in a sitting position with both of his arms wrapped around his legs, Tom found himself standing under the table once again. Initially confused, he didn't know what to think of the sounds of the man eating out of another. It isn't over yet, I need to escape. But that wasn't right either, as he fainted once again. This time Tom found himself in a place that shouldn't be. A big house, one of which he had never before seen himself going into. He stood in front of him, looking behind at a group of other children of his age, dressed the same way as him, having the same mannerisms, to say the least. This is home, but that thought hadn't felt right either. It was somewhat of an abandoned place, but what was disturbing laid in the fact that every room in it had its light open. Neither of them knows the reason, they decided to investigate. 'Are you going to go inside or not?' 'What?' 'Come on James, just go on inside and look for the person who did this, that was the best. 'Right, I know that. 'There he laid open mouthed and confused, entering the lane as if ordered by the thing. His supposed friends would later run as the slightest sound on the wood only to hide. Even at the moment when the boy entered, he found himself lost, in this big house, pulled towards the lowest room in the house. There'd be an attack as well if I were to be sure, he thought. Though it did nothing to distract him from the marks on his hands and legs. Somehow they carried on, at least, everything from the marks and what he knew to them. A man came directly from the woods, making every child scatter. It was a late thing to but the boy started running in every room in the house just to blow off the candles. He'd be busy trying to chase those children for no other purpose, dragging its fainted leg, having become nothing resembling of a real man. That's what death does to you there and he knew as well that he didn't want to throw any glance at what remained of the bloated creature. Limbs that couldn't be used for grabbing, only to be dragged on the ground. It had grown a beak to help itself feat on anything he could get into his reach, without the help of the forked neck and the deeply rooted channels. No, it hadn't done that on its own. The beak was too long and formed to be just a thing done in a circumstance. For what was worth, it appeared that his feathers were grey and dark, taking the appearance of a murderous crow. 'I need to blow off every candle.' Thought the boy as he went on his desperate approach to every room. By now, he was certain that he had gotten almost a few of them entirely blown. Some had even the decency, but one fell. The curtain was ignited in an instant, just as he thought of what was the best thing he could do. The sink, Tom thought. When the moment came, nothing but the same black diluted water came through. All the same, until it stopped, some meat having covered the pipe inside, perhaps a creature that wanted him not to have any of it anymore. 'Greedy little thing, I'll have you damned!' Said the boy, just before he covered his mouth, though no one laid around to hear him yet. No, I need to get out. But as he ran, he found himself opening it only partially to see that thing running around in circles, holding in the innermost circle a pile of children. They were battered and bloody to the point where he didn't know whenever or not his friends were still alive or not. From the likes of it, he noticed where he stopped. It was now that he came slowly but didn't notice just how far the fire had spread. As a matter of fact, neither did Tom, for he wouldn't have chosen to return and lock the door. The chain on top, and a small closing thing that couldn't be broken, he thought. Before the boy was done, a bony hand, long, cold and seemingly sick broke through and started ripping through the wall around the door. It was sick to see a bloody beak just come into contact with the stone and the metal inside of it. There seemed as if a pleasure came from it, a sick thing that the boy couldn't understand. At least, now it came to the fact that the sickness in those eyes became apparent. It was the moment where pieces of it fell off, filling its mouth with blood as it ate its way through the wall that Tom decided to run. As for the initial shock, it made him shiver and cover his eyes and nose. The smoke was being blown out of proportion and there'd be no way to stop this from burning. I need to find a way out, he thought of the thing that would've made him see it far better, but the smoke was far too strong. For a second there, this house appeared to be far bigger starting with the second floor and there was no denying that he ran through, trying to get to the other side. Windows blocked, at least cemented on the other way. Something, anything that I could use, thought Tom. And the more he thought of those children, his friends, the more he remembered what their bodies looked like. That thing ate of them, taking a bite out of each and every single one of children. It was certain now that there'd be no one running or trying to get help while he stalled for time. 'Pocket knife, thank you, thank you, thank you.' Tom placed it in his pocket, not to be seen. He would've been hiding in one of the rooms if it weren't for him to turn and see that grim face standing a few feet away. It pulled the boy by the legs and started dragging him at the same time he shouted for help. Still, the smoke was intoxicating, at least, that's what he thought. Boring through the pain it now felt from eating stone and tinder, it finally gave in a grin and a laugh that was too sharp and deep to make him look like anything else than a monster. Having no choice and seeing how he was dragged by the leg, Tom pulled out the knife and snapped it in that thing's leg. It shrieked and let go, just at the edge of the stairs where the boy finally came to his feet and leapt upon, skipping more than a few seconds at the grimace and the cost of a fracture. Tom shouted in pain just as high as the creature had, stumbling on his feet, avoiding to step with that leg. Not the only tried walking on one of them while leaping from wall to wall. For as long as he had seen, the smoke appeared to be intoxicating for both of them. And there wasn't any going through that exit as the creature had essentially made a cave in of the house. For some reason, it didn't help that the foundation was being devoured by the flames. Tom came to the last room which was left. If the kitchen was the one set on flames, the room opposite of it was the only thing left. And it was coming now, even mad than before, to be met by a locked door and a trail of blood that led directly to him. 'I wouldn't try that if I were you.

You'll only make the entire thing fall off if you try eating the walls again. 'Said Tom, just as he was ready to check his chances. There wasn't much in there, other than another door that leads below. It was the basement, something of which was covered. For what was worth, there was a chance that there'd be an exit if he tried. Though the silence and what it had done became more than disturbing for him to account for alone. Has it given up so easily? Despite the fact, there wasn't any time to spend wishfully thinking of what could've happened to it. 'For what I care, you could just drop dead for what you've done to me. 'And there was no lock to impede his only way to go through.

Though what he hadn't realised in minutes was the fact that his wish was to come true. Just as smoke would devour, there appeared to come a sound of creaking from the room above. First, it appeared almost as if there was a teen trying to jump on his head, though soon blood started dripping from a hole. It was only momentarily but it looked through it with its dark eyes and might've grinned. The grin of a bird of prey that of which it had become, going as far to chew the stone into a paste and spit it out. Tom opened the trap door that leads to the basement and seemed to have locked his way from inside. 'Useless, isn't it? It will chew its way through, there's no way he wouldn't do that if he can eat stone so freely. Never had the thought of facing it came to light, after seeing the pile he had under his belt.

Especially since there wasn't any tool or weapon in the basement, being left there clean, far too clean for his own comfort. 'Please, work, with me, I don't have the time for this. 'Tom came closer to the window and appeared to have to know what was to be done. It wasn't as hardened as he had thought, but it appeared as if this was the only possible way he could get out. Thought got out of his mind, just as he felt as if he was as light as a feather. Perhaps all of this commotion had stopped and it was the time for him to go on and escape. 'Am I worthy?' The boy asked, just before getting ready to find out for himself. The window wouldn't open and he became aware of the strong sound of that thing had fallen through the ceiling. Nonetheless, the various blankets that laid around covered nothing but themselves. Seconds after being on fire, it would be just enough for this entire thing to fall into piece. Once the flames came to the foundation, there'd be no hope for him. So the boy started slamming his fist and broke through the window. Marks of blood came onto the glass. Despite the fact he hadn't noticed it, the fire had already spread into the previous room. Now, the window was just enough for a boy of his stature to come through. Though right as it came to it, the wood hadn't been anything of an issue to chew upon. A shriek of pain and desire came as well, as it seemed like this desire of a prey was met by the child. It was the hunt the creature had always wanted and even the thought of it brought a shiver. Now that iron was being chewed upon and spat on the ground, it grew no regard for what was around it. One glance at the broken glass and the blood and it figure that the boy had escaped. Greed had taken too much of what was left of a mind inside that little head. For once, he started pushing himself inside until the point of being stuck. This was the sign he needed, that grim thing of a shouting rage of pain. Before fire would go on, Tom knew he would be done. So far, he came out of the blanket which had laid on the floor, after having done such a great job of concealing where he was. Seeing how it forced itself to come through, the lower body of a man, a killer a predator gave him no regards that he might've had for a dumb animal. Or so the boy thought as he grabbed the lower half and started rocking him back and forth, left and right, into the shards. They resisted as they acted as scalpels and started cutting through. Even when they were done and entered the body, the two halves almost came out and the shriek of pain finally ended. Tom managed to pull it back with both the remaining pieces of glass shoved inside and a frame of the wood that came off with them. It bounced as it fell on the floor and he was sure that it could just come back to live and haunt him for one last time as a vengeful thing. Though he came out safely at the sight of fire and smoke, running as far as he could into the woods. Looking back at it, day approached, and the farther he went, the less of a house it looked and rather, it seemed to have had something of the appearance of a boat. Before strolling too far there, he realised that this liquid had done great to induce through him this delusion which made him act accordingly. He wasn't about to suffer that he had reached the ground, but it was a pity to see it go down in flames. The only way to go, and now he was lost, approaching the light of day. Now, the boy ran through to look for what he had heard or thought he heard. Half-caught into this pandemonium, he barely found his way to one, going for what appeared to be a small peak of stone from which fish came and jumped. 'Water, it's water. 'But he immediately caught his mouth and looked around. Tom was sure that he saw another one of those creatures lying about. Not to mention that the problem which remained with the damn pile of corpses made him shiver more than rightly. It was only after drinking as much as he could that he regained something of common sense and started walking about. For what was worth, there might've been hours of walking, until at last, he found a settlement he thought there might've been someone who could help him with this thing. At least the water washed away that disgusting taste that still lingered in his mouth. For far too long had it stood in there, tainting him to the point where he threw himself aimlessly until he was found. Four men wearing their strange garbs stood atop of Tom. They had tied Tom to make sure he wouldn't start hurting himself or others around him. His eyes became pale as they had lost most of their colour in the process. Even then, some of his teeth have become too sharp to belong to a human, which made some of them stare. Nonetheless, tied to a long then, he was being carried, landing through one of the many villages that laid there. Even while he laid turned on his back, while carried, there was no denying on how many of them laid across the forest. Sturdy wet wooden gates opened and welcomed them. Fairly so, they were dressed as for their kin, nothing that would scream of tribes of anything of the sort. It was strange that he would be there in that condition, but he couldn't deny the fact that he saw so little in his vision. A grasp of something almost placed some sharp features on their faces, the type that would signal the fact that soon they were to turn rabid. They would devour him, he was sure, as the preparation of a great fire became too obvious now, even with the approaching way, Tom began to struggle. 'Hold on, you'll only hurt yourself now. You're way too sick to be doing anything. 'Said one of the men that held him. There was a certain need for that, as he was certain that he could get hurt by any other attempt. Tom could hear nothing but the type of screech and tainted tongue which bore through.

No animal sound but a clipping and clicking that sounded nothing like human speech. 'Let me go, I haven't done anything, I want. I need to be free. 'That of which came as gibberish on his side as well. Women who were watching suddenly took their children and pulled them back, only to be hidden away from this damned sight. One village elderly in particular came near and looked at Tom. He appeared to be watching his reaction and how he was doing. 'Well?' Put the boy in an animal cage now, until we're done with something that would make him feel better. It's for his own good. 'I know that, but are you certain that it's the right choice in the matter? He's a boy after all. 'No, it seems like this boy had gone through a lot, far too much for his own good. Even further than to be called a simple boy, just look at all the. 'There was something of which he noticed, as it started growing on his face. Young man, what have you gotten yourself into?' Lock him now, for the safety of the children and our the town's women, you'd better lock it well. 'The boy struggled as the small tree on which he was being carried suddenly was released from him. Either way, there wasn't anything he could do to fight those who were around him. Even as a few of them came near and made sure of it. As far as he was concerned, there'd be no escaping. For the time being, he was locked inside a cage, one of which was surrounded by a metal chain, which had an additional lock of iron. Tom looked further around, only to find out that there was no other cage. To be sure of it, he still saw the preparation of the fire, how people looked at him, where he was locked inside. I know what they're doing. They'll eat me, I know it to be true. Though the aimless venture had taken all his strength, leaving him with nothing but lying on the cold iron and look for a way out. In reality, there was none, other than waiting, as the cure was being prepared. Four other towns, against which laid something of an endless stretch of forest intertwined. One could take a look at a layman and tell that it was merely one forest, though knowing the type of trees, one could acknowledge the many differences between them. The thicker the branches, the taller, the sizes, a slight difference in colour and many other small things that were almost unnoticeable. It was important to note, for that reason laid why the forest went so far, standing of what appeared to be pure, unaltered ground. Eight towns and Tom found his way to one by accident, left to his fate. Most of them being so peaceful made no difference whatsoever if it weren't for those travellers from outside who disturbed through the span of the coming day. Tom shouted. 'Free me now!' Bloodied and sweaty, he had broken free of the thin rope that had previously kept him locked. It was the shout of a creature that came out, even as in his vision it was still night. They're preparing for a feast, he thought, just as he saw all of the sudden, the rising flame. 'Hey, you there, you'd better not make any trouble now. 'Said a boy who might've been of the same age, if only he could recognise his features. Though he kicked the cage and made a drumming noise inside Tom's head. Vibrations certainly travelled fast. 'Stop that now. 'Came as a grubbling pair, though something might've been in there that the other boy took as a formation of words. 'So you do seem to be able to speak after all. The elders said something about that but I dared not believe them. I think you're nothing but a dumb creature that looks like a boy, that's for certain. 'He kicked the cage a few more times, just to be certain that Tom was annoyed. By now, he was standing in a pool, having realised that his body was fighting against that thing which was in his system as well. As Tom finally threw up, he got to see what exactly was in his body, just as those amphibian creatures were still alive. Tom looked in horror and realised just what it was, knowing where those things came from. It was the boy who kicked the cage that brought the elder to help and a few men to restrain Tom as his cage was suddenly opened. 'Hold his mouth open as well. 'Said the only man. They both appeared to have the scent of smoke onto them, a special kind nonetheless. At the moment when the lock fell, one man pulled Tom outside, without even waiting for something.

Seeing how he was weak and wasn't ready to act like a beast anymore, he didn't try hurting the boy anymore.

Nonetheless, the eldest man in the group spoke. 'Cover him with ash now, try to repel that creature from his body before they burrow inside again. 'Without waiting now, they had dragged a small wooden bucket and emptied it on the boy. Both of his clothes, skin and body was grey. Before it came to be any longer, he was forced to drink out what they gave him. 'Make sure he swallows all and lock all the gates. This day he will spend all alone. It's important that regardless of what you hear him say, none of you will try to help him until one day passes. 'The entire town appeared to have paid attention to what the old man told them to do. 'I hope this works, you can release him now. 'As it hit, his world darkened even more, though his words finally came to a point. 'Let me go, I have to go there, I need to. 'That of which they understood but at the sight of the old man. The others suddenly went away. His word was close to a command in the eyes and to the ears of the others. Knowing better what was the best to be done, he went away as well, noticing and watching the boy just roll on the ground in pain. That thing inside of him was being killed now, he was sure of it, though the cost was great. 'He's suffering, Winfield, what have you done to the boy?' 'Nothing I shouldn't have. Why I gave him the essence of what he seemed to have been suffering for most. The essence of the ammonia, he certainly needed it to get rid of that thing inside his body now. "Was this the best way to go with it?" 'You're still young Grace, you'll understand, they'll all do. It was a matter of life and death, if it weren't for this kind of pain, he would've been driven to madness and murder. "He will be driven from the pain, just look that boy, he can't even hold himself on his feet. "That's enough, it's either this or his death, there's no other way to cure it that we know of. It either poisons him and kills his body or those things inside of him absorb it and die. For that, I'm certain that it beats the odds. 'They looked as if he changed from a beast in a cage to a damn abused rodent. None yet dared to pass the word Winfield gave to them, none at all. It went on halfway through the day, Tom having been placed on his back and still looking at the top of the sky. A different kind of night remained, while his hands stretched and the pain went through him. It appeared as if there laid a cloak atop of the sky, leaving him to shiver, moving in the most repugnant matters. When the time came for him to glance, he saw nothing around, but what once used to be humans. Long enough and featureless, none dared approached. Their forms frightened the body, just as they made sudden moves and deformed even more upon walking, to the point where their bodies made no sense whatsoever. How could they move? How did their skin and bones stretch so far and dragged themselves? They were rotten, contorting against one another and falling to what appeared to be knees. 'Don't hurt me. 'Tom said, just as he turned and started walking on his own. He had shortly approached what seemed to be a wall, tall and grim, making it seem as if it was made out of metal. Spikes laid on top, to say the least as well as animal horns and other pieces that belong to them. Bones atop of every fort inside and the innermost citadel laid there in front of his eyes. Stumbling to walking, he saw how those rabid things forced themselves to eat smaller creatures that of which screamed. 'Don't touch me, I said, I will make sure that you'll be hurt for what you've done here. 'Said Tom just as he kept his distance from every single one of the bizarre apparitions. He wasn't aware where he was, but the darkness finally fading, leaving only a vision of a red sky, still until, close to being dark. There were no stars of which he knew and from what he could tell, he was still afraid to approach them. Now they crawled on many laying feet which were dragged, leaving open some sort of serpentine bodies of anything at all. He gasped and tried coping, standing for a moment with both his arms folded. It was only throughout the day while walking that he realised that neither of them dared approach or make any move. If they're not trying to hurt me, then what exactly is going on here? Their point of conquest, their hold, I see. Tom thought of getting closer though something moved once they noticed just what he had in mind. Will they act now that I dare? Could it be that I'm not afraid to do such a thing? 'Don't you dare stop me!' Said, Tom, as he started for that thing. Looking at everyone and how they peered did nothing to change his mood. He still thought them to be untrustworthy forms that mocked him, even without having to say a word at all. I will get out of this place one way. Luckily, the door wasn't barred or anything of that sort. Though what he had entered upon appeared to have been entertained by an inner circle where they discussed their plans. He went through the entrance and appeared to have gone around another wall. Through the throng, there weren't doors holding it, but leather carpets hanging from the top of the ceiling, acting out as if they were doors. Past it there he had arrived, inside the circle where he knelt. It wasn't that he wanted to show decency but for now, he hadn't dared get too much of their attention. For once, he thought of running away, but that immediately came to pass. So many of them standing in circles, rows of them just appearing to be speaking slowly, praying in a way. A place of worship, this couldn't be the moment to start disturbing them, at least unless it came to pass. One of the elders noticed the boy and gave quite a glance. Of course, in Tom's eyes, most of them appeared to look as if they were the same, sharing every feature down the skin and tentacle and extra limb that was dragged. It didn't help that the young ones and the old ones almost looked as if they were of the same breed and piece of organic material. Point said he wasn't going to disturb any. And the elder thought him as harmless enough to stay if he wasn't going to disturb anyone so far. 'Well, I think I've had enough of this session. Father. 'The man bowed once for him and a second time for the rest of the people who were praying around. Despite the fact that he wasn't able to understand what they were saying, he thought he noticed the extrusions through which laid their eyes. Most of them had them closed. Blend in Tom, at least until you find a way out, let them think that you might be one of them. For the time being, it appeared as if this was the only option. It had generated some grunts at least, but he stood there in peace, hearing only those unknown pieces of whispers. For once, meditating this way while surrounded by everyone made him feel calm. Once he became that way, he thought of home. Far away, it had been, through the summer days. 'Pass me the ball. 'Throughout the summer, he and Van had been playing. It must've been ages since they last saw one another. In better conditions than let's say what they had become. For once he was scared to think what was going to happen, for opening his eyes now made him paranoid. With a glance around his body, he was slowly becoming assimilated into this circle. It must've been the scented smoke that laid everywhere, for he saw his body turn and devour the rest, having a slithering texture to it. Not even his clothes were safe anymore. Seeing how there wasn't anything he could do since his legs were frozen and uncomfortably bent, he thought back on the better days. But this time he failed to do so. It felt as if this was to be painful. 'I can't do this. 'With a painful thrust, he had disturbed the others and left with a noisy thing. There wasn't any stopping but he stumbled as if he had lost a leg, this wasn't liberating but damning. 'This is sickening, you're all making me sick. 'Said Tom, once he fell on himself outside. It was hard to remember a time when he was happy and neither of them tried helping, as far as he was concerned. How could they though? A strange tribe of creatures that were self-concerned and self-satisfying. 'Ha. 'They even treated me like a dumb animal and caged me, but this is too much. Thought Tom and fell, this time it was the fever that had gotten him to the point. Without any concern of the word given by the town council, a few of them suddenly came and started carrying the boy to one of their homes. Outside the inner circle, voices could be heard as well as they did shout after all. 'Bring hot towels and call the elders. It's not going too well anymore. 'It was apparent when three of the elders who were taught in the art of medicine and one of their daughters as well that this had gone quite far. The boy wasn't about to last much due to the poisoning anymore, let alone the rest of the span of a day. 'What are we going to do now?He's been acting so strangely so far that I think that whatever you gave him might've induced him into madness. 'There might be no cure, it's only what happens. We need to bring him to the other village and see to it if they know any better now. 'A few of the younger men offered but at the request of the elder they were surprisingly hanging low. None dared pass their word, but this was rightly seen as a mistake. 'Only one of you goes. Woman, since you seem to have taken so much interest in him, you'll take him there, alone. Whatever happens, will befall you from that point on. 'She appeared to be banished, carrying the boy in her arms. There wasn't anything in which she could've placed him, at least nothing that wouldn't get ripped apart because of the weight. 'At least it isn't far. 'The woman said, and in a way, she kind of looked old enough to be his mother. If there were words that came out of Tom's mouth, they've faded a long time ago. Without a doubt for what was about to happen, he placed his faith in this vague humanoid form. Perhaps it was the air outside, but this thing that had taken over everyone in the previous town vanished. Especially as the chains pulled back the gate in place. 'Let me go now, I can walk on my own. 'Said Tom, as he stumbled away from her arms. 'I know that. 'There was still a point of dizziness that refused to go away, even as they stood looking at one another. It was hard, but she understood what he was saying now. Could it be that the elder was right about what he needed now?'I know you're trying to help. 'At least this time, Tom came in loud and clear, speaking them without a break or a mistake. It was nothing to be frowned upon, especially since it was a sign towards healing. 'Then follow me boy, towards another camp and we'll be able to make you feel better, right?You wouldn't want to die from poisoning, would you now?I'm certainly sure that the poison in your system is about to get a lot more painful from this point on. 'Case and point made, as the boy threw himself momentarily on the ground, screeching and reaching for a painful grasp around his stomach. 'Now are you going to listen?'Without any other word, she pulled the body and took it in her arms again. He wasn't that heavy, to begin with, though she had at least seen or carried others twice his stature and weight. It was a pity that they didn't trust her with more, but she managed to reach through the abode. 'Hold. Who comes here?'Said a man, dressed in a fur dress, antlers, pointers and what appeared as if he wore a peculiar robe behind the gate. 'Me and this boy, he was poisoned and needs immediate assistance. 'The man left his place for a moment and appeared to have returned, peering at both of them, as they stood and waited. Somewhat of the boy's skin had changed to a purple around the collar and his wrists. And that wasn't the least pleasant to look upon. One fairly dressed figure just joined the man, wearing another peculiar robe with a set of accessories. Despite that, it was the fact that he wore something of a cage upon the entirety of his head, with appeared to have grown through his skull. 'Let the boy in, but you woman, are to leave. Before you leave, I must inform you that the next encampment is at least a day's walk if you weren't aware of. 'To be fair about it, she hadn't noticed either how she came there, it was all a mist in her head. Saying the least, she couldn't even know where her own encampment lay or where the other which laid at a day's walk stood. But nonetheless, the wood was rotten and the mist was sudden. There wasn't anything that of which she could do now unless it for this faithful gift for him. 'I'm so sorry boy, but I don't have a choice, you either die here with them or on the road with me. At least, it will give you a chance here. 'She took a breathing break and looked above and shouted, loud and clear. 'I agree to this. But please don't hurt him, he's just a poor old boy. "We shall see about that. 'As far as for the gate, it appeared to have been forced into the same system of chains and wood. It could open, either way, lower down and then back up as a gate, making it seem that it was multifunctional in a certain way, depending on what other strangers needed to see. For this illusion had saved them more than once and prevented any attacks that would come at night. Once it was lowered down, it seemed as if this mist had covered much of what she hadn't needed to see. Nonetheless, it was enough to have made a few steps for her to notice that machine that laid in the corner, producing every gasp of the mist. It's made by them, this thing is disgusting. She thought as she handed the boy. For once, she had become reluctant about it, for some reason there were just the two of them. The man with that caged and the other with the fur and the antlers. It was true that animals did run among them, but that was no fur she had ever seen. 'Are you certain that you can take care of him. "We are, now leave so we may go back to our work. "Don't worry. 'A peculiar grin came from behind those thin bars. It was enough to make her stomach turn, at least as far as it went. She wasn't about to give in, but either way. 'Just save the boy. 'And it was then that the woman was no longer in sight. 'Do me a favour and close the gate. "Right, boss, what about the boy?"Don't worry about that, I know exactly what he needs. Damn savages, you'd think they'd know better with everything they took from the ground in the last decade. 'The man took a bottle of alcohol from his pocket, strong scented. It was enough to get the confused look of the man accompanying him. Alcohol, and not only that, but it was also strong enough to wake up a mule that had fallen victim to the heath of the desert. This thing was strong, especially given to a child. One grip around the bottle and it almost seemed as if the boy couldn't stop drinking. 'That'd be enough boy, there's no need for you to drink more than you need. 'Suddenly, this took a grim effect. Not only did it feel like it did, but Tom stumbled a few feet away on his own before standing against a wall. He released again what was inside his stomach, no mention of the fact that this was the man's intention. 'Is this what you meant by medicine now?Giving the boy a means to have his guts out before us?"Better than poisoned to death, isn't it?Just look at the pool there. 'Other than the various articles of food, both of them noticed just the reason why those people had poisoned him. Perhaps neither was versed as well as they thought, but those creatures of the sea were recognisable, enough to warrant a reason. 'Just as I suspected, they'd rather poison the child than deal with this. "Is he fine then?'As he asked, he shook his antlers and approached. Looking at the other, he made sure to read through the expressions to see whenever or not it was well enough. He was content as far as it went, but never made the mistake of having to give another thought about it. 'Well now, let's see, boy are you all right now?"My name isn't boy, it's Tom. "Good, so you understand me. Since we have such a good understanding now, it's time for you to leave. "Wait, don't send him out yet, he seems like he could be useful to us, at least until it comes to our favour to be returned. 'Tom glanced at the both of them, especially at their peculiar set of clothing. At least the fur, the antlers and the cage appeared as if they were out of the ordinary, perhaps too much even for him to see. Could they be bandits or cutthroats?'Who are you, what do you want from me?I've got nothing on me, nothing that would be worth your while. Can't you see that I'm just a boy?'He had lost the meaning of time ever since he left his home. No clocks, no counted nights, he couldn't even tell whenever or not he was approaching the age of manhood. Alas, it didn't matter, for their leader stepped forth. 'Don't worry about that, we're not here to rob you. As a matter of fact, you should be more grateful for we have saved your life. Haven't we, Agur?' The man with the antlers bowed for a second there. 'And my name is Balstar, as the name goes. It's a mighty pleased to meet you. "Tom, my name is Tom, but no one seems to ask me about my other names. "Isn't it better that way Tom? No attachments between people, after all, you'd not like people being associated with you, such as the kind we are. 'Grinned the caged man, Balstar he said. Balstar and Agur, a set of strange names for strange folk. 'Very well, I shall accompany you for the time being, at least, until I pay for what's worth. "It's a deal boy. 'Said Agur, and for a moment, it almost seemed like the creature he was wearing suddenly shook with excitement as well. Both him and it appeared to be acting that way. Though one thing still bothered him. 'Do you live here?' 'No, we were just leaving. 'Agur suddenly looked at his companion and as he noted he walked towards the machine and pulled only a small metal cell without saying a word. 'Well Tom, this is now the moment to leave. 'Out of the mist, he appeared to have pulled a sack, which laid just a few feet away from him. Perhaps food, jewellery, spoons and marble objects laid inside, though Agur suddenly appeared with a bad as well. It was obviously suspicious if it weren't for the fact that they helped him get well. 'We have a camp, not too far for good reasons, it should be big enough for the three of us. Unless you eat like an animal, in which case. "No, no, no, I'll, well. I can carry my own weight and behave. "Good boy, I'm sure that this thing of our might be just going well. 'Thought Balstar, with a grin on his face. It still appeared peculiar that they left the camp in that condition, though nonetheless. No question asked, for the time being, neither of them seemed to desire to harm him. Far enough though, in the throng of a hill, it was almost hidden, that a small cove laid out there in the woods. Perhaps after this long hour after walking, it seemed strange. 'It's only temporary Tom, you see, until we get enough to have a better place for our own. "You'd better listen to Agur, he knows better about this kind of business. 'A cosy home waited for the three of them, fashioned enough that it could still stand as a house despite what it seemed to look like. Once they were inside and opened the door. Surprisingly so, as they had implanted into the stone an entire wall and a functional door with it. It was at least a considerable amount of effort to do so and he did it nonetheless. 'Who did this?' 'That would be, Agur, the mighty constructor. Nothing is as it seems now, is it Tom?' For once, those antlers and the fur appeared to have another purpose, as it kept the fact that he was unexpectedly clever for what he looked like. It was a cosy thing inside, warm, at least warmer than what it felt like being outside. More importantly was the fact that it was filled with what they had looted from around. That of which included a rug on the floor, a few storage containers and more than enough things that they fashioned their own home. How did they manage to get all of this? Wondered Tom, just as he looked around. 'What's ours is yours as well, Tom, as long as you remain with us and help us get more. This plan is supposed to make us fortunate enough to leave these wasted before they come to an end. 'Balstar had his grin on for the entire duration he was in. After a few moments of placing their bags inside the corners, the reason came out. As the head of this operation, he knew more than well what he was doing. 'I know the perfect thing for you to do in order to earn your spot with it. Don't you worry about it for a second now, it will be nothing to be concerned about Tom. 'Agur suddenly came in with a pair of clothes that appeared to reflect some sort of a sign of the outsiders. It was something rustic and made it seem as if he was part of a tribe. Despite their use of tools, it did well to hide them. 'People underestimate us often when they see us wearing these. You see, no one expects someone as poorly dressed to inflict any amount of damage on them. And that is the trick that gave us everything we have here. 'Agur pointed to a changing room, though there was no need for that. He already appeared to be out of place, now the only thing that was needed was a few accessories to end the deal. Agur suddenly pulled a few helmets out of a pile of trash they held inside. It was surprising that they were all in such a good condition as they were. As a matter of fact, Tom was rather pleased with what they gave him. One mask of a sort, with sharp teeth that went in all directions, with a sad face through which he could look. 'Add some fake hair on top of that Agur, make them really think of the boy as being silly. 'Both of them laughed, and as Tom joined, he found himself wearing a pair of silly garments that were fashioned to be worn by a maiden. It was the cloak at first that was wrapped around, then a pair of silken gloves, one black and one white. 'Are you sure about this? Do you really need people to make fun of what I'm wearing?' 'Trust me, Tom, you'll be just fine, them underestimating you and as a matter of fact, us, will be more than a grave mistake. 'The sudden tone changed once Agur and Balstar looked at one another. 'You don't mean for us to go today, do you? He had no experience in it, he isn't ready for such a heist. 'All of the sudden Tom recognised what they were, at least he knew what that word meant. They were robbers, and they were using Tom as well. Despite knowing what they were, there wasn't any chance for a retreat now. I need to earn a meal if I'm willing to go back and find a ship that goes to the capital. 'Count me in then! I don't care how dangerous it is now, trust me that I've been through worse. For that, it isn't a coincidence for the state you found me in. 'And if memory still served the boy right, it was indeed how he thought it happened. 'That's the spirit boy, just hold this, as hidden as you can and when the time comes, I'll teach you how to use them. 'As it came, Balstar handed him a roll of cloth that had inside a pair of sharp tools of various sizes. Their usage became quite evident for him to see. He had seen lockpicks before, though never as obviously complicated as these ones. Despite what some appeared, there were some picks, long that had pointers that were bent in seemingly every know direction. It was a bit of a stretch to think that they each had a use at all, but he took them nonetheless. 'So what are we waiting for then?' 'I like your enthusiasm kid, but you'll need more than that. Do you see this?' The man pointed at the top of one of his antlers. There was a scar left there, or, rather a mark left by someone who might've tried cutting him. 'It almost came close to cutting a piece of my head, right below my eye and it would've gone just atop the other. What you're getting into won't be easy for a moment Tom, there's a high chance that you may be hurt. Even if you're just a lad. 'Tom nodded as he listened to the man, his thick accent only became obvious now. He was rather fearful, at least that's the impression he received once he looked into his eyes. Kind dark eyes, which appeared to bear a light on them, even when it wasn't as strong. Someone had to keep an eye on the other. 'Ready, we move now then, through the throng of the night. 'Though day should've come, it became only but an illusion. 'Don't be scared of this boy, there are stronger things above the world that are blocking the sun from now and again. 'Even the scent Tom bore didn't give anything that would indicate he was from this world. Most of which he had seen already shocked him beyond anything a boy of his age should've been exposed to. This peculiar thing ensnared the boy from what he thought of his senses. He'd rather try from this point on to follow the two men who seemed to know better. 'Good lad, you're doing it with so much ease. 'Said one Agur, even going ahead and patting Tom on the shoulder. The three of them appeared to have been staying behind one of the sides of another forth, looking through one of the smaller gates. It's been regarded as the best strategy after they managed to get around unseen. Just one twist with two of the sharp pointers and he felt the mechanism just twist around him. Guided by the caged one, he did as he was told. 'You need to hear a click, Tom. Just like that, one of them you hold still while you work the other. Don't be afraid that they might break, these things are made to last. Quite likely, I was using them ever since I was your age, in the very same spot, doing the same thing. 'The pleasant memories surprised him more than enough when he realises how good Tom was at it. It was under seconds that he came to the point of opening it. 'Amazing. 'Agur's eyes were widened at the sight of the open door. Even more so, when he saw that most of the view was covered by the back of the small huts, houses and dust. 'It appears like our friends here aren't as clever as they seemed to be, having their backdoor exposed in such a manner. Stay behind Agur Tom. He'll make sure you'll be safe, while I work on this. 'A small thing Balstar bore, quite the manner that there was nothing like it he saw. Tom listened and followed as slowly and silently as he could while staying near Agur. He was already looking ridiculous and might've been seen through the cracks with those antlers of his if anyone came to be concerned. Though the noise and the voices appeared to be having quite the meaningful approach to a celebration. 'There it is, as I told you Agur. 'Both men appeared to be interested in that machine that laid hidden and abandoned along the trash that laid around. It appeared as if this was something most if not all these forts had. 'What's this then? I saw it before, the steam thing. 'Whispered Tom. 'Agur was already licking his lips as he kept watch. There'd be no stopping once it started after all those huts appeared to have nothing of a wall that'd stop him. 'Look at how I'm doing this and try to remember if you're ever to be in place. You open it with this thing. 'He had a screwdriver though the man appeared to have no idea what it was called. Not that it mattered what it was called, as he went ahead and managed to unscrew the opening of the machine. It appeared to have a cell of some kind, a cylinder. Most likely, the same kind he had taken when he's been there when they've met. 'Now, this should be easy enough, you just need to watch your hand and grab it with a piece of cloth Tom. It might be dangerous if you don't handle it carefully. Here, it should be as barren as you'll get, just wrap your hand around it and pull the cell out. 'Tom listened to this and it went fairly easy out. 'The noise outside disturbed him, to the point of being afraid of being caught, though it soon went as nothing but a pale threat. Now that he came to the point, he asked Agur for the other one. Seemingly this was a modified version. 'It's not supposed to look that way in case you might've guessed Tom, but Agur there managed to find a good way around it. We both need you to trust us, do you understand?' Tom nodded towards him, in a way, he liked being treated the way he was. It wasn't an issue for him, now that he was considered mature enough to handle such responsibilities. Short-lived, nonetheless. Balstar gave him another piece of cloth, slightly wet. He noticed how both him and Agur were holding them against their faces as well as he could hear the man closest to him breathing. 'Don't let go of it until we tell you it's okay. 'Tom nodded and as he did, Balstar inserted it, making a vibrant play of harsh noise and coloured smoke. A red, then a yellow pair of shades came out. And when the moment came, Agur came closer and pulled Tom out of the way, just to be certain he'd not be endangered. When the moment came, the entire fort was covered in it, leaving no time for anyone to make any noise or to scream. Nothing quite like it, the two of them thought, hearing them fall, seeing how this went on. Sooner or later, when the smoke would turn into a mist, that was the signal for their time to act. For a few moments, minutes of waiting rewarded them as the antlers plunged against the hut and ripped it apart in a fell swoop. There was no one standing and it became clear once he dropped his mask. 'It's safe boss, we can go ahead and loot them. 'As he said it, he proceeded to pull out a few bags and threw them at Tom and Balstar. So this is how they came on so many things now. Agur was already searching from hut to the house. Balstar approached

Tom before anything was said and done. 'Be careful to grab anything of value, we may be able to make a trade sooner or later with them. "Won't they know it's stolen?" "Don't worry, I know just the place. ' It was getting cold above, though the air did much to stir the currents, it could now be felt. The further above, the closer it got to that weather that was dark. Somehow, they managed to shove themselves into the heart of the sky, with the capital having the best of it in sight. One cold and heavy weather came, hot on the side, turning to the point of sweat turning into tears of ice. We need to do something about this. Thought a lord. They had once again, at the same hour, same day and date, formed a line to ask the king and force him to give them what he needed. Rather than anything, these were the same few people standing in the same line which had always changed their demands. Commoners of higher rank, traders, lord and travellers, anything that would prevent the peasants from seeing him walk again. It was a mere fact that one could look and see how most were wearing coats, though this disturbance in weather caused anything past the point of the gate to be warm. 'Hold my coat now. 'The man had given his attire to his carrying servant, to the point of entering the throne room as the door opened. Behind him, the stairs were filled with too many people to count who waited for their demands. This was a point made both null and had become an annoyance. 'Your majesty, we need to talk. 'He was blunt and didn't even wait for a response before going on. 'Ingor is my name in case you haven't remembered by now, though I believe we've made ourselves acquainted at least a few times in my lifetime. "And what do you need now? Another set of servants, perhaps a new hold? Something to shut your mouth rather than anything else. "No, your majesty, this is a problem that's concerning every single one of us. 'Another one of these. The crowned thing mumbled as he scraped one side of the throne annoyed. This was enough work for him, having to take care of their every single need of a parent. 'Are we invaded then by those beasts?' Damn them, we're not even through with the instalment of every launcher and every protector. 'No, your majesty, it's a matter of grimace, cold and the tainted heat that's well above you. I'm surprised you haven't noticed of yet. 'Even more surprising to the man was the fact that he stood inside and couldn't feel any of the heat that laid outside. 'Your point being?' "This heat is sickening on one side, while the other is freezing over, that's all. We're at a point where the capital got split between those who cannot handle the cold and those who can't deal with the heat. 'Two extremes going against one another, at least the way he thought of it went rather more unpleasant for the rest of them. 'You wish me to move the capital then? No, we cannot do this, even if I wanted. "Why your subjects are suffering, isn't that enough to force yourself to act upon them and do it for their sake?" I've already said that I cannot. 'There was still that look of surprise, he knew when a lie came too obvious and gnawed at his neck. 'Very well, I'll think about it. Would that be all. "Yes your majesty and if you may come any closer to take a look at your subjects. 'Though the armoured thing made a sign of dismissal before saying. 'There's no need for that, I've got everything I need right here. 'One of his cubes appeared to have an aerial view of the entire zone. He knew too well of what he was happening, even before news came to him, though he tried dismissing it as soon as it came to his ears. 'Don't call the next one in, I'm in dire need of reconsideration if you would understand what it's about. "Yes your majesty, I know very well. And in case you've made your mind. 'He had left a bottle of wine on the table. It hasn't happened in a great while for him to receive any gift from his subjects, making this quite surprising for him. 'If you ever change your mind and decide to move the capital to somewhere warm, I'm fairly sure that many people here would be more than pleased with your choice. 'As the man left the room, it appeared as if the door closed behind him this time. It gave the king a most untrustworthy idea once he made a guard bring him the bottle. Even from touching it, he felt how old it was, a grim thing to say, but true, a good year. 'Well, if that's how it may work. Bring him the next one, I've got a message he should need to deliver. 'Some time passed, people looked at the gate but didn't expect that to happen. All of the sudden, it was opened to its full extent, and a grimace pair of metal shoulders stood on what appeared to be a bulked pair of rocks in stature. It was a royal guard, shining in its armour, cold when it approached. For a moment, a tiny human being he compared with that thing which stood in front of him. Thro this point, he lifted the poor man with one hand and carried it as luggage back into the room. As the royal chamber, he stood, the king waved for him to stop his bickering. Now, it appeared as if he waited in thought. 'I need you to deliver a message to me and don't worry, I'll be more than inclined to perhaps reward you for your service. 'Behind everything, this plan had appeared way too clever, even for himself to admit. 'There's no need for you to bring them word for word from my mouth, understand?'The peasants didn't have the look to him, though he bothered not with the details. Once he was done with what was to be said, the guard opened the gate and almost threw the man unto the ground. It was a strange thing that everyone watched his every move as if he suddenly was filled with emotion and importance. After he lifted himself and cleaned himself of dust, the man went on. 'By the order of his majesty and his decree, this is what it's to be done about the issue of the weather. 'The man suddenly scratched his head, as if trying to remember what was to be done wasn't enough harm to him. But this sudden thing didn't do much for his desire either. 'We will have everyone who wants to move the capital towards the colder place bring me tribute. Those who want the capital moved towards the warmer place will have to do the same. Whoever pleases me, I mean his majesty more shall be the decider of the side. And that is the will of the king I say. 'Once he was done delivering the message, the man had no other care in the world but to escape before anyone thought of asking for a reason. There wasn't any way he'd have to give any explanation to it at all. When the announcement ended, it was as if the line just vanished, leaving nothing but dust on his stairs. Word spread fast and he was pleased, sitting in his room, toying with the people. 'I haven't had so much time since I knew myself, a joyful thing. 'The king thought as he brandished a finger around his bottle. It was a good year as well, a good taste that wouldn't last long. 'If they bring more of these, this plan of mine shall be more successful than I originally thought it to be, won't it?We may even get to have you dressed in new sets of armours if they give us gold or jade or anything that would adorn around you. Joyful, joyful thing, isn't it?'Though nothing changed the silence in the room, which always did more than well to push him into his grim mood. Looking through the sky cube, he appeared to be pale, everyone was talking about it one way or another. Regardless of what was said, nothing was brought to him. Those damn buffoons better make it up to me. Whatever they were planning to do, he thought, it better be good. One more meeting. In the middle of the night, in the same place, a candle lit in the grimmest of the dark. The lords have decided to meet again and brood on what was to be done. 'This would be madness, what's he doing here, can't he see that the crops we invested in are dying?Just what exactly would be in his mind?First the mansion and now this. "Calm down, it's temporary. Not to mention the fact that he won't choose that side over the other while we all agree on which one needs to be taken. Just think about it, will he really choose the side of peasants, traders and commoners over ours?'Despite being hope in what he said, the masked man didn't appear as confident as he thought he'd sound. Luckily, Lady Katherine was here in person to attend. Her eyes juggled around while her half covered face still held the boredom at bay. 'It won't matter, he might even side with them just to spite us all. 'She said, with a tone that appeared to be barring everyone else. 'Then we need to do something until it's too late. 'Regardless of what he chooses, we can't ignore our plan. 'An older man, quite enough to father a few of the people who laid around, there wasn't any dispute about his identity anymore. As a matter of fact, he wasn't even wearing a mask for the time being. It was a pity, though he refused to hide. 'We take care of him as soon as he's done and the storm comes. Do you think those beasts would slumber because it's cold?What about the heat?Will it even hurt their cause?No, they would turn the cold to a cinder and change the snow to rain if they came close enough. 'More than a few agreed with him. Peril was on the way and the king wasn't fit for the rule. Old man Kolbe spoke softly, unmasked, as there was nothing to hide. 'We need to get rid of him and prepare to do whatever we can to protect our assets, isn't that clear by now?'Though grimace aside, problems were on the loose. Members were missing, at least that's what he noticed. It was to be brought after this issue, which came at last. 'We need to be on the warm side, just so that the cold and the snow won't delay the workers in placing of the harpoons and what not. After we end the king, each of us will part ways as we had originally planned. No more arguing about it. 'These men can't be right in the head, she thought as she heard it right. Not only did she not believe it from her servant but from this encounter, there was no denying. Most agreed with him, to the point of being just paid lip service at this point. Boasting about no reason, desire to come clean. 'Well, what about the lords then, the missing ones?'Came Katherine, at last, faced with Kolbe. It was something which cut deep enough to produce tension among the people in the room. 'Well, I think it's more than clear, what we've heard so far. Someone's been killing them, right under our noses. 'There was the aftershock Katherine felt. At least the moment when she heard just how and what happened left a cold grip on her tongue. 'All at night, there wasn't any light. Clean cuts around their throats, without the noise of sings of forced entry. 'Old man, you seem to know a lot of the detail, got anything to tell us?'It was a bold man, though in his right to be paranoid. He took extra steps to cover his face and voice with the help of that mask and others noted that. 'Well, I did use to bribe the guards back in my day, so don't be surprised if you were to hear something that I know over the others. 'This answer was apparently somewhat acceptable, at least no one would care to ask whenever or no, he himself moved his old bones to kill the young lords. On a serious note, Katherine was just as surprised as the others after hearing what happened. Was I expected to be here?'Interesting. 'It was the shock of realisation that made her talk, whilst trying to cover for herself as well. 'Was anyone seen or are there suspects?'Nothing, to begin with, there were done to perfection, every single one of them had the same thing. 'The servants?'Another woman who hid asked. 'No, these crimes were done by something, or someone big enough to crush their ribs and skulls. At least, every crime that happened seemed to have the same thing to it. The door wasn't forced, it appeared to have been a crushing death and suffering involved. And something even worse than that. 'The old man shook about there. Kolbe wasn't going to go as easy with telling it but, alas. 'Haven't you noticed it already?Just have a look around. 'It was a fair thing to say that most of the people who came there were so far removed and filled with self-importance that none of them noticed. But, people were missing. 'Wait, you're not saying that. . . 'Indeed I am, every single murder, done against a council member. 'You don't think he found out. 'He could've, he must've. 'It might be him. 'The king must've sent his guard, that's how he found a way to just be let in. 'There were whispers now laying in the room, loud thoughts and what not. It took just three or four murders for them to catch on with this plot against theirs. But as once, Kolbe appeared to have done his best to calm the others. 'Relax, it may be certain that he's not the one doing this. If he was, would we still be here sipping on wine and plotting? No, we would've been rounded and executed with replacements on their way that would obey. What I'm trying to say is that we may have another thing to deal with before we carry on to the king. And if we don't deal with it. "We'll have no king to deal with, will we?" There was a mutual agreement regarding this problem, at least that of which they knew something was to be done now. At there meres of midnight, when the clock went numb, it was the time that each departed. It was at a broad stroke that they gave up on the meeting and refused to carry on. So it was that they were departed from one another, each on their paths. For once Kolbe wished he wasn't as old and more importantly, left alone despite what he had said. In the frame of the door stood a figure waiting. 'Ah, thank you, it seems that as of lately. 'He hadn't said a word after a few steps. It wasn't that he wanted to be rude or anything, though he had difficulty getting up himself. Once he became aware of how the thing was going, there wasn't anything coming out of his mouth. How did he find out though? No servant knew the place, no one, in particular, knew the leaving hour. Could it be? It wasn't going to end as quickly as he thought despite his age. 'I won't scream. 'Came the sudden statement of the old fox as the man laid a few feet away. It was indeed a club he wore with him, which was used one every previous individual. The way it appeared almost made it seem as if it was sculpted, expensively made, the type that would only be used against them. But who could he be? That last thought did nothing to ease the pain, despite the size of that club, it appeared as if it was hollow on the inside. Each blow that came and was made seemed as if it took its time before striking and breaking of the bones. No one returned or thought of returning until days. An unspoken run as well remained the fact that once they left the room, regardless of something which laid forgotten, neither of them was to return. He knew, with every blow. It spread the blood on the floor and on his chair. Those crooked bones gave in after a third strike, making it seemed as if he was mashing the bone into the harsh wood. As he was obviously going to spend the night now, there was one certain thing at last. In the morning there was none in the old lord's house. Empty halls, no servants, no one at all. Through the night there finally came screams but they were sulking. During the day there was nothing but pure silence. Even those who remembered the old man and thought just how he had come upon the fortune wondered how someone so kind would have become a lord. And each blow made him drop everything he hid upon himself, stolen coin after stolen coin. Filled with blood and on the floor. There were remnants of his pieces spread across the room at night. But what was clear was the fact that the club was cleaned enough to leave no trail of blood, no clue, no mark. Storms of cold ran through the sky in the distance just as well. One look was enough from anywhere, including the capital. There just wasn't any stopping of those wriggling beasts, to the point of where people even wondered if they were the cause of the sudden change of weather. 'It must be then, I'm certain of that. They're tampering with the cold to bring us harm. "Hold on ye pint you old copper, there's nothing going to take it up to us here. It's mere just fairy tales, that's all. 'Men were grinning as they had their ales, looking through the window and peering through the day. Women were pleasantly dancing around with their high cheekbones and red dresses. There was no denying that it was frozen, though the reflection of the lightning was an unpleasant addition. Somewhere in the distance, it was coming. The only people who felt the entire ordeal which happened in the sky were the prisoners. For their cages alone were set below the streets of the capital, much deeper than the dwelling place. They could feel and they could shout and yell. 'Let us go, they're coming for us. 'Though the guardian, a fat man, with a large piece of wood just ran with it across the fingers which stood on the bars. Lines of prison chambers laid, as the placement didn't truly matter now, soon they would be moved. 'Do we really want to start this again?' It appeared that there wasn't any respect for the warden.

That made him become a rather anxious fellow who was bent on making their lives as miserable as possible. 'Let's rearrange your cages then if you're going to fear something, why not me then? Why not now? Come on, move, move. 'The warden appeared to have recalled his guards at the closest wall of which laid the door that leads outside. It was a long way to the top, but no one was concerned. For a moment, they were all seemingly enjoying what was to happen, this dance of torture as they called. At least, for the standing rows of prison cells appeared to have something about them which really made him wonder at that. 'How much do you think they'll last this time? Come on, all here, off the betting. 'They went on, carrying their bets, giving each other coins and other sealed papers that were worth more than what was on. It was a rare thing for a guard to have that, and the warden had failed to see the man that gave it to him. 'Right, give in the numbers. "Ten rotations. Five, eight, no, ten, again. 'There were numbers and some had already begun to tell the exact time they would last before the shouting would come. But before anything was certain, and he was sure of it, he pulled two triggers and started pressing some buttons which laid on the wall. It was time for the show to go on. Suddenly, each cage started pushing the other in a different direction, just as they started floating in the air. For one man to be locked alone in a flying cage was more than enough to take his guts out. Not in the way, but it made them shake in their boots and those things went with their memory.

Switching places, going ahead into those hollow places left where they had been. It wasn't enough at that, as the floor moved like marble pieces back and forth, changing the place of which the cages were laid. Once it had become a maze, the previous time a simple set of straight placed lines, though now they were scarcely placed once the men had begged. 'Give it to you mutton chaps, I've won it all again. What, don't you think I know my own prisoners enough to have them bet upon?' The man's laugh was enough to drown a cat, but it was rather amusing at best to him to look upon them. Whatever the deal was, if it came from the fact that they were so scared of flying or the sound made by the machine, he didn't know. It didn't matter as long as they were all on the ground, cowering or in a stricken position, laying in silence. Though something he had noticed then when others were silent as well. Such powers in the sky shook the very core of this place. Before the news came to it, the matter of the fact was late.

Another island laid in shock, frozen to the side, the buildings and settlements made by people had been destroyed. Even the mountain tops had been entirely frozen and shattered with utmost ease. What did worse remain the fact that their maws always left that shriek in the sky, sharp enough to made dents on the deep-frozen stones? Soon to shatter, soon to fall. It was felt below by the boy and the gang of thieves, who went from place to place to steal. No one had dared look for them from afar as the boy alone was sent to scout the places before each job was to be done. 'A good boy at that, perhaps it will turn like a good investigation to that. 'Said Balstar, now that he had so much of a treasure with another hand to help him in the looting, there was no stopping. 'Perhaps we could make a band, what'cha thinks about that? Eight of us, roaming around, taking what we need and leaving nothing to be piled on the supplies?' 'No Agur, that'd be too much, too many, much less. We'd have too many mouths to feed and too much of the loot being given to the rest of us, it'd be a disaster of unfathomable proportions. 'That aside, it was just the time, for them to go on, just as the boy had scouted just the perfect place. No one will even dare suspect a thing, and even if they did, this was an error-free plan. 'Just like I said, no one knows, they seem just as reclusive as the rest of them. Another easy target, I promise. 'Said Tom, at this point, there was something of an acknowledgement that what he was doing was wrong. He wasn't as concerned with it anymore, but rather enjoyed the challenge and this life until he found a way home. 'There, I found this. 'For once, this building was set in near a stone and a river, seemingly without a single weakness to it. Far too much of it was covered into solid rock for them to jump or try climbing it through. 'Just follow me, I found this secret entrance we may use. 'Just by the stone there laid a tunnel which laid through. On second glance, it seemed as if it was big enough for twenty people to come through at least. Even more surprising was the fact that Tom had found it with such ease. 'You've done good boy, but how did you find it?' As they made their way through, Balstar was the one who lit a torch. Still, no one saw them, from what he knew. It was wet inside, but nothing serious that would dim the torch. 'I believe they made this tunnel in case there was a need to escape if there wasn't any other way through. Look at the wood bars and slabs that are holding the tunnel. "You figured out everything on your own just by looking at it?" Well, it was more like feeling with my hand, I couldn't see in the dark unless I wanted to risk being seen. 'Even Augur was surprised at just how well he handled the entire thing. But one thing still bothered the caged man. 'Where does it lead then?' "That I don't know, I haven't dared open it, merely speculated that somewhere inside I wager. At least I counted the feet and we should be right under the fort before we reach the end of the tunnel. "This might be dangerous if we don't know, shouldn't we wait for the night at least? I can't deal with them just being there and catching us like that. 'The man ground his teeth and one look on him would've made him chew on his antlers at least. He was afraid, paranoid about the fact. Both Balstar and Tom stopped to look at him. 'Something wrong?' "No, yes, maybe. It's this space, too tight for me to stay in, it's making me nervous. "We had just as tight as a home back there Agur, what's the matter with you now? Are you getting cold feet all of the sudden?" "No, nothing like that, it's just that it's starting to make me feel really bad for no reason. "Keep your nerved together man, this is no time for you to be that way, we have a job to bring to an end. Everyone here has something that needs to be done. 'Even Tom was surprised, seeing the man's eyes lose their shine. It was a pity, for the sounds became obvious the further they went in. There was a nod as he bowed his head. From what it seemed like, the more they walked, the more suspicious the entire thing appeared to be. Soon they would both feel just as bad as Agur felt. What if he's right and something is indeed wrong about the place? A tight tunnel that appeared to be hidden and all of the sudden, it made everyone feel sick?" Tom are you sure it's the right thing? Are you certain that it will lead to the fort?" For a moment, he peered into his eyes, past the bars, holding not even the slightest lie to him. 'I don't know, I just supposed it to be true. 'This tunnel was man-made, at least that was his initial impression. Which kind of men? Precisely the reason why everything appeared to be so suspicious. Everything was far too clean for this to be an abandoned tunnel. It made a sudden turn, from going on and being straight to a forked thing. No one had noticed that the road wasn't straight anymore, leading to a crooked path. 'We need to return boss, something's not right here, we've been walking for far too long and there's nothing. "Shut your mouth Agur or I'll shut it for you. We might've stumbled on something better if this turns out to have a treasure at the end. They might've used this place to hide their most valuable things knowing that no sane person would come this far. 'There was no lack of air, but there was something to it that bore through his thick skull. From this point on, there was nothing made by the hand of a man. A strange cave, small at the end of the road. Formations of stone bore through every spot, like pillars but reversed, some being bent over the wrong places as well. It appeared that there was nothing but a small tablet in the middle of the room, being held by a pedestal of stone. Neither of them dared approach that thing or make any step further. An intense sense of paranoid came to each of them inside the room. There might've been something lurking just behind, that wasn't apparent until that point. Even if the torch was to be dimmed, Agur finally decided to use a small glowing rod. It hadn't produced anything else but a red light that seemed to have expanded the shadows to the walls. There wasn't any denying in the fact that they saw another shadow that wasn't theirs. It came from behind and moved in unknown paces that made the three of them rather uncomfortable. For once this came as the most logical conclusion that they needed to make do. Both Balstar and Agur stepped back and held the torch, making it rather darker into the room. Agur had stepped two more feet behind. He wanted to run, undeniably, though something still made him wait for them. 'Good luck Tom, you can do this. 'Said Agur, though looking at it, there was nothing standing behind the boy. Instead, the only trace of a being laid in the shadows, which were already outstretched because of where they stood. 'Take the tablet, Tom, then we'll make a run for it like we've never been seen before. 'This he already got, with each step making it worse. Whispers, enchanted senses, he could hear the wind coming through the hollow holes all the way to the top where air had been coming through and providing. Even with that in mind, he still felt the stench this type of air had to it and just how sick it made the boy fell. It was tainted and he was afraid of catching something that would cripple him. Don't touch the table. It was the sound of a man, that he had heard for the first time, in all that gibbering and stagnation of animal and being that he couldn't understand. 'Who are you?' Both of the men appeared to be paranoid about what the boy could possibly hear. They had experienced it just the same, not at the same level as Tom, had but they both knew that voices came into their heads. Rather, looking at it, Tom had come to understand that the place from which they were coming from laid above his hand. Into the many holes there breed the damn sound, coming through from various places. Even if it was mostly covered in grown moss, he could understand just well enough, though Tom could almost see through the thick stone. Some of the tunnels lead, perhaps too far above, to the point where it made him wander whenever or not it was still here or it came through the sky. 'Don't stop now Tom, you're almost there. "Snap out of it boy, we need to get out as soon as you're doing well with that. 'At the point where he was two feet away from the stone which held the tablet, both of them men sounded as if they were the ones that were whispering through a small passage in the stone. Something cold guided and wrapped itself around the boy. He felt it repelled one it tried going through one of his entries, just to be tainted as well by the remnants of what he had been poisoned by. The whispers ended as soon as that slithering thing left with a shriek. After it ended, that damning silence was more than welcomed, just as soon as he wrapped his hands around the tablet, Tom returned and ran to them. It was slippery and old. Quite heavy despite what it looked like, but there weren't any complaints when it was taken away from him. 'Let's get out now boss, this place is starting. It's starting to rot out on us. "What is going on with you now Agur?" The cages didn't block his light and neither did it to his common sense, but he was right. Moss grew on cold cold stone and started decaying. On a glance, some grew on the wood and it started making it swell under pressure. 'You're not wrong about that one Agur, go on. Just go already Tom, Agur. 'The man sent both of them in front and followed. Being sent alone without a torch already made it more difficult than it should've been. With a quick break, he took another torch and lit it with the previous one. 'This should hold us now. 'With a glance at the abandoned torch, he saw how the moss grew around it and devoured both the wood and the flame. 'Careful Tom. 'Without having to admit to it, Agur fell and broke it in half. 'I'm sorry Balstar, it was an accident, no more than. "You damn idiot, grab it now, we're already in too deep a trouble to wait for anything. Tom, grab the other half of the table and let's go. 'Behind them, heavy sounds appeared to have come through. 'It was now that they ran through that they managed to outrun the destruction that came through the tunnel, only to find out. 'Someone blocked the exit. Exactly my damn luck. First the breaking, now this. A damn cave-in at its finest. 'Even with his own, he could barely speak at that, with a crackling voice he noticed that the tablet was shattering as well. 'Just throw that damn thing, we've already broken it past anything that could be salvageable. There needs to be another way out. "We could try pulling and throwing the rocks out. 'Said Agur, though his request was promptly denied. Not only that but it made him shiver just thinking of this as a damn trap, to begin with. A trap for some damn thieves, it must've been that way all along. 'Come, there should be another place or something. 'The man looked as if one of those bars had come through his damn brain. He started patting the walls from one side to the other. 'Are you all right Balstar? There's no way out, there's no need to try. "Help me, boy, like you helped me before, I know there's something here, just take the damn opposite wall. You do the same thing now Agur unless you want those antlers flattened with the rest of your skull. 'The sound of that did more than frighten the man. This did send everyone into a working shock, and as they did so, it became clear on what was about to happen when the entire tunnel was to be gone. 'This is it, boy, I think I found the hollow side. You'd better help me Agur, come to me now!" The man shouted and as he did so, his companions came immediately to his side to help. It had to be fast but the tunnel waited for no moss nor for the decay. Without the support, there was nothing to hold the stones from usurping the place and falling below. A tainted thing which came as fast, there just wasn't any chance. Sounds of burial in stone left not even a mark that they were there. At least from outside, no one knew that there were people hidden in the rocks no more. It passed through the night this thing of unknown fate.

Deep inside the bowels of the earth, it almost seemed as if it swallowed everything it could, forcing, pushing, crushing in the end. Though the land was that way, deep in the air, it was slow to become uninhabitable, to say the least. On a sudden note through the coming days, there was an impulse, a crowd of self-made ships that came to the capital. It first appeared as an invasion from the looks of it, by their sheer numbers alone. 'What in the name?" Said a man, who looked past his coat, covered by now in the first signs of snow. If the king wasn't busy having his room filled with gifts he'd used, especially the drinks and goblets, the coins and gold, he would've seen. The door opened without having to invite someone. It was a shocking thing done with someone who had apparently the guts to budge in. 'Who dares?" My lord, there are ships flying above the capital, come see!' As he heard it, the man was thrust outside by a gust of wind and plainly ignored. If it weren't for the fact that he had glanced above and seen it, there would've been nothing making him just go ahead and watch through the sky cube. It didn't take much to find out that the king didn't want to be bothered with this. Could it be an invasion or war? It took him only a glance at the sky cube to peer right into their ships. The closer he got inside, the easier it was for him to see that there weren't weapons but they did carry their valuable things with them. A strange thing, at least, that was certain, as it appeared to be no invasion. 'Alas, those damned things decided to flee from their islands. It means that it's already becoming too late, they will have to come and taint my capital. 'Through the heart and past the liver of the capital, still laid that growing menace past the engine, growing still. Despite having starved itself, the wriggling beast had started eating pieces of itself, though not before devouring stone. For once, this would've been better if it was known, but even as it held some form of conscience, it wriggled its stained teeth, looking at the only thing that held the capital together. 'Summon the lord again, hear me? Guards!' This impulse was supreme. So far no one dared lower their ships, other than the fear or respect, it was hard to look upon where they could land them. Some already took the initiative as they saw Sheppard's plane, how barren it lay without a sheep or even a dog. At least, it appeared to have been as strange as it could be, to begin with, but they didn't think it'd matter as long as they were safe. 'Well?' Now, the royal chamber was filled with a bunch of them. The street was already covered by the many people who were trying to figure out as well whenever or not this was to be a problem or not. 'This is a damned thing, I'd say, how could so many of them have learned how to make ships in such a short span of time?' 'Your majesty, if I may step in. 'Certainly, as the man looked around, not to mention having peered at the others to observe their reactions. From what he could tell, they thought of it to be just as bizarre. Goblets, gold coins, silver platters, forks and spoons and chests? Swords, axes, spears, all ceremonial, covered in jewels, to say the least after those that laid on the side. Adorned pearl and many other beautifully crafted pieces of armour, of which, he hadn't noticed but someone had made the exact replica of the helmet the king wore. It stood just by his side, looking into the darkness left by the empty places in-between the small hills of gold. It was clear that more than one from inside this very room has given him a gift. More than that, at least everyone felt some guilt to a degree after facing him. Not that he wasn't guilty of having done the same. 'But I may continue now and say, they seemed to have started docking into Sheppard's lane. Many more ships are on their way, the messages came. 'This was quite dismissed as he was enamoured still by looking into his cube. Though the man would've liked to talk about nothing more than the murders that happened, especially one that happened so recently, this was more important. 'We need you to step in and do something. 'Yes, we need a king now, not a . . . 'For a moment, they appeared to have forgotten themselves and the presence of which they were in. The king had already stepped up and peered through at them. It was enough to silence and for them to understand that they'd obey. 'Now, let them do as they please. It isn't my problem and we may be able to use their ships when the time comes. 'But we can't feed so many mouths, your majesty. 'Do you even care you slumbrous Buffon?' There had come another problem apparently, once the wave was felt inside the capital as well. 'What now?' There had been waves of air, which pushed the entire structure, merely but a slight of back and forth. It disturbed everyone to the point where they felt the hot and cold coming on both sides. Blistering, freezing, both could feel for the worse. 'It's time to move the citadel at once your majesty. If we drag more on this entire thing, the progress which we've made to defend the capital will have been for nothing. 'Don't you think I wasn't aware of that? You lords, think you're all so clever and that you've got everything figured out. 'Specifically, the king was approaching Matthew, one young man who inherited the fortune out of his father's death. Convenient enough, to say the least, it was certainly true. 'I know everything that goes around, even before it reaches your damn ears, do you hear me? Every plot and every single damn thing you've ever thought of. 'There was a silence which bore everything into the room. 'Go, two of you, activate the engines. 'Two guards came out of the darkness and vanished on the outside. No telling could possibly say of which engine he was actually talking about when it came to moving the entire capital at once. A habit of keeping secrets, at least that's what he wanted it to be believed as. 'Are we free to go now. 'No, not until we're talking about what your little plan was, my so-called assassination under my own weapons. 'You knew. 'Of course, I knew you damn little insignificant thing, what did you think it'd happen?' One maddening rage made one of the men which laid in the room pull out the shaft of one of the spears. It was purposefully hidden inside of his coat for this occasion alone, where he charged like an animal. Ready for the kill, the king barely raised a hand and grabbed his hand without saying a thing. There was certainly, no possible escape from that grip. At least, as far as he was concerned, he was caught without a way to escape. 'Ready to give up now?' 'No, your rule had gone for far too long, there's no way we're going to stand for you to be king any longer. It's either this or. 'The small interruption gave him enough time to search in his coat for another one of the small shaft heads. It was too late already. His last moment came with the finality of his word. 'Death. 'Came out of his own mouth, blood sprouting once he realised that the thing that wasn't a man, which stood in front of him had already pierced his body. To be even more precise, he had punched a hole through the spot where his heart had been.

Pushing the body on the side, he saw the two spearheads, picking only one off the ground. 'Was this your plan? Certainly, it couldn't have been everything you had, had it?' With a mocking and taunting flair, he pushed the spear as hard as he could inside his hand. After the pressure came, it was the point where the shaft, as certain as it was made out of metal got crushed. 'Without a doubt, it couldn't be that you thought you could kill me with my own weapons. Or that I'd make weapons that were strong enough to end my own life. Preposterous!' He shouted and he laughed. Lords were quite scarce lying in this room, even from what he had remembered. 'Quite in time as well. 'Said the king, with a glance at the sky cube, he noticed that the capital was already in the hot zone. 'Did you call us here to laugh at us?' 'Are we going to execute us?' 'One at the time please, there's no need for us not to act civil, is it?' With a wave of the hand, one armoured creature took the corpse off the ground and carried it back in the dark. There could've been no telling how big his hold was, past the dark veil. Neither if he chose to spend most of his time in this small room, but it was certain that there was something behind it. Chances were that he could've been hiding the entire castle he was living in behind this room. This concern wasn't for them though. 'You were the one that's been killing us!' It was rather an accusation that anything close to the question, though the king wasn't even close to being offended. 'No, that wasn't me. 'But you know about it. 'Said Katherine. She was already glancing at him. A rare occasion for her to be seen among other lords. It was strange seeing her here among them now that they were a few of them left. 'I knew about it from the first night, though I had nothing to do with it. Understand that I wasn't exactly to be imposed on helping since I knew about the coup you were planning all along. "So you'd rather have us all killed rather than do any work for yourself. A hellish king you are, your majesty. "Watch it, Belek, was it? I'd rather not have your stench fall into my hall like the rest of them have. Now sit and listen. For once, I'm willing to throw aside our differences and work together in solving this. "There's nothing to solve, just get the killer and end him. You said you knew everything. "More than enough. "And you know who the killer is. "I certainly do. "This was something he plainly came to admit, though he showed no sign of remorse about the fact. None of the fact that he didn't help earlier. He took control and ordered them around. The king was finally off his high chair and walked on the same ground. Now that the two guards return, he spoke to them at last. 'Listen to me and make it well. I will perhaps look into this situation if you vow never to break our trust again. No more meeting in the dark, through the place you've thought of being safe of heart. The plots have to end, your damn things against me, none will prevail. If you continue on this path, I can promise you that every single one of you will be executed in public. 'It was enough to say that he was planning on humiliating them by murder with so many of the peasants looking at them. As such

was enough to raise doubts about any plan they might've had, it made everything clear. We lost, damn him, we lost. Thought one of the lords, of that being certain. Without a way to hurt him or to fight back. Without protection or anyone else to help them now. And last, but not least, with a killer on the road which wasn't taken care off. There came the first one that knelt. It came with many surprises. 'Well, well, it seems like I've not spoken for anything pale. 'Suddenly, the others followed Katherine as well. He was paying a special kind of attention on her, for no reason whatsoever. Though something was certain about the protection she had around her house. 'I swear. 'There came another voice which said the same thing, soon making it seem like it was the formal chant for those who betrayed their king. 'Never will I even step on your word again. "I'm never to stab at you in the dark. "Shall I go on the wrong path again?I accept any consequence a thousandfold again if thou deemest as being fair. "Your majesty, my life is yours. 'Words which tickled the king, in a manner that neither of them could tell or say. There wasn't any expression in that dark void which he hid away, though the pleasure was certain. 'Very well, I accept your apologies, even if some of you didn't mean what you've said entirely. From now on, I'm certain that we'll be more than enough on the right path. Every single one of us, together, working towards anything that threatens our existence. With that in mind, you can stand. You're all dismissed. "That's all?But what about the murders and the beasts?"I'll take care of it, there's no need for you to wrap your tiny head around it. At least not anymore, now that I'm back in charge of my kingdom, I can promise you that everything will end up as being safe. 'There laid a grimace that was notable, mainly from the fact that he was fuming from below his helmet. It was a rare thing to see him do, but they were now dismissed. Outside, they spoke their last words together, putting down their heavy coats, seeing the people confused over the change. 'It seems like we're not the only ones who've been crushed now. 'For once, when the gate was broken, the king used no cube but came upon the door and listened to them talk. What could they be saying to me now?It was a pitiful thing which he did, though he certainly didn't care. No one which laid around him had a mind of his own to judge. 'Well, at least we got off easy. 'That's Katherine, isn't it?Thought the gates were thick enough, he wasn't as hard of hearing. Two more were having a conversation, though certainly, they were too far to be heard. 'Easy?That damn. That damn king almost came to thinking about stripping us of all of our titles and murdering us in public. "You're exaggerating now, don't worry about it. It could've ended a lot worse. Don't worry about him now, as long as we keep our share of the deal and don't try anything. I think we'll be fine. There's no need to push our luck now. "Not for you Katherine, but we'll see what's coming for him. You'll all see. 'The damned thing, even after a demonstration he couldn't understand. He could hear his steps right there, leaving only Katherine alone, standing by the door. If it was something he remembered, there were two mercenaries she hired to guard her around. Most likely, she still waited for them. 'You know I'm aware that you were listening, aren't you?'She caught me, no, no, not like this. Say no word yet, she may think you're not. 'Don't say a word, there's no need for that now. I don't mind eavesdropping, even if it comes from someone such as yourself. "How did you find out?"I'm not deaf, I could hear your steps following ours. "Does anyone else know?Is anyone else watching you speak for yourself?Tell me now!'Katherine gave quite a startled laugh. 'We're alone now, most of them seemed to have been on their way by this point. And no, no one can see my lips moving from the distance, my head is turned, you see?'There had been some bottles on the ground, which he might've gotten, instead, he just turned around and stood on the floor, with his back against the door. 'Lousy week, wasn't it?'Without knowing of the same act, Katherine appeared to have done the same thing. Both of them being at a level they could both hear as well. 'You're telling me? It was just enough trouble keeping all of them at bay by myself. "Having your servant take your place while you're home working? Come on, that was beyond ingenious, it was a master's craft. And you've pulled it more than once. 'He has certainly done watch a lot of the moves they've made, perhaps even to the point where they even thought of plotting in the first place. 'Tell me one thing, king. Did you know it all along?" There was a shrug she couldn't see from the other side. 'I'd rather keep it as a mystery, don't you think? We've all got our secrets after all and I wouldn't want to spoil everything to the first woman I met. "It feels as if the cold has vanished by now, good job on your part I guess.

"Sure you won't miss it? I can always just bring the entire thing around. "At the request of just one?" The thought alone gave her a smirk, turning the entire capital in the cold just because she enjoyed seeing snowflakes fall. Just for her alone. 'Perhaps another time, wouldn't you say?' "I don't think. 'There was a pause stricken by something in the dark, he was certain of this. But no yet, she couldn't know. He's had the thought alone for the longest of time, though now. 'Well, how would feel like if we were to leave, the two of us and never return to this place. No king, no lord, just the two of us exploring the world. Let them deal with those beasts while we explore the world. 'The thought of that would most likely not go as planned. He had it all in his mind, what he'd say, the many possible ways she'd respond. From the best to the worst possible scenarios possible in the first place. 'No, I'd rather not leave everything behind. That's insane, how could the king abandon everything he's ever done. Bored of your toys and now you decided to leave? After killing so many of the lords? You could've waited and left one of them in charge so the capital won't be left falling. I hate you and there's no way someone like me could love a creature such as yourself. 'Though it never came out of his mouth. The chance never came. Instead, she was the one to speak first, Katherine. 'Can you see the dawning sun from your side? It's quite beautiful seeing it from here. 'It interrupted whatever line of thoughts he might've had by now. Well enough, he responded just as well. Without any other resistance, he opened the door and laid there just beside her. Quite the sight, seeing him stand there, almost looking like someone normal when sitting next to her. Katherine's surprise wasn't dimmed by the fact that he had come in person, but of the fact that he had enjoyed the view as much as she did. All of the sudden after so much time, it wasn't that he had feared as being seen or what he's done. He stood there next to her, seeing the sun go down. The nights were cold past the mist below. It wasn't as if the entire world wasn't affected by the reign of the beasts. What they've done in the sky, the imbalance produced had taken a toll throughout nature. Ravaged plants were growing, filled with torn and walled. It was a mad thing just looking at them fighting now, inside the remnants of what used to be a sea. Mourning bloated things that used the bodies of the men and women that fell from above. They fed and carried their water sources inside them, just to push around for their final joust. Oh, tainted thing, reanimating what appeared to have been a damaged brain. It seemed as if the captain walked, lost inside a nightmare or a dream. He saw nothing but a tainted rage, a belly filled but felt no pain. Perhaps it wasn't the brain alone but most of his organs being damaged which prevented him from talking. Even his memory got affected to the point where he had remembered. With a sudden urge of control, he pushed around what remained of his clothes and saw that someone or something had tied what was cut out. 'What's this?' There came a surprise, sudden when he realised that the bloated speech was also sharp and hard for the ear. It pierced, it brought much of the pain he forgot he could feel and remind him of that alone. No, speak, walk. 'Thought the captain, looking around the corpses which had laid on the ground. It was quite obvious by some glances that those which were damaged and opened by the belly had been annihilated. He couldn't believe that there could've been a worse fate than this. But it didn't end as far as he was concerned. Perhaps a defence mechanism had made the bodies which were left behind evolve into something else. The faces at least were pushed forward, left to seek for any kind of liquid they could find. He saw that it desperately tried getting to a pool of water, to the point of almost tearing itself apart. 'Damn abomination. 'What he said might've not come out as words, but the piercing thing was enough to scare it into feigning death. Just what exactly is going here? There wasn't any need for him to be called, he thought he saw another bloated form, covered by the mist. An air of similarity came to him and he wondered there and then. Could it truly be? Here with me? "Who are you?" The shrieking thing came to bloating some of his own blood out. Though it was certain that the figure had heard him and suddenly flown off into the distance. Damn thing won't get away now! Though the lands might've been laid to waste, still one thing was certain. Watchers standing on the rotting trees crows just watching and listening. It was a thing of certainty but, the least could've been said. A man out there could've sworn on his life that he was being watched. Though there was no man alive going through the mad gates. Bones and skin, ears were used as well, tall and roundish were the gates which were abandoned in the fields. Someone was busy, enough that they'd build those monuments of war. But what exactly was it that they were? The captain wasn't sure, most likely because every other function either got delayed or it was abandoned almost entirely in favour of that. His limbs had become blobs of steel which felt like nothing they appeared to be. Forming a fist looked as if he was carrying a rock around, to begin the pounding. Relentlessly, he heard another shriek, one that felt familiar despite this entire ordeal. Even worse than that now remained, the falling rock from the sky which came. Big enough to crush everything in sight. A flight of survival came at last and blinded his eyes. Now there came to no other desire but for the beings residing into his body to form a flight from the recent sight. 'Wake up, lousy slob, it's time for supper. 'Said a man. It was on one of the mountain tops, at least the ones which were still left unsettled. Unconquered, without ever having to deal with a frontal attack for those things that wanted to suffer him to die. Certainly, this wasn't the deal against what turned to be them come. Though no one was safe, not now, not in winter. People hid in caves and kept the fire going. Past the area where the caves had its entrance, there were even prolonged sides of stone floors on which the older ones could go and stay. It was fairly left in an open area, which might've left them open to any attack, though this wasn't as certain as they were of it. 'It came again, the great beast, it's come to finish us off. "Just eat your damn supper and get back to work, it's already come countless time. What makes you think it'll do anything else now?" The pounding never stopped, and neither of them had yet to realise that it had cut off the mountaintop and threw it into the nothingness which laid below. 'But. "Don't worry about it Abacius, there's no way he'll be able to come. They need to fly all the time, haven't you just seen their limbs? If one of them were to enter, there's be no way for it to get out. "But what if. "You worry too much, we're just a few left. We got nothing to use in order to escape. On top of that, the weather outside is getting worse, and most likely is going to get a lot worse. Out the only option is this, we either go deeper into the mountain or stay here and continue our work. "Won't they come and rescue us, master?" Said a voice from the small crowd which laid behind. Bhoemius looked mightly at them and was immediately ready to settle the entire ordeal. Though as he raised himself, he almost fell. 'That damn thing just won't stop today, will it?" I'm telling you, master, it's going to try coming inside to have us all. At least, let's try fighting back against it. "We have no weapons you rock taker, there's nothing we could do if it came to it attacking us. At best, I doubt we have anything which could pierce it. Don't you understand man, we either dig our way down where we may have a chance to hide or we die here. "But what will we eat? Is there nothing out there but like and stone-water?" It was their only option, of what would be their last meal and the light of day. Though the cave was being usurped too fast for them to do anything else. 'Back to work now, before it's too late. 'Through the veils of the sky, every beast had been busy, cleaning the lands, crushing the stones with their jolts of lightning, bolts of power. Either that or most just charged through. As long as this continued, there wasn't any way anyone could fight back. Most of the ships had anchored on the capital already and fortified what positions might've been places. Ships had been fashioned into small towers. Small towers became armed with launchers that would come right so, strong enough to aim and end the life of another. 'Let's see, won't we now? We wait until the last second. 'Said the voice. They were of the few people which chose to fight. Refashioning their structures into a twisted catapult, they waited for the beast to face their cave. Fires were started and dimmed by the cold, others ran out when the snow came as told. But one of the people which laid hidden and waited for the moment to come. They chose to fire the rock catapult from the forest, covered in snow. It came and cut the veils and finally a strike. Though to no avail now, as the rock was smashed against the body of the wriggling beast. It noted and in rage, it turned with its many maws. A crackling falling weaved a web of lighting falling and dripping and its rage took over and destruction followed. From what could be told by the fleeing men, women and children, it appeared as if this phenomenon tempered with the weather around them. It made everything grow a lot hotter around the places where the bolts of lightning fell. One small thing already flew by one of the fleeing villagers and boiled him alive. A manner of mere seconds served as something tainted and ended just as fast. Screams and shouts couldn't deny what was happening now. The twisted trees which were rotten and started blooming in the winter sky. Something was pouring through the hole and it wasn't right. It appeared as if the hole in the sky was leaking, the pit was stalling for attention and infecting the air. The only certainty was the fact that there remained the only one which knew of its existence. No one noticed as far as one was concerned, but the relentless things couldn't be hurt. Those beasts ruled the sky undisturbed for the time being, covered in a coat that protected them even from the cold. No one was aware of how they managed to feed themselves despite having nothing to at their disposal. Destruction was upon them! 'It's coming, run, run you damned ones! Before it's too late, we need to escape and hide, into the caves!' Those that had their hidden caves ran towards their only hope. Others dug up holes and made their own entries, especially now that their only hopes couldn't have laid in the sky. It was their domain now. And areal view had much revealed to the king, seeing how days and weeks had passed and it was getting worse. For those who couldn't have escaped, it was a pointless thing to try and build floating devices. 'What could you be, creatures, beings, mad thing that dare ruin my rule. You'll perish but it should come. 'By now, there had been a few lords inside the room, doing great to help him see that something had to be done before they reached the capital. Sets of maps, there wasn't any need for them. The only one which remained was of the capital, with its every corner, section and street fairly placed so in view. Strange, he thought, that the murderer would stop like that. It didn't help the least that they thought he was the one who had sent him. No, a coincidence of such proportions was utmost unacceptable, to say the least. 'Well, what are we to do if your spears don't work?' 'The next best thing after that, we've planted enough that we could wrap them around their bodies and trap them inside the capital. "We're to starve them like that? But what will happen when their electricity runs through the chains? Ropes won't be able to do the task as well as you think they'll do. "It's because I don't think where the energy will go might be a problem. I've had this idea of mine for a while, in case you were wondering, we could've connected them to the generators inside the rooms where the engines are. That way we might both power the capital and bring it to its full potential. "They were looking at him as if he was a madman. Certainly, he lived for ages and knew how they worked, but no even he could be as transparent as that. 'It couldn't last. 'Said Bernad, he was fairly old and might've seen the king in action in his young age. 'No even you could claim that we could handle that kind of power, especially if that would be their only thing left before they'd die from starvation. "And what exactly do you propose Bernad? Well, as if ending their lives wasn't my plan, to begin with. "There may be another thing to consider. 'There were voices speaking in choirs and everyone appeared to have been talking to one another in their groups. Certainly, neither of them would've simply dismissed what he was about to say. 'We don't know for certain but what if we lower the ship, take it down to the ground. For once, it's not certain whenever or not they could possibly come there and follow us there. And I think. . 'He raised a hand, as the king he listened. Enough of that, at least it was enough for him. 'I wouldn't be surprised if this capital would be brought to ruin and my subjects dead within a week if it came to that. "Do you really think it's still dangerous down there?" Said another voice, mustering himself as a man. They had all heard stories of it but none of them as far as they were concerned travelled down there with a ship or anything else. Some people who might've been mad came to their dances with their clouds and ended below. None so far returned or had seen it go well. 'We will go with the original plan and if it came to it. 'His hand rested on one of the skyboxes, as concerned as he was, he nodded. There was a shake above the roof above. It wasn't much for certainty what had laid there or what exactly lit the rooms in which they were. Even vaguer was the fact that they found food growing on stone, the good water of the depths as well as they managed to find places to go. They came really well when thinking about them, small holes which might've had something shivering hot at their ends, melting whatever piece fell below. Neither Balstar nor Agur had complained too much about what happened. At least Tom was having much of a grand time exploring every rock formation which had run across the path they've taken. To this point, there were stones laying which could be called anything but natural, at least in their appearance. 'Won't you tried doing that now? It's not like we haven't seen stone after stone and nothing but stone. 'It was true to a point, though there was something about the shine that changed. From a point, they hadn't realised it yet, but that wasn't stone anymore. Something about it, bore the records of sound if you were to chug your ear against a piece of it long enough. 'If only you'd listen to it, I know you'd have enjoyed it as well as I did on the way. "It was that damn thing that you took, wasn't it? That's the thing that must've turned you that way, what was it?" The tablet, boss. "Thank you, Agur. 'It was something of a sarcastic tone. For as long as he was concerned, there came a hit in the head, which seemed to have avoided the antlers. 'Why did you do that?" You know properly well why I did it. After all, it's been long coming ever since we came here. "I don't know what I've done, not unless you tell me, boss. "You're the reason why we're here Agur, you were supposed to be the one checking the damn entrance and see if it was safe. "But I have checked it before we came here, I swear. It just happened the way it did but not because of me. "Damn you Agur, if we hadn't the company, I would've. 'Tom was starting to gaze at the two men, looking as calm as he usually remained. He was chewing on that plant even at the moment with the slightest sign of concern on his face. 'You like that thing, Tom? At least one of us appears to enjoy something in this place. 'Tom nodded, as far as he was concerned, he was rather neutral about this entire problem. At least I'm not alone, he often saw it as. Not to mention the fact that the two of them bickering left quite the impression of familiarity among them. It reminded him of the scenes he had witnessed back home, often involving his mother and a maid of some kind. 'Look, I think I've found something. "Another small crawling thing, boy? Because I'm not sure I'll be able to do this anymore if I'll keep having to travel. "No, I think this is a lot bigger than that. 'It appeared that the tight space was about to end. For once, it wasn't as if either of them could see past anything in that shroud. But for as long as they could see, space was enormous, not to mention that the rocks were shaking fairly so. 'Could those be people there?' An innocent question came from Agur. Before either of his companions could answer and dismiss it, this did raise an important question. 'Tom, can you see that thing on the top of the stone?' 'The hand mark?' Both of them nodded in agreement, before seeing it disappear. Some moving dust appeared to have concealed the top of some stones and revealed the others as well. It was a movement which appeared to have been distinct and covered as much of the ground as it could. The steep slope appeared to be dangerous in front of them, as well as it would've been if it came for them to come back. 'How much rope do we have now?' Everyone appeared to have checked themselves as harsh as they could've done. It was something of a surprise when all three of them came to thickets of rope that would've allowed them to go as far as half of the way down. Or a quarter?' Just how deep do you think it is now?' 'I don't know, boy, but we're about to find out. At least, if it came to it, we'll be sure that nothing wrong happens to either of us, understood? We've got your back and you've got ours. 'This was something of a cheerful thing. Tempering with the ropes had to be interlocked to the point of having to hold two grown men and what appeared to have been a young adult. 'Well, this might help. "What now Agur? Oh, where did you get that from?' 'I carried it with me, all the way from our home. 'It was, plainly as he could see, around, heavy rock. There had been no rocks so far as they could've seen around, too clean for anything of the sort. 'Agur, you're a damn genius, you know that?' 'Tom, tie the rock as well as you can while we're connecting the other slithers of rope. We'll see just how deep this goes in no time. 'As well as it went, there came a sudden lowering movement, which appeared to rub itself against whatever it could find. After minutes of going after strand and strand, the steep on-one thing felt as if it was lowered into a hole. There was a straight cliff that would've most likely broken a bone or two if it were for them to descent alone. It wasn't the fact that they could've figured that on their own, but for Agur who had listened to the ground as well. 'I think Tom might be right about those whispering things. They say it may be all right for us to go down at the moment. 'By the time it reached, the apparent ground, Tom had been done as well when it came to tying the rope around one of the rock formations. 'Here it goes then. 'Surprised by the act, Tom waited and held Agur just in his place. 'We'll do one at a time, right? That way, in case there'd be any danger, we'll know what's to happen after that. "Not like either of you have any other choice than this? There weren't any other tunnels out there. So, if it comes to anything happening to me down there, just wish me luck. 'Both looked in content as their leader disappeared.

Time passed, until all of the sudden, there came a human shriek as well as a cry for help. 'Balstar, something happened to him. 'Prepared Agur before he came to a mighty roar. 'Balstar, Balstar, please. 'Before he could be rallied off, the echo of a laugh came. It was barely audible from the distance, but the voice had indistinguishably belonged to the man. 'Don't do anything rash now, I'm all right. 'The sudden urge made the man want to strangle him before tampering him back to life. 'Tom. I think you should be next. At least go ahead until I calm down. 'It was the time, and both followed as it went. When the moment came and all three of them were there, everything had shimmered between the men. Quite a rare thing to see Balstar as happy and entertained as he was, though this wasn't about to last as much as he thought it would. 'Now what?' 'We have a way back in case of anything going wrong, just be certain of it. At least here we could see to it that we might find a way out, something real we could follow perhaps. "Or we could go even deeper and get lost. "Tom, it's either this or digging our way out, which we can't since there are no tools at our disposal. No tunnels back there either. 'Agur and Tom were prepared to add something but paused at the thought. It wasn't exactly something that met either of their expectations. Nothing about it made sense, though the small cones in which they stood seemed as if it was avoided by the fragments which flew around. Perhaps neither of them had noticed, but Tom had been staring at the ground for long enough to say. 'Look down there, are you seeing what I'm seeing?' The two of them listened to Tom as well as when it came to it. 'What could this be?' Stretching a hand apparently seemed as if it cut a path through it. Either that or the veil was alive and avoided the big beings which had entered for a reason. 'I've got an idea, I've done this before, just to be certain of it. Wrap this around the two of you as well, that way we won't be lost if it comes for us to be suddenly swallowed by whatever this veil is. "That's a great idea, Tom. 'Agur appeared to have been his old self in no time, not to mention how fast he wrapped the piece of rope around him. This was the last piece Tom had, henceforth, it was more than valuable for the rest of them. 'Can we go now? We still have to get through. 'Both of them nodded, after seeing how he wrapped himself around. Going through there felt as if they were scaling through the marches. The ground felt soft and lowering itself with each step as well. It was still dark and a rigid feeling crept between them. 'What exactly could this be? Small creatures, or flies? What other explanation would do?' 'Don't start going on now, I don't want to think about it kid, not unless I desire a good night's sleep. 'The thought of it alone, of three pieces of organic stone, making a place for millions of them swarming around and even to the point of making an entry was damned. 'It won't come to that. We'll be out in no time, we have to believe it. 'The thoughts stopped momentarily, as they reached the first big structure. Apparently, something about it appeared to have curved inside, to the point of rock steps being formed naturally in some certainly bizarre manner. It was clear, immediately how unnatural it seemed. Even as Balstar looked behind at them, they appeared as if they understood what he was thinking and nodded. 'If something's there, we need to check for it. 'At last, they entered, with each step feeling as natural as it would've been for a human to walk on. Despite the lack of light, there was one bore at the top of it. Strangely, it called to them, each listened, came close, slowed down and took on the same pace. 'Wait a minute, I need to do this first. Just to be certain it isn't a phenomenon happening everywhere. 'Tom had just a feeling of what it was. With his ears atop of the stone, he stood there and listened. By the sides, voices were thinner and their cries were entirely whole. Now they had suffered through enough that they'd have to have someone listen to their wails. 'Tom, Tom, pull away from that damn thing. You've spent too much time listening to their wails and these voices, this is important, not them. Whatever you hear there won't count if we're lost here, do you understand?' 'I do understand. I'm sorry, it's just, I thought they could help like they did before. But it's almost as if there are too many of them there, all of which wanting to be heard. "Let it go already the boy, there's nothing but misery waiting for you in that path. We've got something well to do here now as at any time. 'With a shove and a pull, they had reached what appeared to be the inner chamber. Lit by a faint light, the room was round, quite big from the inside. If one were to tell, this was just a giant spherical top on what appeared to be a giant conical stone. Strangely, there laid a machine made of fornicated organic tools which pulled up and down in motions. It made the most nerve wrecking sounds as it continued pumping its vents. Undoubtedly it made up for something which had to do with all the emptiness inside. 'Pull that thing, Balstar, you're the closest one to it. 'His composure might've been lost until that point before Tom even came to suggesting this. But it was to be done. The machine was something new, at least of which he had seen. Though as soon as he listened to what Tom implied, he pulled the lever and saw the glow it produces on the outside. Partially transparent it appeared, they could see those swarming things making their way inside. Down the steps, Agur said. 'We should go back, they're trying to get up as well. 'To his advice, the three of them were going in a line, trying their best not touch any of them, as well as not being touched. It was obvious by now that the room upstairs was going to be filled with as many of them as they appeared to have flown. There was no denying at this point, the rush they went through when first glance fell upon them. 'No, they seem less inclined to even touch us, why do you think that is?' 'I don't know boss, but I don't like waiting for them to change their minds if they are what they are. 'Augur was still perplexed by the small point that appeared to have flown. Outside, around the small structure of stone, when they were done filling its insides, it seemed to have cleared around. 'Look, the light. 'They pointed and saw just how much of the area had been covered in the warmth of that beacon that produced light. Now, they could see for as far as this hall went, it was filled with as many of them as there could be. Even to the point of guessing that someone might've left them this way. 'I've got an idea. 'Said Tom, as he was already set on unwrapping himself of the rope. 'Are you certain about this kid? If we're wrong about them, or even for a second they decide to turn against us, there'd be nowhere for us to go. Nor would be able to help you. 'I'll be fine, Balstar, Augur, the both of you will be fine doing this on your own, will you? If the three of us manage to activate a beacon, it should go off in no time. 'So we're clearing the hall after all then. 'All three of them nodded, just as Balstar took off the rope, it appeared as if Augur held it all wrapped around himself like a belt. Each of them went around and had come out of sight of one another. It went as smoothly as imagined when one arrived at a tower, came to climb the stairs and pull the lever at the top. Rinse and repeat and there wasn't any doubt about what happened. As the room became scarce, the light almost came to the point of making a day inside the room. There had been somewhat of twelve or thirteen beacons around there that appeared to have pulled every little creature that reigned there. 'We're done. 'Thankfully, they didn't decide to turn back on us at the lost moment. Who knows what would've happened after that. 'The wicked shades they threw revealed much. It was a matter of fact that they had to escape. 'Look, Tom, there, we should hurry up if we want to escape now. 'It was a gaping hole which bore through the stone, leading even further below. For a moment now, each of them stopped to question this decision. 'Do we really have to go down there? We're getting even farther from the exit that way. If we continue going on this path alone we may never return. 'Balstar, I know we're not sure of where we're heading or whenever or not we'll see the light of day, though there aren't other options out there left for us. We can't just start eating those bits and digging through rock with our own hands. 'Tom's voice had changed a little ever since they were there, having something of a drop long before they even came to this room. It was enough to make him sound like an adult, not to mention. 'Fine, I'll follow through, but I must warn you that if it comes to us dying some horrible death at the hands of, I'll make sure you're the last to survive, kid. 'There was both a serious and a wicked tone of amusement in Balstar's voice. He smiles and the bars around his cage appeared to have been shaken under pressure. 'What about you Augur? Think you're up to this or do you want to return?' 'Return to what boss? I know there's nowhere else and this place's giving me the creeps. Let's just go!' The man was frightened of these creations. Dread filled him as he thought whenever or not they served another purpose. For once, it was an uneven thing of a magnitude of proportions to even think of it that way. He was afraid of what the others might've thought of if he told them that he was afraid. It was the reason he went forth and listened at the hole. 'I've got. 'Augur stopped at the sound of those whispers. This was the point where they had been the loudest, having heard them without even laying with an ear on the floor or on the wall. 'Tom, are the voices supposed to be this loud?' 'Again with the voices you damn Buffon, let me. 'When he approached, he noticed just how well they spoke, almost pleasant but surprising, no ill but only good. 'I don't know about this. 'With a sudden sharp thing, both of them heard them get silenced by a shocking fist against the wall. It must've been something big if Augur felt the vibration by his hand which stood on the wall. 'I certainly don't think it's a good idea anymore. "What did you two hear? Tell me, I'd like to know now. 'Both men just looked at Tom and instead of saying anything, pulled him and pushed him in. He stumbled on the road, but after what was a ten-centimetre slope, the road ahead was steep and clean. A bridge to be more precise, barely visible around. The void below, the emptiness wasn't what had caused all the noise. Both of the older men noticed that this dangerous thing had them tread carefully, without having to notice or to try guessing how deep this gorge went. 'Can you feel the air coming from below? I think this is where we got our supply. 'It was pure and breathable, not to mention clean. As it came into their lungs, not only could they feel as if it came straight from the source but also that it was incorruptible by whatever laid down there. 'I've never felt air this clean, not even outside. What could it possibly be down there?' Augur was knelt and stapled on the ground, trying his best to peer into the dark. His attempts failed, not to mention that there was something quite bothering. 'There's a long distance to reach the ground down there if you're to fall Augur. If I were you, I'd stay away from the gaps as I can. "I'm only looking, boss, there's nothing that could happen to me now. You needn't worry about a thing. 'This confidence didn't keep count with the fact that he was certainly clumsy as he were. Fallen pots, always stumbling upon things. Even as they continued, both Tom and Balstar shrieked as they looked in horror at their companion. It was a sudden slip that he himself knew he wouldn't be a victim off. Both of them rushed immediately and grabbed the end of the rope which was still wrapped around him. 'Augur, hold on you damned Buffon. "I'm falling, don't let go of me, don't let go. 'Caught in the most awkward position, he was about to wailing and flailing his arms as if he had nothing else to do. Feeling the current swarm around him made him feel as if he was drowning in mid-air. 'Pull now, before the current takes him. 'It felt as if he was pushed back and forth by some mix between the current of wind and the salient power it produced. 'Balstar, now!' Again, with both of their might combined, he was pulled and shoved to the side. 'What were you thinking coming so close to the edge you fool?' He was hardly breathing, shaking and filled with a sense of dread which wasn't even supposedly his. 'I was mere testing to see whenever or not you could've saved me if something were to happen, nothing more. 'Augur left a peculiar laugh which bore through both of them as nothing else did. Both Tom and the caged man were quite mad him and this strange joke of his, wondering whenever or not it would've been better to have him fall off. 'Let's go on then, I've got a feeling that there's more to this to go on that we've thought off. 'It was indeed a long bridge, sturdy and made of immaterial clean stone, but it was something they were able to use without having any other problem. Air came freely, but there wasn't anything that grew for them to eat. After minutes of walking, it merely dawned on them. 'Are we goo on supplies?' 'We should have enough to last us days at most. Same goes for water unless something happens there. Hopefully, we won't get thrown on a most desperate path on our way. 'It was a fact that they both had eyes Balstar for that moment on and ever since they came there. Nothing personal, but he was clumsy and a type of timid man who wasn't going to handle himself without the help of his long-life companion. In case someone was to be eaten, it would've been him. 'So, how did the two of you meet then? 'I don't think I've ever asked that of you. "Because it's a long story boy, and I doubt you'd be interested in hearing about every single detail whatsoever. "I'm all ears here, as long as Augur isn't going to have himself thrown off the bridge. 'At least he paid attention to the boy in that. 'Why it only happened once, that's all, I'm certain. 'He almost faked once to see their reaction. Neither of which were amused by this uncalled for the thing. 'I believe I knew him ever since we were children. Born and bred in one of the villages, the richer ones if you will. It was the time when everything appeared to have worked if I remember correctly. "By everything you mean?" 'Big, walking machines that had every purpose done for us. Heating food, raising animals inside of them, cutting trees, smashing rocks, digging tunnels. We were offered protection from weather and given drinkable water. Everything from our needs to our protection, then for our entertainment. It was an age of good and well pleased of the well being. Paved floors, you wouldn't even tell that there laid a forest if you were to be told by some outsider that came to visit. "So what happened then?" 'Balstar shook his head. For a moment, Tom thought he saw his sad eyes peering through the bars. It must've been something which shook both of them if they were so reluctant to speak of it. 'Then the earth took it all from us. 'Continued Augur. He recalled what happened just as well. 'It was something which they called a curse, that the earth started swallowing everything as far as it could, machine, man, stone, everything it stood upon. Our paradise was no more, those of which survived appeared to have become worse with time because of it. "It?" 'There seemed to be something even more fascinating to the story. At least, the way they made it seem. 'A gas to be more precise, it was released the moment the earth started swallowing everything. Even worse, the earth erupted in flames the moments it came into contact with the machines. "And this happened everywhere, right?" 'Making the entire piece of the earth uninhabitable. Tom, do you want to hear the strangest part of all?' 'He nodded as he approached the man. 'This thing had apparently happened for millennia at least, destroying countless generation for no reason whatsoever. And still, we don't know why it happens or why it continues to do so. 'It was a subject which was immediately dropped. Just thinking about it gave Tom the worst ideas about this place alone and perhaps the souls it swallowed. 'Could this be one of the places from where that gas got released?' 'I doubt it is, or else we would've been dead by now. Suffocation isn't as pleasant as it is deemed to be. 'That and the fact of the matter was that they both enjoyed the clean air rather more than having any of it become a deadly thing that stiffened their lungs. 'Here it comes, it shouldn't be rather any more surprising that there's another door. "Right, someone did build this, bridge, devices and this. 'Tom wanted to know as well that laid on the other side, as well as it came to forsaking their companionship over it. Either it was some way out or another thing that would've made them all get lost in the depths. There just wasn't any way to know. 'Open it Balstar, don't make us wait. 'With a sudden hold of breath, he opened it to reveal a set of eight interconnected bridges. All of which were fairly connected to a forked thing leading to different steep ways. If the previous chamber had been tight, this was big enough to host at least a hundred of them. "What do we do now?" 'We cannot check each of them in time. 'Augur thought about it as well as the others, though it was Tom who pointed at the ground. Writings on each road, a different language to say the least. Though he knew of it well. 'I've seen them before, help me throw off the dust off it. 'It was unclean, even by their standards. Nor was the air any cleaner around there. It was a manner of quick pushing it away to see that the ones who'd written what laid there had made a great job into illustrating their images for those who might've not known the language. 'If I'm right about this, and certainly it may be so since I've been into a temple or two. This road on the right leads to the entrance of a temple. So does the one farthest to the left. "Can we use either of the temples to get out? Are there ways for us to go through them and take the first exit that comes to mind?" A slight reluctance came to Tom. 'Too dangerous I'd think to say. Last time I've come upon it I've almost lost my life trying to get through. "What about the others then? I think I like the other signs and they can't be all that bad if we take our chances. 'Augur was at least keen enough to point and what seemed to be a spring of water toward which one of the bridges took. From this point of view, it could've meant anything. 'What if we were to drown if we'd stumble upon it? Could it be a trap between everything now, Tom?" "I don't know, I wish I could tell you but I've never seen anything else than the temples. And even when I stumbled upon them, I don't believe I could tell you if there was anything right there. 'Perhaps what frightened the boy more was the small sign of one of the beasts, standing there, gazing. Two looming holes had been filled for its eyes, letting a gasp of menacing air rush through. Now that it wasn't covered anymore, he knew far too well what it was to deny it. 'What's that kid? You've been staring at it for the last minute or two. "That's, it's something I've stumbled upon. I've almost lost my life to it if you'd dare believe. They were mainly used as guardians for the temples to deal with the trespassers. A mixture that could be undeniable of some creature and human, though tall enough to mount all of us and still have a few inches left towards the ceiling. What's worse about them is the fact that they don't seem to age or rot from it. Some, at least. 'This alone was enough to have that bridge marked. 'There, this should remind us just in case we forget. 'Augur had broken the tension between them by placing a small pebble on the road. 'This way we'll know which one to take and what no. "You should take your pebble back and place it once we check one of the bridges and where they lead. Until then, we've no choice but to send one of us at the time to stick around and check whenever or not it was safe. 'A codeword, in the dark for Tom doing the job for them. He grimaced and threw a hand on his back. 'Atta boy, you'll do fine, just make sure you choose carefully now. We wouldn't like to lose a member of our family. 'Tom nodded and came to it, without having to do much of any thinking, he went to the bridge which leads towards the temple. It was the best bet so far. As long as he was careful, he went off into the gloom and was soon out of their sight. 'What do you mean they need a place to stay?" Yelled a man from the Inn. As he was staring outside, he appeared to have been absorbed by just looking outside and how many of the men, women, children and even their pets waited for a chamber to get in. 'You can't expect me to house every single one of them now, do you? There's enough here as it is. "Oh you silly goon, just take a few, I'm sure there'd be plenty of room as well in the attic as in the basement. We could even host them in the . . . "No, that's enough woman, what would they think or say of us?" The place already looked like a mess because of the patrons that came. Even having a glance outside would've revealed the fact that it was certainly a bad thing to be had. So many of them were looking dirty for having lived and slept inside their own repurposed ships. It was no wonder why most of them were too dirty, to the point of having been denied entry in so many places. 'You said that if someone needs and some pays for his room, there's always a place for that as soon. "As soon as there's a place for them to say in, woman, that's the entire point. We've got nothing, no other room that's free for taking. Everything's taken. "The sounds of dismissal came as prepared. Though outside, something was at the point of having brought much distress in anything else but for it. A damn sound, a wail of much proportions that came both as a shock and something which bore through each of them. It was barely now that the lords in the king's chamber noticed anything that was supposed to happen. 'Any other plans I suppose? Couldn't you be thinking of something of a blow against me at this time of day? Not after we had that conversation, it wouldn't do. Which one of you is responsible for this?' "I swear, your majesty, forgive me for speaking for us as if we're a group, but we've got nothing to do with it. 'The capital shook, and for a moment the king realised what it was. History appeared as if it was repeating itself. 'Guard, like you did before, get ready to. 'Before the answer was given, that wriggling thing had grown as much as it could upon devouring itself to the point where pain would satisfy it no longer. It was the engine that was next to be had. Each bite brought a spark and a flame. There'd be no time for him to come, when the final outburst came, measuring itself throughout the entire capital at once. No one wondered at that at the moment when it came, but after the final bite, it bore a spark. The room burst into flames, imploding in itself, to the dark point where a part of the capital fell through the sky. Without being able to float, a good chunk of it produced the fireball in the middle which vaporised the nearest houses. It wouldn't have helped either way because of what had happened. The king was aware of it as well. 'This is blasphemy, my capital is ruined. 'Each one of the men and women looked at the cube the king was holding and how much he despaired. Some opened the door to see what happened outside, with the help of one of the guards as it came, to take a look at the side. It was a hash rupture of stone which abruptly tore in the street in pieces. Commoners were on the streets wailing at the losses. Much more suddenly were propelled to come and see for themselves what happened. 'How could this have happened?' They wondered, without having a care whatsoever of the fact or the manner. A sudden thump came at last, after a long wait, when the piece of the capital reached solid ground and broke itself even more. 'Raise up the thing, we must fly as further away as we can. We're in no way prepared to fight that beast in this condition whatsoever. "What are you implying your majesty? How far can we even go?" "It doesn't matter as long as we are far from this place. I cannot even look at it anymore. 'With a sudden slam, he threw the sky cube in a pile and locked it using the tip of his finger as a key. There was certainly no way to deal with this in front of them. 'Go, away, now, before anything else happens. This meeting is dismissed. 'For a second they were just as confused and afraid as he was of the manner in which this happened. Perhaps even one or two of them had nowhere else to go, having their mansions and great holds on that side of the city. 'I thought I told you to go away, don't let me say that a third time unless you want to be thrown into that hole as well. 'They flew out of the door after being opened like a bunch of bees making for their hive. The only problem was the fact that smoke and flame had taken hold and they had nowhere else to run. 'Damn thing, how could it have happened and why?' It occurred to him that whoever this atrocity might've already been dead, most likely if not so. . "Guards, two of you, go inside the other room where the other engine is placed. I want you to stand and defend it all times. Wait, wait, wait, no, five of you at least, stand there and defend it. No one needs to see you, no one needs to know. No one enters that room either, now leave. 'This was certainly a surprise that they didn't use the door, instead, they vanished into the shadows. It bothered him quite so. 'They've taken us a piece and now they'll take the other. I'm telling you, they're all in it for us. Making our lives worse, taking the ground from under our feet. We can't stand for this any longer and wait for something else to happen. 'Everyone appeared to have been staring at the first dol who stood on a box like a prophet. Though at least some thought it so. Until three more joined him, who had brought at least a barrel and a box to stand upon. Each one of them from apparently a different background, but certainly shared the same view as one another. 'First, they took our islands, now they took a piece of the promised land. Can it be that this is the end? Look at how the weather changes, there's no sun, but the coming of a storm! Another imbalance at the worst of times. Worst of all was the fact that the rain water had been black and dirty, carrying its cold disease. This type of rain hadn't happened for the longest time, only to come now during the damn shattering of the capital. 'I used to be like you until they came. Promised, they promised all of us salvation and protection from anything that would threaten our only hope for a better life. And what were we given instead? They used our only way to escape to build themselves more weapons to defend themselves. Is this justice?' The man asked and the crowd answered in a choir. 'No. 'Another man who sat on the barrel who had a grumpy voice, loudest one so far. 'I used to have something, lads, a family, a home, a roof atop my head which wasn't perfect but everything I've had. Should I even tell you what happened to it?' There were nods going throughout the crowd and none could deny the sadness seen in his eyes. 'I've lost everything because of this damn thing. Promises after promises from a king which was supposed to give us protection. He was supposed to care for us, but look at it now, how the capital lay in ruin. "There are no homes. 'Started yet another. They were almost an antagonising thing which stood as a unity. A group which rivalled the crowd. He began without care for an interruption or a thought. 'We were lucky to survive when we left our homes, but what happens now? There are not enough places for both of us and those who were brought from the islands. I dare say we should get priority over them because we were born and raised there. 'Finally, it had come, like an unusual thing, a declaration of war between the residents and travellers. Some were already taking steps in retreating before anything could happen. Knowing that as soon as it came to blow, there'd be nothing to say but too much pain to be given than words. 'My lord. 'Said a voice, followed by a bow. They were already making way to be sheltered inside. Despite having their fortune lost, it was merely two of them who appeared to have been thrown away from their homes. 'Well, you'll stay as a guest for as long as you desire. Though don't break anything yet. 'A mocking tone from man to man, even they had to look upon the entire situation with a grain of salt. Nothing was left now that the fight soon ensued between everyone stranded there. Broken windows fell as soon as a rock flew from one of the rather skilful throws from the crowd. No one dared to look and search for who it was, but the king saw it all from the distance. 'This isn't happening now, why must I always deal with the most useless and insignificant?' A sudden cinder in his voice made him grow in the head. 'I need to rest not to deal with their problems now, but how?' Not even him, in all his power, knew what to do with the excess of people without the care of homes. 'Lock the door and be prepared for anyone that comes near it. They'll certainly think of a riot if we wait any longer on that. 'Perhaps it was for the best to leave them to duke it out, for as long as he was concerned it was for the better. That way, some would be put in their places, leaving the strongest and the mightiest to roam free. Jails are quite free of space. 'That's it, guards, I need you to go ahead and stop the riot, I've got a perfect idea. 'Two of them would do, no one dared mess with them when they came in pairs. It was still as hard to look upon them and their tainted chiselled armour as it had ever been. Given by the faces which were bored through their shoulders and knees, there wasn't any doubt that most men had thought them as monsters with their heads displaced. Nonetheless, it was getting worse. The sound had reached the farthest depths in the sky and received the attention of the wriggling beasts. For the first time in the longest period, there had been something of an unspoken pact. Beast upon beast, slither on slither, they roamed the skies together, working in pairs. It had become easier that way to hunt for anyone who dared not cower under them. Despite everything which was said, this seemed to work in a way which they were absolved of a fate worse than death. 'Locked, just like the other temple door. 'Said Tom. He appeared to have checked most of the bridges, only to find nothing else but one way to get through. At least the spring bridge had it so that there was fresh water. Though something disturbing had come to pass. It had been a shaking of the entire foundation of the earth. Felt by the likes of them, it was certain that something had happened above, of which they dared not speak a word about. 'Do we wait and see what happens next?' 'No, Tom, this is the only apparent way, we need to go one way or another. "Balstar, if it is what I think it is, we'd be in a graver danger than everything we've encountered together. You don't know what they are. 'A sudden shake came again, like a wave which rippled across the earth and wanted to have itself known. 'That again, what could it possibly be?' 'I don't care much for that, but hold onto something. With it on the way, there'd no doubt of the peril to fall into that veil. 'Quaint, to say the least, it still pulled in with a cold breeze, nothing of the sort would do. Each one of them started crawling on the bridge. Regardless of what they thought, something of immense magnitude was happening outside. 'We're going through whenever this will help us or not. It's a certainty that we need to at least go ahead and try. 'Said Balstar, looking just as nervous as he were minutes ago. For this bridge alone was lead the farthest so far, at least with a certainty which he wasn't sure. 'Well, what are waiting for?' Augur looked at the openness and how inviting the gaping hole appeared to be like. There was no need for an investigation for the three of them to figure out who did it. It was enough to measure the size and let their own imagination figure it out for them. 'Are they really this strong?' Even the whispers that came from below appeared to have their wails silently obscure. Something important was there, certainly, it had to be. 'We'll know when we'll come to it, right? First of all, we need to get rid of this place and never return inside the ground ever again. 'A mutual agreement came as they shook their heads. It was a giant place, meant for the construction of bodies, or at least this seemed to be so. 'Look at that. 'The moment when they stepped in, at least from the sound of chains and a mechanism, torches lit on every side. 'So much for snicking in. 'Said, Augur, while inspecting the same thing the two others appeared to have been set upon. It was the spine and skull without arms or even the legs, a thing which was used inside a cast which hadn't it's front laying there. Even by normal eye, this was obviously not bone, but rather iron. The purpose? Certainly unknown to say the least. The place appeared to have been twice or triple the size of anything they've been through. 'Before you ask Augur, I doubt they were made to have used that bridge alone. It was fairly too small, even for us to roam through it alone, most likely you know where they ended if they indeed tried escaping. "How did you know what I was going to ask boss?" 'It was a mere hunch. 'With was needed there, questioning everything which might've had them at their worst. 'Let's go before we see one here. Tom, you said there might be a way out, right?' 'I think there's one. At least, I hope there's a way for us to go, without a map of runes on walls, I couldn't tell you if I wanted to. 'The sound of uncertainty bore through. Even with an ear on the walls, he heard no whispers, but he swore. 'Shhh, don't make noise for a second now. 'Both of them men occupied themselves in the same way, having to follow Tom in whatever his plan was. 'Are those steps lad? Inside, at this time?"The reluctant nod didn't do much to relieve them of their mood. Now that the flames came to life, it was even obvious that they were not alone. Tom feared even more as he grabbed his chest as squeezed. It was still there, still in its place. What would I do without you now?He wondered, certainly he couldn't let go, nor tell them of what was to be done. 'Let's go then, the faster we move, the better the chances. "We could spread. "No, you ant, that would be the worst idea you could possibly have. Do you really want whatever is out there to pick us one by one?I can be sure that each one of us has a distinct shout of terror that neither would like to hear. 'Even thinking about giant things, armless and footless, crawling like worms for their hunger. At least the hole was big enough. 'There, we can start there. 'Without even waiting for them to come up with their surprised faces, Tom had already begun walking to the side. There were stairs and ladders in front of them, but this was certainly not the place. 'I will come, I'm sure I'll come to an exit if I follow my guts. You can follow me or stay behind. "Wait a minute, Tom, we should rethink our whole deal. Even the torches are dim, in a few hours they'd be no more. "I cannot wait, neither of us can stand, you heard the footsteps. You've never dealt with them in the same way I did, or else you would've feared just as much.

'By the first corner, it was an open entry onto one of the laboratories. It was dark until the moment when they approached. From left to right there were at least four tables with blankets over them. Rather pieces of cloth covering large forms, enough to make each of them think of the fact that there were a few men standing into small cocoons, hiding from what was out there. 'Shall we?"No, unless your guts are strong. I doubt there'd be of much help either way. 'Augur bit his tongue and came close nonetheless. Before anyone could stop him, he lifted the piece of cloth and pulled something from it. He had immediately dropped it on the floor and saw it still wriggle and shake after the contact with his flesh. 'You damn cretin, what were you thinking?Just look at that on the table. I know it must be only a small part of it, but this is unnatural. There's no other way to put it, but I think it's living. "Balstar, I've been trying to warn you ever since we got here. I've dealt with them, I know what they can do, and it's not going to be easy avoiding them. 'Both men almost bore their damn souls out at the sight of it. Could the boy have been right about this place all along?"Very well Tom, you lead the way. You tell us what's right to touch and what isn't. As long as we're here, you're the expert. 'Balstar's words almost shocked the boy, if it weren't for the fact that there wasn't any visible change in his expression, at least ever since they stepped in. He listened carefully to the wall. 'It isn't the good way, I can still hear it coming from down the corridor. We'll go the opposite way. 'As they followed, it was no wonder that both had questioned his knowledge on the matter. 'Have you ever fought them?Or do you know if they can be hurt?"The boy nodded at the implications. 'Why were you even in a place like this before you even met us?"I was exploring, that time. I wasn't alone, though I'd rather not talk about it while there's one of those coming after us. 'Balstar didn't know exactly how to react. Passing by the skeleton in the frame made him think of the worst scenario. The damned fiend, could it be fast?Could it be strong?"We need to get out as fast as possible now. 'Augur was damnably silent for himself. It was an awful experience that he had touched that piece of meat that just reanimated itself on the floor. Rather than being comforted, he was tricked into this loop, this tiny maze of many closed chambers. Looking at Tom again. 'There's another coming through. Let me think, what. 'What could we possibly go from here?One's coming from here, one from there. There's one upstairs, and at least. The door was closed without a doubt. Soon, neither of them would've had the chance to fight back if it came to being chased. For this moment, Tom remembered, finally being disturbed by Augur's silence. 'I'm sorry Augur, but we have no other way to go, make for the laboratory and hide in there. Let's go, let's go, before they get the chance to turn around and see that we are here. 'All three of them came to a leaping strike, a running feat and made it in time to wrap themselves around the wall. Neither of them even dared approach the table. But that thing still laid there.

Desperately, Tom nodded towards it in hopes that either of the men would understand what had to be done. The laboratory still laid in direct sight of the door and there'd be no chance one would miss such a disturbance. Balstar had already wrapped his hand around and started for it. With care, enough that he wouldn't touch any of the tables, he grabbed that small piece of meat and held it tight. It could make no shriek but with a strong enough snap, as Balstar used both of his hands, it appeared that something broke in it. Thrown out of the way, it bore no danger, having the man return back to his spot. 'Don't make a sound and wait. 'The only one that had a clear sight towards the corridor was Tom, at least as much as one could glance without being seen. Come on already, just come. Balstar could see the opposite, being stapled on the other side of the wall. For him at least, the sight of it remained only at the top. He'd only see ahead and even that came momentarily. There it was though, a walking cadaverous thing, wrapped and punctured by rots which held it from falling apart. At least, this one was even bigger, if that was possible to think. Without a doubt, it wouldn't fit inside, having to resort to breaking the damn wall, which they had proved themselves to be more than capable of doing. Each step felt as if its heaviness could usurp the ground and have them descent even deeper throughout the depths of the earth. Without question now they marched towards one another. 'I need to take another look. 'Said Tom in a supreme tone of a whisper. If it wasn't for the fact that the caged man could read lips, there wouldn't have been a way for him to decipher what was truly said between them. As the light started to dim, Tom knelt and wrapped himself around. It was indeed, a meeting of some kind. Three of them, to be more precise, from each direction, stood there and made the most damned sounds. Their height blocked any way they could've seen them, at least when it came from the opposite direction. And it was still possible that they might've been partially blind. 'We need to go. "Are you mad child?Do you really wish us to? 'Balstar took a look around and shivered in a matter of seconds. Something was horribly wrong about them, and he couldn't point out what. "They take time to come around, as long as we're fast, we'll pass them. ' 'And what if they turn, Tom?What if they turn?We cannot stand against that, neither of us can. A bunch of easy targets, a small piece of meat?That's nothing for the three, even the two of us, but this is on an entirely different level altogether. "You said I'm the one making decisions here, haven't you?So either you're both following me now, or else I'll find a way out alone. 'Before furthering the discussion, he had already slithered around the wall. Followed by Augur, of all people, who was still rather in a manner of shock. Both moved a nimble as they could, forcing Augur to feel the creeps and continue following through. It wouldn't be as far as they thought until they turned around and immediately come out of sight. 'We're safe, Tom, you were right about it. "Not yet, Balstar, we still don't know how many of them are still looming around. It depends how many of them were left here. "At least we can suppose on that boy, that some might've fallen into that hole and over the bridge. There has to be something that we could hope doing Tom, I refuse to think we'll die in this place. 'Though he appeared to have been more concerned by Augur rather than anyone else in the room. Augur wasn't like himself ever since he touched that meat barnacle which turned out as being alive. 'We'll take here and listen. 'It was clear, at least for as long it came. Another open door not as far on a forked way, which appeared to have been formed on a steep path, going right, then suddenly forth, repeating that form. As long as they followed and didn't stop at all. 'Here, check for anything that might be helpful, but don't touch that. 'In the middle of the room laid what appeared to be a half-formed creature. Its torso remained with only a head was attached, though it was obvious from what laid on the table that those strange limbs which didn't belong to it were supposed to be connected. Perhaps their wriggles of the fact that it appeared to have been still breathing induced paranoia in the men. Rather than that, Tom was afraid of the fact that it still appeared to have been a fresh specimen, which could also be said about what lay on each table on his sides. 'I've found this, I think it may be a sharp spear unless it was intended for something else. "Augur, try it on it, but make sure you don't push enough that it would scream. 'As bad as an idea as that was, he listened and with no less strength which would harm a child, he went on ahead and came through the body with a clean strike. There wasn't enough blood to go through once he had done it. 'What have you done now?"You told me to test it on the creature, what was I supposed to do?"How about not skewer it into pieces?'Despite what was done, it remained just as serene as calm, almost bored but amused by the entire situation. It wasn't often that it had any visitors. For a thing such as itself, it certainly came as a surprise. 'You might've wanted to aim for the head. 'Spoken by the same tongue and accent as a man would. Scared of it, Augur pulled the spear and threw some of the ichor that came out across the wall. 'You, you spoke. 'Said Tom, looking as surprised as everyone else inside the room. This manner of thing wasn't going to bore right with him, at least in no possible way. 'How, what, since when?'It seemed that he was given no attention, not to mention of his question. For the first time in a while, it seemed that it tried stretching its neck, jerking it around and gaping at that. 'Why have you come here?'It struggled with words, which became apparent only now that it had its chance to try something more difficult. To be more precise, it didn't appear as if it used anything else but its teeth to speak. Holes in the molars pushed air and imitated the sound that humans made. What was so fascinating remained the fact that it understood and interacted with them. 'Tell us what you are first before we reveal ourselves to you. "I am. Guardian. That is, a guardian of the temple you've decided to desecrate. "We haven't. 'That thing quickly interrupted him, displaying a malevolent use of the air canals in his mouth. 'You have broken the sacred tablet, I can feel it still reek inside of you. 'That bore through, once it decided to acknowledge Tom's presence at once. It still waited for something, which Augur faintly said. 'We've come here to find an escape. 'It prompted a laugh, it those things was capable of doing it. 'Do you think there is one?Look at it. 'He pointed and what might've been a human, standing against the wall. The meat wasn't there anymore, and it almost went unnoticed by all three of them when they had entered the room because of the dust. It was there, nonetheless. 'And he arrived only but months ago. "When did you learn how to speak then?"There wasn't any need for him to repeat himself, as he made a sign for it. It was obvious, though as impossible as it sounded. 'Only a few month, you say, and you've learned our language. 'Completely, worm, creature, small meat suit. Now you'll end up like the rest of them as soon as another great one comes. "Why haven't you yelled or shouted for them?You could've made any noise by now!"Tom came between the others and made himself known. It wasn't certain whenever or not another grunt would roam the halls but he was certain of this alone. 'You saw the lights as well yet you didn't yell or had them come and grab you from this prison of yours. I think you're stuck here, just like the rest of us. Despite this ability to speak, you're not like them, are you?'It waited for him to continue, appeared to have borne enough attention that would've bore a lesser being into the ground. 'From what I've noticed they're only dumb creatures, rotten, dead. Unlike you, the only creature I've encountered so far with the ability to speak. You're just as afraid of asking for their help, aren't you? Knowing that you could be mistaken for a human in disguise and crush the only piece of your body that remain. "Are you done now? Or was something that you needed?" Help us get through, and perhaps we'll make you a deal which you cannot refuse. "This was tempting, rather than anything else in this. 'Do you hear that? It's coming again, quickly, to the wall. 'The sounds of steps were frighteningly coming.

Hopefully, it was true what Tom said about it not talking. For a moment then, it closed its eyes and stood there frozen like a piece of meat in the cold. Neither of them was seen by the tall patrolling figure. Though it had been close to a painful thing, thinking that they stood a chance, even with the better tools against something so big. 'Is he gone?' 'It's safe, at least for now. Speaking of which, can we strike a deal then? The way it seems to be, we're stuck here like this fellow as you are by the way. Perhaps we may end your existence if you help us escape. "Do you truly think that was the reason I came this far? Because I had no way to stop this from going on?" "No. 'Said Tom quite thoroughly. 'But I can give you the most humane end, without having to feel pain, or have to be crushed into endless pieces spread across the floor and tables. They do seem rather violent for some guardians. 'As well as the thought sounded, this wasn't what he was after. 'I want a body as well, so I may break free. 'It was easy enough, but the thought of building one by themselves was damned. 'Wait, Tom, don't rush into it, come closer for a moment. 'The two of them now stood on the same side, but not before a flicker of a glance on the hallway. One had to be sure there wasn't another guardian walking where he shouldn't have been. 'Tom, listen, I don't like where this is going. It could be lying from what we know, not to mention that it could backstab us the first chance it gets. "Do we know that we have another chance out there? You've seen their size, not to mention that I doubt there are only three of them in this entire temple. This way, we may stand a chance with it on our side. "Is there truly an argument to be had? You need me free. 'Said the Guardian, now peering at Augur, who seemed to have been the only one standing there without speaking a word. It made a slickest of sounds to pull him over in order to speak. If they wanted to have their own private conversation, this was their time as well. 'Listen, you know what it is I need. There's no way you could escape alive without my help, not to mention that you owe me you, ungrateful creature. "I do? But I've done. 'The hole in his chest was still oozing from the moment when he was pierced by the spear. Obviously, it didn't care whenever or not it was an act which was meant to harm him or not. He wanted out as well as them. 'What do you need them? From where?' There came the words he needed to hear, as good at half understanding as the rest of them. 'Legs, arms, pieces of the bottom torso for replacement and something for the hole in my chest. "Would that be all, if the boss decides to help you that is. "No, you'll need to attach them through the liquor or with the help of small metal cylindrical rods. But be fast about it, I doubt there'd be something to wait for once they get a sniff of your dirty scent. 'Augur at least seemed to have paid attention, but looked around. There had been set, on both his left and right a pair of limbs that weren't like those arms at all. In form, they were longer and had some sort of sacks attached at their bottom. At least it appeared that they looked heavier than they could've possibly had. 'What about them?' Augur pointed and expected at least to be yelled at. 'Would those do for your arms? They seem rather functional to me, and just as long and you'd need them to be. 'A dark smirk never left its face, though something must've been wrong about those things. 'They're not functional, you see? At least, they haven't been used before, never attached, never been tested. "What if we don't find something better?" Then you'll die here and either take me with you or do it alone at your own pace. "What if?" Augur, what are you doing there? Leave it alone and come here. We're about to decide whenever or not this will do. As I was saying. Tom, I do think we stand a better chance with that thing on our side, but it's way too dangerous. Trusting that thing though? I haven't known them for long and I'm already afraid of what they'll do to me the moment they catch us. "But it, he can talk, he must be intelligent, at least to know the situation we're in. What's our alternative then? Just look around, it's filled with them. The other ways are all closed and this, well, this may be our chance. And it's almost as easy as taking the right pieces and attaching them to its body. Nothing easier than that. "This came as rather shocking, how confident had he become. He kept his composure even now. 'It's decided then, but how?' "I know how. 'They both, no, the three of them now paid attention to Augur. It wasn't often that he shined, in such dark of a place but he did so. 'What if we lure one of him here, murder him and rip out his limbs? That way we'll know that what we have will be something fresh, which may do. 'It sounded mad, at least in the most disgraceful way possible. 'What if we fail then and he kills us all? You realise that this is the maddest plan we have right now? Arming that thing right there might be the gravest mistake we've ever done. "We need to try something, boss. I don't want to end up like that one standing over there. I've got too much to think about just to end up like that. "No one will end up like that man now Augur, what we're saying is that we just need to weight our other options. 'If there were any other, but not even Balstar could think of something fast enough that would do. Tom came closer to the creature and told him still. 'How do we connect these to you? If it is to work, we'll need you to be fully armed. But there are no arms anywhere. 'For once it nodded at the thought of that. 'Check over there. "Down here?" Despite having no arms, it did well to point towards a specific point of the floor. If anyone else might've looked at Tom, they would've thought him a silly young man for kneeling and wiping the ancient dust filled floor. 'Balstar, Augur, help me with this. 'A removable piece of the floor came off, revealing a lot of rods laying under. There might've been hundreds in this corner alone, though they didn't need as many. 'Take two for now and don't disturb the others. 'A nimble pair of hands, Balstar was the best to handle this task, with his wrapping around, he pulled what he could. Without a doubt, this was something to look upon without even having to wonder why they were so light on touch. Not only was there no heaviness, but something appeared to have been pulsating towards the tip of his fingers, even though there was a layer of cloth around his hands. 'What are these exactly?" Don't bother, just make sure you take another before placing the floor back in its place. 'It followed as it did, with Augur taking the piece from Balstar. In return they now had two, leaving Tom to be the only who hid them back. The hard part was only to come. 'Be fast, for the pain is great. I've no doubt that the moment will come when he'll be alerted. "Wait, what happens if more than one comes?" Asked Tom, still sceptical about this entire problem of theirs. 'We'll have to find out then, won't we?' Again with that dark grin, won't this oversized monkey just shut its mouth and leave us to work?" Here Tom, use the cloth and hold the rod, I don't think you'll be able to lift the limb on your own. 'To say it was heavy remained an understatement. Quite harsh and meaty, but heavy. Grabbing it from the side, he merely placed it in position. 'As soon as we attach it, we'll each go towards a corner and prepare for the worse. Augur, you've got the spear. Tom, stay out of it, I know I said we'll let you handle. "I know Balstar after we'll make it through, I know. 'Both of which nodded and prepared. At least, it was as easy to handle in thought, though once the procedure started, there wasn't any doubt about the entire ordeal. The pain came and ran through, as Tom started pushing the rod, which entered as if there wasn't anything laying in front of it. There came a moment when contact first came, as the creature did whatever it could not to alert. 'Stop, stop, stop, that's too deep. Pull it. 'Tom had reached a point where it was hard to see whenever or not he had exaggerated the entire thing. 'Is that right?' 'Yes, I think. 'For a moment, both of the men looked at the creature and were surprised at the nimbleness with which it moved the dark limb. From one end at least, a mouth opened, which revealed a fully functional hand. It had small formations of skin growing out of each place where a finger might've been, but that wasn't the point. For as much as he was concerned, this would reach the room and do. 'Now I'll be the one who'll put it through. Make do and hold the other arm and get through your place. Not you boy. 'The way he looked at Tom almost gave him a shake of thought. Whenever he'd help, if it came to it, never made it less of hysterical nor even less of satisfying. 'You said there'd be the pain, why wasn't. "Once the rods touch, there'd be. Without any other way, he'll hear us from whatever corner he might be. "And the others?" As I said before, though they might not come where they don't belong. Unless their minds might've rotted beyond repair, in the case of which death would come for us all. 'No matter how much time passed, he wouldn't dare look at those speaking teeth. 'I'll do my best to hold it still. 'The creature obeyed the thought and saw to it. As weak as Tom appeared to have been, he did his best to hold the second arm to its place. The way the other arm stretch was outstanding, even for him to oversee. Nonetheless, the shriek came as soon as he pushed the rod, leaving the most damning sound to have been. Steps were shaking the ground, as they all knew it'd come. Now there came a replace when Tom fell and cowered, going as far behind as he could, confused from hearing those damned cries. And at once, without noticing a head and a piece came into the room, with a hand which was prepared to grab and snap whatever it could find. The coiling appendices wrapped around the arm and held it straight. Now it came for Augur to make his move, with the right timing. He went on and sliced half of the face in the most horrid way he could. A pity, a shriek, pain ran through at it began to let out its shouting rage and pain. Something was going wrong as he wasn't able to fully decapitate and release it from its misery. From a stance of rage and pain, now it pulled away or tried doing so. 'End it now, I don't think I can hold it any longer. Don't let it get away!' At the sound of that warning, this last act of desperation had both Tom and Balstar frozen at the sight of it. No weapons to use, or rather, none that would harm it. And there still was the problem with what lay behind that melting face, the shape of the skull and rotting thing that might've been best explain as its brain. 'I'll end it now!' Shouted Augur and as he plunged with the spear, he finally dealt a blow that cut a piece of the brain. So much more trouble it causes, that both of the appendices were suddenly ripped apart from the one standing there. It was a thing that made the creature shake its every limb uncontrollably as if he had struck a nerve of some kind. 'It's not dead yet, you need to strike again before it gets any of its control back. 'The warning came fast but there wasn't any safe way to approach it, other than to wait. 'Stand back, Tom, boss. I can deal with this. 'With a sudden caress, he watched it stumble, trying to get back on its feet. Without a doubt, there were only instincts now, as the boiling substance dripped from its rotten core. Coming closer, seeing how it tried sitting against the frame of the door to regain some balance, Augur managed to land another strike. As clean as it would be, he managed to cut a good chunk of its brain, seeing it finally succumb to nothing. It fell now on the floor, leaving its head laying down the floor. One final strike and It'll be over. Thought Augur, before going on and beheading the damned creature, once and for all. 'Augur, you've done. You, you magnificent man, you've done. All on your own, you've killed the beast. "There'd be time for celebrating later if you'll please. 'Some of its rotten liquid still bled on the floor, to the point of almost dripping out. 'Pull the rods out. Both from me and from it. 'Tom made a nodding agreement that he'd be the one pulling them out of their friend. It would still come to be the ones they'd use. But as the other two were trying to reach around and see that his limbs were pulled out completely, he spoke to Tom alone. 'Only half-way through, we'll only need to push the limbs into my body. 'A procedure which was more than mad, as the two men worked on ripping the legs and the arms off that creature, leaving the torso laying there. Not to mention that the stench left by that rotten head was still going to bear some sort of disgust upon a glance. 'Now as for our deal?' 'You make me whole and I'll have you escape this damned place. "What about you? What are you planning on doing now that you're no longer bound?' Asked Tom, still focused on the being. He had noticed that the spine was still interconnected to a rod on the bottom of the floor which had to be fairly so removed. 'I will roam your world as far as I'll please. This isn't my end and I'm not to rot in this damnd temple, abandoned as a slave. Or end up worse than that. 'It still crept down there, moving pieces of its rotten brain on the ground. Something might've told them that a piece of it was still there, trying to move a mouth, a piece of it, but without having used a sound. 'Well, this I I presume. "As soon as you attach them to me, we'll be done. 'It shouted, as the end of the arms got attached. The pain was almost unbearable now that there wasn't any of the liquid used in his construction. For a moment, they almost appeared to think of him as a primal thing that would be driven by pain to murder all three of them rather than keep his part of the deal. 'Don't worry, there's no need to be afraid now. 'With a look upon its giant arm, he said, while taking the other arm himself and pushing it in. Ther rest wasn't as needed as he asked for an additional rod. 'One would do alone, make sure it's clean and new, this will be the last thing. 'It said, and as soon as it was inserted, and the two legs came onto him, he pulled himself away from the long rod which was lodged into his spine and walked past them, crushing whatever remained. 'Should we follow him now?' "Yes, we should hurry before he changed his mind. "Since when has a beast become a human to address him like that lad?" "Since we don't want him to turn around and throw a fit at us. 'It appeared that once the three of them were out of the room, he had already waited at the end of the corridor. A grin laid on his face, which made him look even more frightening than anything else they had ever seen. Perhaps it was still something of an unexplainable feeling, but neither of them had truly felt like trusting him ever since he was reformed. As much as neither of them truly believed that the creature would hold his end of the bargain, or even if he knew what that was, they followed. Just as fast as they could they ran, never being able to keep the pace with it. Realising that some would eventually come upon hearing that damnable array of shouts and shrieks, there'd be no wasting. 'Come, Tom, don't let go of our plan. You're the one leading now, remember?' "Right. "Do you trust that thing now?" "I don't know, it seems as if. 'A sudden thing interrupted them. Just as surprising as the thought and sight of it was, they watched as another guardian had met their fellow. Without realising on what side they were, from giant to giant, it came fast. A pummeling of the head, which turned as soon as he ripped its head apart and threw it on the side without realising. Still, it turned and left that grin, with its moving teeth, leaving no word but a sort of soothing inaudible sound. All three remained shocked as the power it had, not to mention that it appeared as if he was as sharp as a human. 'This is the reason why we don't have a choice but to trust him. Just keep that hold on your spear Augur, if anything happens, you only hope in this. "I understand. Don't worry, Tom, boss, if anything happens, I'll be just here, ready to protect you. 'Even though, he alone barely could swallow upon looking at that grin. It waited for what appeared to be a portcullis, which leads below. 'From this point, we'll have to go through a piece of the veil. It's incomplete, at least so it seems. There's no way we could walk through safely. "What exactly is it?"The builds though they had ended them, little vermin that live through aeons, never dying. 'The thought alone brought them back into the halls they went through. Somehow, these creatures, as small bits as they appeared looked rather different, even by the sight of light. Darker, sharper, more rabid. Despite his warning, each one of them hadn't realised the fact that he was carrying a ripped out arm. 'What's that for?' 'See. 'Merely inches from his body, at arms, reach he flailed the limb. For a moment, this appeared to be nothing but a sad joke, to frighten them perhaps, though it turned out, as he pulled nothing but a piece of the muscle that nothing of it remained. 'See for yourselves, marrow and bone. 'This was the point where they stopped, most likely, two of them to be more precise. It wasn't that much of a distance, though they appeared to have been peering into the portcullis nonetheless. 'We turn and try to go somewhere else. 'All three of them made way, seeing how it became just as fast as one could be. Trampling over the body in a display of gore and strength didn't do anything else rather than reinforce their hidden distrust. 'This ain't going too well now, did you see it, Tom? That arm disappeared as fast as it was pushed it, seconds, Tom, seconds and it wasn't there. "I saw it Augur, I know, there's just another way, it had to be out there. We don't have anywhere else to return to, remember?' Another damned shriek was known to follow, as they watched.

One guardian was about to go down the stairs when all of the sudden, he was grabbed and ripped apart. Pushed down the floor, his head was firmly ripped before the arms could do anything to harm the other. So far, as he was close to the hole, it went off, being thrown down there where there'd be no way for the creature to ignite. 'Must it always do it in such ways?' "Would you rather have him do that to us then Augur? Be glad that we're on his side at least. "But what will we do if they go ahead and manage to fight back? Damn your creature with your damn stare. 'He was already on the second pair and looking above, there he was, displaying as much emotion as he thought would make them comfortable. Why must he be that way? Is this what means to become more than a grumbling grunt? Tom had thought of asking, but then again, the thought of an answer wasn't that well. It appeared as if he was out of sight by now, on a usual king of the spree, a display of speed and might. 'Where?' Follow the trail lad, the corpses should be near. I've got the wrong impression now. "Why is that Bal?" There's no way around it but I can't help it but feel bad about them. Just look, the light is starting to die out and they're just as defenceless as we are. They're not as smart as he is and can't understand that something had gone wrong. "No, they're dead, Bal, unnatural. It's the better way, trust me, it's a better end than having their minds and bodies rot. "And this is better then? Just think about it for some time and tell me how it's better to be ripped apart. Look at them down there, even in this manner, with their heads crushed, something in them is still alive and trying to move. 'For a moment then, they were all taken by surprise when they found out that there was one standing right behind them. Despite everything, it showed no expression, making it seem vile in the dimness of a dying torch. They took a moment to get out of the haze and realised that there laid a familiar hole in there, one which was made by Augur. Not that he had made any possible move to let them now. 'But it is done, done, done I say. No others lay in here but the four of us. 'I should've been happier to hear those words than I am now. Why can't I feel it though? Tom wasn't the only one who looked at him as if he was to turn against them at any moment. 'As I promised now, the gate towards the upper side is in this direction. "The upper side? Hold on, you've not spoken of an upper side now. "I've not spoken of the lower bowels of the temple either, well, you wanted to get out, haven't you?" We need a break. 'Said Balstar, as he pulled out what he had filled when they arrived in the spring. At least that turned out as being something opportune. 'We still need to eat and perhaps sleep for the night. "What's with the delay then? Go ahead, I'll wait, you can trust me. 'This came to it again, but each of them had to take as much as they could now. Eating the more of the strange plants they had taken, perhaps a small loaf of bread since they were lucky. 'Do you not eat?' 'Oh, I have no need for that, you see since my bodily functions aren't entirely functional. 'Something was off as well, as they sat down to have their meal. There laid a small cut on his stomach, at least towards the point where he had implied there was a need for replacement organs. He's working way too fast for someone of his size. Thought Tom while he ate. Pay no attention to the creature, look away. Even inside the bowels of the temple, despite not being as decrepit as the promise of its inner depths, he thought that they were all to become ill if they stood around. 'Who would've thought that night would come so fast. Aren't they going to come up immediately once we start moving?' 'They might, but don't worry, I shall be tasked to wake each of you up once we're ready. "Do you know of time? Have you any notion then?" "I have, seconds, minutes, hours, so on and so forth. They thought them while I was there. "Your creators?" Inquired Balstar, readying whatever blankets they had to keep in the cold place. It was still as shallow of an environment as they thought it was. 'The people who came inside the temple. 'The mere thought vanished in the dark, though it was quite obvious. 'Nine hours, and wake us up, if you may. "Thank you. 'Said Augur as well. Thunder roamed from afar as well, day after day and night roamed the land with those beasts running every hold that had attempted to rise in the sky. Ships were now flying as low as they could, past the dangerous spots where their wriggling mawed tails might come and send shivering lightning through the clouds. 'Well, what now?' 'What do you mean by that?' 'Won't you do something about it then?' It may come to having our business all around just killed or rather refuse to stay once they saw that this place is occupied. 'Clever people, at least they thought they were, having covered a piece of the sky with their own self-made roofs. As a matter of fact, a piece of the capital had them just placed in order to prevent the cold. City walls at least served right, as well as they had taken whatever place they could. Neither the tavern owners nor the common marketers were pleased about this change. There wasn't any resistance whatsoever. 'This is madness, he can't expect us to comply. 'His tongue was culled at the sight of lord inquisitor. Despite everything which had happened, he still roamed across the land, deciding to leave the prison stables from time to time. What other opportunities as well, other than to check the ones which had no homes, owned no land any longer and threatened the peace. 'Goon. "Worm, shoe-slacker. "Peacetalker, snapper!' Some yelled but turned around at their business on his sight. They had been given ratios of food and water at times, but that wasn't enough. Four lackeys stood near him, wearing leather braces, strips of iron and perhaps one of the might've had a whole piece of armour. 'Well, can we at least stay peaceful at this time of the day? Need we remind you of alternatives? The jail always needs new people in, and it's quite warm down there. 'It didn't help as he had pointed. Two more people were taken hold, ready to be abused in the dungeons below. What other chance did they have? Lords knew well of the entire problem but never raised a finger for any other than themselves. Even the upper reaches and the other side had decreased in its value upon all that. 'Why must we keep going on this day today?' At the most opportune moment, a woman shouted. 'Murder, Murder, come quick, oh Inquisitor. 'Alarmed at that he followed her to the point of entry, through one of the slums, down from his high horse. The horns of the alley were just as frightening as they were, but he carried on with his iron armour, broadsword and the small spiked mace he used to carry. 'It was a body which was dragged around, down the stairs, it had seemed to be. A trail of blood was quite obviously leaving to the point where he might've died. 'When did you find this?' 'I was carrying my. . . "Enough of that, wait outside and don't move. 'At least three of the goons had settled down on following him once they noticed how serious he had become. 'You two stay outside and make sure she won't leave. 'The grins didn't help the fact that they weren't the most loyal, nor the most pleasing to look at men. 'Shall I assist them as well then?' 'No, you're coming with me, in case the one who did this might still be there. Have your dagger at you. 'The scene was at least a disaster of unknowable proportions. Not even one who was there prior to the murder could've described this thing well. So much blood had run through the stairs. It came to the point where he had climbed to the second level and still followed the blood. 'I feel like this a bad idea sir, do you mind If I wait. "Go ahead, I'll have a look, then we'll return. 'Even as that carried on, he couldn't even force himself to take on the guts which laid over there. Strangely, they appeared to have been bigger than expected for a man of his size. It was a bad thing, to say it on the spot. So many wrong things had happened here, and they kept coming. 'Is anyone there?' 'I'm the appointed inquisitor and there had been a murder. 'Looking through the pan glass of the closed door, he took a nothing but a glance. That mutt was still there waiting, he thought. At least I'll have some loyalty be felt for the last moments. It was almost as if they had done it on purpose to drain the victim's entire lifeblood through the entire complex. 'You, don't move!' 'The figure laid at the end of the corridor, seeming at the door from which the blood had started. A slam came as sound as possible. 'I'm coming for you. 'Before another door could open from the side, most likely a neighbour that had nothing to do with this entire issue, he was silenced by the inquisitor. 'Stop, stay in the house. No one is to leave their proximity while I'm here. 'Only now he realised just how much of a problem wearing his heavy armour was like. It really started staggering around after an entire day in the sun. Nonetheless, he reached for the door and kicked it open. The scene was one of disaster and of a fight. Everything was thrown in every direction, broken glass, vases, not to mention an open window. Past the pool of blood, he jumped over, only to reach the window and see no figure standing anywhere on the street.

'Damn him, he escaped. 'He shook his pesky pieces of hair and looked around. This was a scene that held no boundaries, especially once he looked at the ceiling. 'Whatever he did to you, this isn't right, it just isn't right. 'The inquisitor said to himself, after witnessing the scene. It was a strange thing that he hadn't noticed it as the first thing upon entering the house. Unavoidable, to say the least, his guts were strings on the top of the ceiling as if he was about to remake the man's entire anatomy. 'Why did you have to do this, why?' 'Before anyone else could surprise him, he saw a pair of cat's eyes just peering around the corner. He found the most inopportune moment to eat an apple, not to mention that he did it while staring at the ceiling. 'I told you to wait for me there. "I'm sorry Inquisitor, but there are people trying to get out, I'm afraid there's nothing I can do. They have people coming to clean this, this' they said at least. "Very well, go and ask the owner of the place, he should have a pair of keys for this room. After that, lock it and make for the prison centre. Oh, and make sure that if anyone gives you some dark glance or tries pushing your around, tell them that you're following my order. "As usual, sir. 'The man excused himself, hiding the knife behind a place one wouldn't truly even know where to find it. He started at the blood and followed it on the way. 'Sir, sir, I think you've missed something. "What now Rollo? 'We've got no time to lose. "This sir, it's important. 'It was the rest of the organs, suspended atop of the ceiling, dripping no drop of blood. They had been drenched clean of that, for certain. 'He's mocking is, he must be, that damn cretin, bastard, this just keeps getting better and better. Go and do what I told you. 'Before a moment came where the people living there might've made a seen, he almost yelled. 'I said no one gets out yet now that there has been a crime. Until I give the order as the appointed Inquisitor Cato, you are to remain where you are and not move a muscle. 'He stormed immediately towards the thing he had avoided for the entire duration of his stay. So close, I was so close to the damn murderer and he escaped. 'It was that rage that forced him to avoid eye contact while this entire procedure was on-going. For once in his life he didn't appear to hate this thing, as well as it did him no good. 'Well, are you prepared to take the corpse or not?' Looking around, the two men had still been guarding the woman there, who was now sitting on her arse, melting behind their man-made shadows. 'I'll die with her for now. 'Two nods and they were gone inside, looking at the corpse and the blood. 'Well, I presume you've had nothing to do with it. "Nothing at all, I was just heading back home from the washing. "Then you saw the corpse and ran towards us?" That's how it goes, sir. 'She hadn't the face of a killer either, not to mention that she was almost as clean as if she wore her clothes wet. On an impulse, he removed his metal glove to feel around her collar and her arm. As dry as if worn in the very sun. 'You may go. "Thank you, sir. 'The maiden was immediately on her feet and made for every bit as far as she would be able. Certainly, there wasn't anything at all he could've done about her, she didn't appear to have known. 'Cover this up, we'll have just so much more to take care off. "Did you hear that?" It was the mid-day and the windows hadn't been properly closed. Blaming the wind was to be the last thing they wanted to do, especially at a time like that. Katherine had been noting and writing everything down, down to the most obscure event which might've happened. At the word, she noted. 'You were right madame, there's been another murder in the town, something of a few hours behind. "Thank you, dismissed. 'With a wave of the hand, she thought about how everything fit inside with the rest of events that happened. The king most likely lied about knowing the identity of the murderer. Looking at the papers which one of her servants brought, she became aware of the fact that there were plenty of similarities between the murders. More precise, the murders of the lords in their mansions and private mansion and. 'Then you suddenly changed from focusing on them onto the common man. 'It was at least intriguing, as she thought of it. Either that or there might've been another. No, but the papers says it right. "Stabbed, organs ripped out, dragged across the complex. At least, three pairs of guts were hanging?" For that alone, this wasn't a murder of the mundane order, with such a thing as three possible victims. Time passed ever since they had the funerals, and even those were private enough, making the disposal of bodies utmost efficient. Without a doubt, they couldn't have reached the bodies and taken their guts out without notice, unless it went even deeper to the point of having gone. 'Stay in the realms of normality now, let's see. Well, there might've been three murders down there at least. You're bound to get the higher attention and we'll see whenever or not he'll notice. 'His silence was disturbing, as a matter of fact, he hasn't said a word or gave any announcement ever since it happened. To be utmost fair, there hadn't been something like this in any other moment of their lives. It had been his right to refuse entry to the world. 'If only there wasn't a problem with those beasts. 'He knew it as well, their chances having dropped ever since it happened. Fear ran amock throughout days and nights while they whispered. Neither the men nor their lords were that much concerned with the rampant killer. The degeneration continued. 'Well, here's a glass alone. 'Said Katherine, while looking throughout what she's written once more. It was obvious that he was clever enough to know where to find us when we had our meetings. It's a thing that he's going from side to side and getting to murder freely without having to even bother being seen by anyone. No description, no suspects, other than stabs, and many of them have happened in gruesome ways. 'Madame, there was a present. "Damn it, boy, you've scared me. 'It was during the night and under the candlelight, that she peered at him. She had noticed the finely wrapped thing but dared not say a word other. This couldn't be something she needed or wanted but noticed a pair of eyes, standing tall, behind the door frame. 'May you come closer to receive it?' It was quite beige, a dead colour, but the material could be undeniably good, or a well-done imitation. 'Bring it to me. 'Katherine said while looking at the sides. I could've hired them to guard me all the time if only I knew. Regrets had no place to stay there as she had thought it so. But once she had become aware, they came out of sight, in a sort of manner. Despite that, there still was that feeling as if someone was stalking or creeping around him. 'You'd better give it to me. "No, lady Katherine, please, come. It has to be given to you by hand, here. 'The boy could barely speak, could it be that he was being grabbed even now? The expression on his face, despite the distance between them, made it more likely that way. 'Very well. 'With a sudden step, she walked slowly, having held a small knife she had thought of carrying around. It was indeed held inside a holster, inside her dress, but for the first time, she was sweating as well as they came. By the time Katherine was mid-way to her servant, Diego, was it? She had already dropped a sweat off and got ready to face it. 'Thank you, ma'am, you can't believe how glad I am for you to be here. 'On the fly, he came inside and slapped the door closed. 'What's the meaning of this Diego?' The so-called present was nothing but an empty box, which had a piece of cloth wrapped around it. 'I need a way to make you leave your desk. "Why?" I thought I saw someone creeping at every window around the house, trying to find something or someone. So far, I wasn't certain of it until the moment came when I entered the room. 'One look behind and it was a bothering thing to notice how close her desk was to her window. 'There are a few feet between that and the ground. You don't suppose someone managed to climb up and. 'The boy spoke nothing more but nodded. 'I'm sorry if I might've disturbed you, my lady. "No need, make for your bed and have my desk moved so it faces the rows of books from this library. Just make it so I could look at both my window and door at the same time. "Yes my lady, I'll be on way. "And Diego?" He turned his ears like a puppy once he heard the words thank you, curtsying and bowing like one as well. 'Thank you for your service. 'With another bow he left as well, reluctant to leave the lady alone. But she knew better, that was sure. Neither of them could've been sure where he was inside, not to mention the danger of the boy who was now roaming the mansion through the dark. With an immediate snap, she locked the door before pulling the curtains. Shutting the light wasn't for the faint of heart, though she did it as well, getting as ready as one could be. It was only now that she had become aware that this was happening. But there had been a shimmer of trauma inside her heart. She could only swear by her own that someone was creeping on her from a dark place up high. Regardless of that grim feeling which had nothing to do with reality in her mind, she pulled at the books and turned one of the shelves around. There had been built at least eight hidden room behind each bookshelf as if she wasn't aware of the fact either. It had become quite frequent that she hid. 'You won't find me here, even if you are to break in. 'Luckily for her, each of the rooms had been fashioned for the likes of refuge. It had a soft bed, and enough room to move around and lit a candle without being discovered. Tight but neat, she was ready to go to sleep. Laying straight on the bed wasn't as easy anymore when she had heard the sound of broken glass. No certain thought came through, only the evident. Someone was inside with her, an intruder. He waited for me to close the door and the curtains, Katherine thought. Could it be, were there two? 'With the pieces of cloth pressed around her body, she said no word but waited for something to happen. Anything at all, other than the glass being continuously shattered on the floor. It must've been his doing, trying to walk as silent as he possibly could. Just go away, go away, please. Each step which had become audible to her made her snap even further than she had originally anticipated. It wasn't as if this could've been any easier for any of them, especially the sleeping servants. But there'd be no help at this hour, none to be sure. Too many had died by his, or their hands. No, one was still inside the house, most likely locked outside the chambers while one was locked with me. Bent and shimmered through, Katherine would stand against the wall which held the books on the other side and listened. He's still there, walking through the dark. There wasn't any button or any mark hidden behind any sort of book, as certainly there wasn't any possible way for him to open it. Nonetheless, when those damned sounds came, it sounded as if he was blowing through a crooked horn. It was deep and went for long, making it seem as if he was calling for reinforcement, to say the least. Neither of them would've been sure of what was going to happen if the worst case scenario went and she was caught. Wait for it, he won't reach you, he can't. Think straight woman, he won't be able to intimidate you out of your hiding place. It was his song which had made her uncomfortable now. Obviously, he was there even at this time, there wasn't any possible doubt. More so, he must've known that something was off. Pounding on the door with something hard, most likely the horn or what he had. Katherine's heart rate jumped a little at the distinct sound the blunt object made while hitting the door. Though that wasn't the worst thing of all.

There was a pause before the knocking started coming from everywhere. Bookshelves attacked, only that they'd fall. Luckily, he didn't hear her cringe at the moment when the horn hit the spot she was on. Too sturdy of a wall behind to let him know that it was hollow in the back. For the rest of the night, that'd be the only thing remaining in her library, at least until she got the courage to move on and try to get an eye shut. I couldn't help them if I truly wanted to. Neither could them, at least that being sure to some extent. It wasn't until the sound of ripping the door from the other side that she realised that there'd be no sleeping through this night. Both of them were in the room, talking at their heart's content. From the likes of their voices, they were, what people used to call foreigners. Sharp tongue, droopy accents, or at least even with their tongues most likely on, there'd be no denying in that. It signalled something inside her which made her go at it again, coming close to falling into a convulsion, a shock of some kind.

The fact that they were so close to her, while the thought of her being found crept far too certain to the mind. She tried covering up and waiting, being sure now of the presence or two. From the next half of hour, the conclusion came to be that she wasn't in the library, no in the mess, perhaps somewhere else in the manor. Without the sound of a door opening, it was obvious that one of them broke or cut it down. They finally went away. Though it might've been something which only made her feel selfish, Katherine went away to sleep in the veil of the night, standing in complete darkness. Unable to even say goodnight, at the fear that she might get heard by a sharp ear. It wasn't going as well for those below, especially those crushed by the great fall from above. At least the most accepted factor in this entire problem was the fact that there had been no survivors from the fall. Empty buildings struck by awe laid there, with their wood rotting, stone smashed. One long body, in particular, had been staying there, burnt to crisp, an effigy for those who came from far away to see for themselves. Tribes had perished walking through the damp mists, but this was important to see and note. For, there was nothing like what they've seen around, at least nowhere in the farthest sight. It drove them mad with rage, upon getting closer, some machine perhaps made that coloured mist which mixed with the air. One large breath in and the men were driven to sudden despair and strangle one another, stab and die. There wasn't any telling what had been the reason behind this mad act, other than despair. 'Despair, please let me despair. 'Said one survivor, with two broken legs. He couldn't act, he couldn't try, not even end him himself, alive. For now, the darkness fell throughout the world, even though the ever-expanding pit. It brought nothing but a paradox into the sky, bringing light into a place that would vanish. A world that was meant to be destroyed. Even now they hunted, relentless at night, wriggling beasts devouring everything in sight, now that their long-awaited hunger had finally come to pass. Roars and shrieks came as each and every one of their hundred mouths opened and started chewing on everything which had come into their reach. Tree, stone, dirt, even the occasional woman who had failed to run. Everything had to be clean before the end had come. Down there, nonetheless, corpses fought, ran through the mist, no lesser than the living counterparts they fought. Factions that still managed to have at least a living thought. 'We formed this alliance in the hope we would end. The threat that's before us and wants us dead. This curse will not end until we die, but rather to keep these bloated parasites alive, which might spread, make sure you aim for them. 'He'd be captain, now that he had his force. A crew would be more fitting, though this sea was dry and filled with as much of the despair as he had ever seen in a lifetime. In his thoughts alone he still fought for one purpose above all, revenge. To make that man suffer. Let me live a little longer. Despite everything which was forgotten, something inside him kept the memory of his torture, while it attempted to eat him alive, rather than the fond ones of his childhood. 'Are we prepared lads?' From the looks on their faces, eight men, broken as much as him. Once they opened their mouths, they had noticed just how far this impediment went. Neither of them could force a coherent sentence, not to mention that it was undoubtedly obvious that he was not any different than the rest of them at all. 'Let's go them, lad!' He shouted, leaving more of an instinct and signing up for the rage induced force-driven assault that was to come. Some were sitting unprepared, though at once they came and cut them through. The many fashioned weapons made from sharp sticks and metals bands, from which there laid a sword. In the hand that cut the man apart, revealing the many fleeing runts. 'Crush them!' As much as he wanted to end them all, he settled down with squeezing those little things, with their many legs and slithering feelers. Out from their bodies came out the blood and what they had drained. For a moment of supreme control, he was still bothered by the fact that those parasites inside of him just let him slay as many of their species as he would. Do they not expect us to come after them in the end? He wondered. 'That one as well, I saw him move. 'The gurgling sound which came out of his mouth still bore something through. It was surprising to see that it wasn't his crew which reacted first, but the creatures themselves. All of the sudden, the neck snapped, pushing itself out along with the head, as well as every limb in his body. Each one of them had taken care of the torso and used it as some sort of cover while attempting to make it through. 'Stop it before it gets away. 'As they noticed and ran, they had still kept the eye contact, rightly so, after taking the biggest rock they could do for together, it came to the point of crushing the meat. It suffocated those things inside the ground, from which there wasn't any escape under the extreme weight forced upon them. 'Good one lads, but it isn't over yet, we need better tools and armour to be certain. 'The gurgling thing had stopped, leaving only but a bloating sound coming from his innards each time he spoke. Straightly disturbing, to say the least, they followed him through the mist and right into the forest. At least the forest had still been as healthy as it could be in the conditions. Knowing that he wouldn't be understood, he pointed at one of them. 'The one with the sword, come to me. 'What followed next for as long as they could do for, they started cutting and fashioning of spears. 'Straight, like a plank, then just go around. 'It was as fast as he could do, luckily, one had carried a hidden knife which had only recently become useful. Now they ran through, ready to impale through each piece which had those parasites inside. Any bulk or raising of the skin. Though as they returned back to the place from which they had left, it had become obvious that the missing limbs, the arms, the head. They've gone away when we were missing, but how could it be? It was a fact that there hadn't been enough time for them to move through, it would be noticed. It was something which bore through as the impossible goal, unattainable by the dead man roaming out there. As much as he wanted to do, there still came to it as well. 'That's it, we'll change our plan.

'That was it for him, wherever he was hiding. Despite the glances, he took the sword and started leading them through the mists. 'This this we'll find it and make sure that he won't survive it either. 'Though unknowingly, he was set forth the road, where there might've been no return because of his choices. It was the capital, alas, the piece of it which stood as far off from the sky as it might. Everyone was damned. As much as the pioneers of the mortal world looked at night and stood watch, they were not approached by those parasitic beings. Living bodies hurt them so, bearing pain and having them melt away only by a touch. Being a fact alone wasn't going to help, as there had been night apparitions, men that came and attacked the holds. None of them ever succeeded so far, though the time of change was coming, sooner or later, none would escape. The raising of the kingdom, soon or too late. He bore a dark grin for the entirety of time, when all of the sudden, the three of them raised from the ground. It was nothing but a dream of escape, shared in-between them. Tom most surprisingly so, had dreamed what followed next, especially his house, the home, the cold and the sky. Seeing everything normal again, as well as going to the pond alone. It was the point where their common dream departed. Balstar had gone to a different place, going by the same goal and getting himself the tower. By the time he was laying at the top, he threw a glance at the other side to notice the other tower and Augur in it as well, waving at his friend. As much as this mad goal remained, both seemed to have been happy with their taken choices. Everyone but Tom, walking through the cold day alone, one thing still refused to leave his mind. On the frozen pond, there laid a frozen boat, atop of the frozen lake, standing all alone. There were some small dark bodies underneath, too late to do anything about by now. Each and every single one of them had most likely been caught by the coming snowstorm that shook the entire land, Tom is no exception. Yet more than a glance, there hadn't come before he went on his way without questioning or daring to look back. There was a supreme need to go and take a look at the familiar home, to see his friends, his parents and those of which he didn't know. But as much of an effort as he tried pretending, there just wasn't enough time. At least not while it started swallowing his home. That damn pit came back and broke a piece of it without even a warning. Tom took a glance and saw it through, it fell as a slender, no, thin disk that decimated a piece of it, and made everyone disappear. 'No, mother!' He shouted but no one heard him until he realised he was awake. At the sound of him shouting, everyone was awake. A new line of torches started, with as much light as it could've come. 'Ready to go now, I suppose?' Asked the creature, without a doubt having no name. 'What should we call you, if ye don't mind me asking?' Came forth Augur, as active as he usually was by the time the other two still rubbed at their ankles. 'You can call me the Guardian. "No, no, no, I mean your name, given word that refers to you. I'm Augur, that's my companion Tom, and the man wearing a cage over his face is Balstar. 'They had all been distinct to the tongue, as well as to the ear. While he was prepared to repeat the word Guard, Augur stopped him with his sharp voice. 'Gurdan, that sounds like a start, wouldn't you agree?"Gurdan?"He repeated it as well as he realised that there was quite a slip on the mouth. 'Don't make him call himself the first thing that came out now. "Do you have any better idea?"I do, as a matter of fact, why don't we let him choose whenever or not he wants or needs a name, shouldn't that suffice for anyone?"But boss, the name, it's given. How could it be that he's giving it to himself?"Augur, just let it, I mean let him choose whatever he wants to. 'Neither of them was about to bother him, though something was obviously going on. 'He seemed to have had a bad dream, at least, obviously, it was to be avoided. 'What would you have named me?'All of the sudden, he asked Tom. Out of the three of them, he appeared to have been the most distracted. He was busy eating some of the saved lichens they had found on the road. Chewing it made him want to have something else and better, though, in desperate times, there came the need. 'Perhaps we could call you Moss then?"Moss and Gurdan?Are neither of you capable of coming up with something better than that?"I was about to suggest. "No Augur, no more naming as of yet, I'm putting a hold on the entire operation until we're done eating. 'This came as no shock but the big one refused to eat. As much as he waited, there came a time for him to act on the need to get out. One big door laid just a few feet away, and as he started approaching it, there wasn't any doubt about the point where the other had previously stopped. With a sudden flex, his fist came down and broke through the stone as if he was ripping mere planks of wood. The violent thing came to break through like a machine. It was ancient architecture, thought for the time being neither of them cared for anything less than escaping. 'It seems like we're ready to go, come on before he starts bringing the entire thing to the ground. 'Balstar had been prepared ever since the noise started. As for avoiding the pieces that fell, there wasn't any reason for them not to hurry. After all, just as well, there wasn't any possibility for them to get hurt anymore despite being unprepared for what was to come. 'Careful Balstar, if the tunnel collapses, we might be buried inside. "I know the lad, better hurry in that case. 'The three had followed as the creature made a path straight ahead, going on a raising curved, to the point where they had stopped and reached the back of a sturdy wall of stone. Not even strength alone could've torn through. Lights came at once, on this newly discovered sight. All of them stood and looked around, only to wonder at the many spread-out rooms which laid there. 'We'll have to reach around and walk. 'At this they agreed with him, deciding to follow the one with the most experience. 'Do you think this might take any longer?"I am certain it will, boss, there's no need to bother our new friend now. 'Uncertainty was bored at his deaf voice. He was going to lead regardless of what was about to happen, though now there laid an incentive. 'What exactly is this place?"Tom was first to stand upon the threshold of the first room. By the time he came closer, he had noticed something peculiar. Pieces spread across, multiple types of limbs by the ranks of which he had never seen before. Giant heads that were sharp, multiple eyes, laid on a table, each faced a side and blinked at intervals. 'What is it, Tom?"They both enquired but stopped at a sign from the boy. To be sure about it, this wasn't something to be looked at, least by some pioneers which wanted to escape. More importantly, there were some human limbs here and there, indistinguishably so. Without a doubt, they had been taken without even the consent, or to say the least desire of the dinner. 'We need to go before we find out something made of the pieces like these ones here. "The sight disturbs you then?"He asked, though judging by the facial change in him, even he was surprised to see what parts they had been using. 'Let's go, before something creeps behind us. Look, boss, the light had already started dying there, far in the back. 'One by one torch stopped lighting the past rooms, stopping as to never reach at least eighty feet from them. It wasn't normal, at least from their perspective, but neither was this place nor any of the rooms. 'Shh. 'The creature made a sign as they advanced forward, now that it had noticed it too. But one of the next rooms, past the many pieced deposits which had by now many limbs just piled together and abandoned laid a sleeping anomaly. One could find no other word for it, other than to describe it as a four-legged thing, with jagged toes and sharp nails which had been attached to a giant swelling head. It had protrusions of blind eyes, the type that had belonged to old bats that had lost most of what they could've been. One thing was more important to note, being seeing at an angle, its mouth was obviously underneath the body, snoring, pushing forth a hot breath. Despite this experiment, by the time they each went on at a time, Tom had seen it and looked away. Balstar glanced and saw the mouth and a sharp tongue just laying. The only one who saw most of it was him and Augur. When his turn came, he had noticed just how many of the corpse pieces it had eaten rather than defend them. Some of it had been alive as well. 'Why don't we kill it before it wakes up and kills us?' 'He won't bother us now. I don't think so. 'He hadn't appeared to have been certain of its capabilities either, as it had been. At least it was certain that pain would seem to come for it if it woke up and tried anything. Other than that, they looked and checked through all the rooms. Some had been pieces nibbled on, by smaller pairs of mouth, others had some unfinished creatures laid in sharp metal strings by their every side. 'For how long should be roaming through?' 'I do not know the upper side of this, I've been stuck down there for as long as I was aware. "Must be amazing finally escaping through and leaving this damn cage. "You have no even the slightest clue. "Tom, I know it's hard to pronounce, but it's Tom. 'The mutual nod was only disturbed by the look behind. As the temple curved, it was obvious that it had been perhaps too large to be a mere place of recollection. Taking the curve made them realise that this was where a part of it ended and where they had found the rest of the ancient city. At the top of it, all laid a ceiling of stone, spreading across as if it were the sky. 'Duck, now. 'They all sat at one passing giant who appeared to have passed one of the many tall bridges that came about. From the looks of the houses, they appeared more like deposits where they either store resources or using them for housing the enormous being in case of hurt. As damned as it sounded, the sound of water underground and the sight of lichen and moss growing in those places gave them the least bit of hope. 'What is this place?' 'Shh, don't make them notice us now, don't forget that we're not exactly wanted around here. "Boss, I'm afraid, where is the escape?' 'This shouldn't have happened at all, but I think we're lost. 'Augur was already rubbing his toes and looking at the spear. Poor man, Balstar thought, he thinks he stands a chance against everything that's out there. Surely, he couldn't think that even with such a tall thing like Gurden, as he called him there was a chance. No, they would surely just overthrow him by mere number alone, which had been obvious by sight alone. Three, no, eight had passed that bridge above them by now, one would tend not to look death in the eye anymore, as pointless as it'd be. 'Well, where to now?' 'Lad, I think it's fair to say this is where our journey ends. We could still make all the way back from where we started and see whenever or nor there's something else we could take. Perhaps we may even convince someone to come with us and dig through the ruins left by the tunnel. "It wouldn't be anything else but for a waste of time Bal. I think we should follow him, at least until we get to a point where there's nothing we could do, you know?' 'Risk our way out as they say. You don't mind that either, do you?' 'We need to get outside as well as you do, perhaps even more. 'Staring and Gurden, made him feel like there was an unevenness between them. They all wanted freedom after all, but they weren't sure how much he wanted it. Seeing him stare at the architecture and everything which had been laid around could've fooled each and everyone of all. He wants to stay, most likely, needs to do it. 'If you want to remain here, it's your choice.

You've already done more than enough now, breaking through the damn closed gates. Perhaps if you'd like, we could just part out ways and find an exit for our own. 'At the end of Tom's voice, he still made no attempt to leave a response whatsoever. It was a state of supreme silence and thought in which he weighed his options. Despite every chance to turn around, seeing this place for what it truly was made him regret a choice he had thought was made. 'We're going to head for your world now, as I have said. Need to wait now, for a good chance and make it through the city. 'They were ready to stay behind him and hide rather than risk anything else close to a fight. As much as they seemed different from the others, there wasn't any way they could risk it. 'We need to go now. Stay behind me and don't blink. 'As they formed a line, dark and blind, followed by what seemed to be a walking path under the bridge. They'd pass many buildings this way, though there had been a doubt that someone even lived inside of them.

No sleep, no hunger, nor thirst, but decay bored their bodies into the most wicked state. With each stride, they walked as if ready to notice that there had been intruders. Despite their best attempts to remain concealed, their presence came to notice. 'Look, Tom, I think one of them peered at me just now. "Don't push our luck now, no need to have them follow us as well. Stay behind and don't try making any noise. 'The man nodded, though still tried looking at it from an angle. Too many of them laid around, having taken this city as their own. Not to mention the fact that they were still working on the construction in awe. 'Stop right there, I'm not sure you're ready to see it. 'Right where the track had ended, there laid a plain, almost empty piece of decorated land. They had stacks of boxes and materials stacked there, for they were ready for the construction of some functional statuette. By the likes of it, standing against the giant inner structure in the middle, it almost resembled with their default face, more serpentine in nature. It was made out of something fashioned to work on rotative mechanisms. That alone was obvious when tests came and it started moving the giant wheels which laid in the place where shoulders might've been. A trivial, antiquated sort of device, though the scale alone was menacing. 'Tom, look, I think that could be the exit, just at the end of the bridge. "I think we have more problems to concern ourselves with at this moment in time. "The lad is right, we cannot let them go on ahead and finish that thing. What happens the moment when it starts moving now? They could march through outside and crush every fort and every entry point out there until there's nothing left. And when it's done? Why I've got no doubt that there could be a workaround that it would try getting to the capital and ruin it as well. "So what are we going to do about it then? It's not like we've got the strength. 'Judging by how much emphasis Tom had placed on the word, Gurden had already paid enough attention to know that he was needed as well. 'We're asking perhaps too much out of you now and I'm not sure there's something for you in case. "Show me the outside world and where I may roam alone undisturbed. 'This came more like a deal than anything they would've thought off. 'It's done, to be sure that we need to ruin their project and make for the outside world, both me and my companions. We'll make sure that you'll be able to go wherever your heart desires after that point. 'They seemed to have already been connected in thought. He accepted nonetheless, though not because he cared much about what was to happen to their world. It was obvious that this gigantic construction of theirs would certainly disturb his journey through the outside world. Not to mention that he'd be judged to be on their side by his appearance alone. 'We'll see it through if that pleases you all. "It's the right thing to do, we just sabotage it and make for the exit. As simple as a plan like this I doubt there might come. 'Balstar was already preparing, though he had a small knife, it didn't matter much. Comparatively, Tom was a bit smaller than both of them in stature and held no weapon. Augur still held it as tight of a spear as he might, wondering at last whenever or not he'll need to use it now. Without a doubt, they waited no longer and started following it. 'We'll go around the boxes and what they laid out there. "Make sure that you won't be seen from above the bridge. "Don't worry about us. 'Added Tom, looking forward to it. 'We've been through worse. At least I've been, compared to which I'm sure we'll do better. 'He tried to look forward and caught him in a net which laid on the ground. A sharp swipe from the knife Balstar carried promptly made the boy rejoice. 'We'll be fine. "Meet me at his right arm then, we'll start with the least watched side. There don't seem to be as many occupied there as there'd be on any other side. 'A good sight as well by Gurden, the creature seemed to have qualities which were hard to counter by themselves. Before nodding, each made a run for it at a time, making sure neither of them could be seen by the passing ones. What could they be carrying outside and why the hard work all of the sudden? Tom appeared to be more interested in their dealing rather than he was on exiting. An idea dawned on him as much as he had pondered on their sizes. Looking at some above, from a hidden point, he noticed that smaller carrying containers which might've had enough space for them to fit in. The very least could be said in case they had the insides of the container emptied before they went in. 'Well, I think I know how to have our escape plan settled. "Great need Tom, but we have to get to that point before anything else. First, we need to take care of it as well. "Well, don't you have something at you that might be helpful, anything at all?" Nothing that might be of use, unless you could the making of fire. 'Balstar showed a small machine he had carried, it was somewhat of the sort of strong torch that might be closer to melting iron than to lighting fires. 'That's as good as it gets, unless there's a problem, look at the frames, they're made out of sturdy wood. It's a beginning. "Good thinking lad, but that won't ignite on its own. 'Augur was already standing many feet in front of them, looking above and ready to make a sign. As much as the creatures were uninterested in what they were doing, neither of them would risk the chance. Once their conversation paused, Tom was the next one to make for a spring to the other side of what seemed to have been a mill. Tom recognised it immediately without a second glance. 'They've been outside, but, how could it be? It's a mill. "It's magnificent, isn't it. Not very useful with the wind down here though. 'Looking at it almost made him remember the smell of hot bread being made when his parents had sent him in his younger days. Even now, it still had something gripping him, by the smell and appearance, not to mention the good times in his memory. 'Lad, you'd better not slack now, don't forget where we are now. There will be plenty of windmills to go through. 'The man bit his lip at the sight of the creatures approaching. Either they've seen or heard something now. There wasn't any sight of Gurden either, compared to which those who now came appeared to have been freshly created. 'Inside the mill, now. 'Luckily, the door was left open by the previous inhabitant, not that there was a choice in that matter either. From the looks of it, they had taken it off by the ground, pulling it through by force alone. Despite their expectations, after closing it, there weren't any remains of the previous owner, if he had been caught when this happened. Rather, there were the bones of what might've been a fat, big-boned pig, laying somewhere around. He wore pieces of cutlery around him like weapons and some of the metal pots like armour. 'Something cleaned these bones. "Augur, shhh. Either keep it low or don't speak at all. I think they're coming. 'Each of them grabbed something of the facility which laid around. The entire mill started shaking by the likes of it. 'We're being brought there. 'Noticed Tom at least, though more importantly than that, he had noticed that most of the wood which laid inside had been properly preserved. Once he realised that four of them might've been outside carrying it, he stopped struggling or saying anything. It had to wait. There was still a long trip to their construction and the mill was heavy enough. The remains of the pig suddenly started sliding on a side and wickedly make a sound each time it bounced against something. 'Pshh, I saw you come inside. 'A voice said, as silently as it stood near the door, Augur was the closest one to hear. 'It couldn't be. . . Gurden, is that you carrying us to the spot?'The sounds took a while to come again, though there was a confirmation which came through. 'Keep silent until I warn you. 'He said, at least that was what Augur made out of it to the others. In return, he threw a couple of hand signs for Balstar would get them. 'He's trying to stay that he's one of those carrying the mill to where we need to go. 'The whispers stopped once the hard rocking had begun. It wasn't that they were afraid that something was to be done about the mill though they needed to get the materials eventually. One way or another, they would face the first three or four who were to pull it into pieces. Balstar came forth, as close as he could to Tom without making any noise whatsoever. 'Lad, I don't think we'll deal with so many, at least if they start knocking the mill around. There's something I've been thinking about but I'm sure you won't agree with it. "No, have some trust in me and our new friend now, it's too late for you to have a chance in mind, remember?I was supposed to be the one who'd lead us. As silly and childish as it might've sounded, you were right, I was, am the best choice to take the best decision now. Now, if you may stand about your place, we'll follow the plan and see through it. "But lad. "He's right boss. 'Without noticing, Augur had already snicked behind, even though the tiled ground rock a little back and forth, he still managed to get a hold of him. That carried on as soon as he was certain he'd listen. 'Both him and I are already on the same plane, I don't want to give up either. Especially now with Gurden who's as close now as he is. "Neither of you understands what I'm talking about, I'm just thinking for the best course of action we should take. Even with his help, this plan seems as if it's too dangerous to go on like this. 'With a sudden push, it was the first time the middle had stood still and not tilted as it was planted when they had originally come inside. If Balstar thought this plan to be dangerous, he'd come as mad upon hearing what Tom thought of doing next. They might've been as close as it came through, as the rocking stopped and they were about to feel something of a stop. 'We won't have a second chance, it may be that we'll die at their hands. "Stop thinking that way Balstar. If you still don't understand that we'll go through not, you can stay behind and take whatever choice you want to. 'Suddenly the door opened and there was only a beast that signalled with its hands. Judging from the mark left by Augur, it was the same one, which followed. Augur went outside first and peered around. 'It's safe to come. 'Moments later he was already out of sight. Strangely, he wasn't as attached to stay behind and wait for Balstar to make his choice. 'Whatever you want to do, remember that we still have a plan to escape once we deal with their giant. 'Tom was the second to come out and hide behind Gurden, who laid crouched. It appeared as if they had prepared many small functional things they might've taken from outside and ravaged through them for pieces. Sort of a bizarre way, they were alike in that manner, with the taking of what it didn't belong to them. Augur even came with a wicked smile now and then. Judging by the size of it, this wasn't to be an easy task, at least not one for their number. 'Do we have a plan then?"I don't think we have, perhaps. Say, Gurden, if you don't mind me saying that name. Do you suppose we could do something about that head?It does seem as if the support under it ain't going to last as much as they hope it would. 'That size of it was huge, not to mention that the trajectory would most likely crush whatever laid in from, including a piece of the basin and its own legs. Seemingly, it would be the piece of resistance, the final attack. 'If you're willing to go on with this mad plan, we'll need to sabotage both of the arm mechanisms as well. Make sure they won't know how to repair it in case they'll go on and attempt to rebuild it. 'That familiar voice never appeared to surprise them either. Despite what was said and done, both of them knew the caged man would come back one way or another, even with his broken will. 'It won't be easy, and I doubt there might be much to do, but we need to get through them at the same time. "That might work as well, then we could crush the neck and make out for it. "About that, Tom, how exactly do you suppose we'll make it through. "All right, Gurden, do you think you could bring one of those containers laying around and carry it with us inside?"I might. 'Came the voice, while never having changed position. He was still trying to peer and look forth, though they were still busy at work, too much so to even notice them yet. 'Whatever it is, we should take a decision before they decide to bring more here. "Any container would do, as long as we are to make some holes inside of it and get carried out. 'With it settled they appeared to be as prepared as they might possibly be. It was close to nothing now, compared with the fact that there weren't any options. Before going ahead, one more time. 'Gurden you'll help us with the neck once we're done. Have a large or at least medium container emptied somewhere just so we'd be safe. 'He was already going through them to be sure that it'd be safe. By the time they had crawled in those holes, there was no one laying in there. Though what had been more close to their proximity laid the damn core of that thing. Most important of all, a giant red ball made of pieces, incomplete. It shined and made each of them wonder whenever or not they should continue off to steal it. Gurden might carry it, thought Balstar while caught off guard by ill desire. He just needs to make some space, enough that one of us might be left behind, just in case we couldn't share it. All of the sudden, Augur's spear looked delightful. Speaking of which, he got affected in the same way, it pleased him to think of the fact, though nothing bothered him more than the thoughts of abandoning his fellows. Now they came as visions of the man with antlers, who owned a pair of beasts and made them carry that thing for him, alone. No more boss, no more of the young lad, just me, out there, with this belonging all to me. Such a treasure might've cherished enough that it might've gotten a hold of Tom. Though its effect had nothing on him, after all this time he had held that thing around his chest, hidden and protected. 'Shouldn't we be doing something about?'The missed opportunity revealed what laid above of them. It wasn't just one giant incomplete red gem, but two more which were complete. Both Augur and Balstar were too self-absorbed to notice what had been going on there, but judging by the side of which they were obviously set to be forced into sockets. Despite the fact that they laid in the wooden socks, it still managed to appear like well to carry on the plan. For a moment then, the whispers came again from above. 'I've found something which might interest you. 'Almost thrown away from their delight, both Balstar and Augur came and took some of the hay which had been brought. It was the moment for Tom to approach, now that he noticed it. 'I don't know what's happening with them?Ever since we got in here, it looks as if they can't take their eyes off those red globes up there. "Make sure they'll burn and melt. It may take even more time if I think it is what I think it is. 'Which brought him back where he had studied the markings on the walls. At least when it came to hearing the description of what they looked like and exactly what they appeared to be. 'Make sure they won't be standing too much in their sight unless you want them to turn on you. 'With which he had already left, leaving him alone. As much as he wanted to trust them, it seemed as if they had been preparing the hay around the wooden pillars for far too long. Neither of which made any other move than shuffling it around. 'Balstar, Augur, I think both of you might need to let me deal with this. It would be better that way. 'Before anyone could be turned, they both made it seem as if their walk was fake. One a sudden shift, the spear changed hands from one to another, ending in Augur's back. It was low enough that he fell in pain, where he started shaking viciously. There wasn't anything else but a self-audible silent shriek as the other man approached. 'Gurden, help me, something wrong happened to him and I don't know what to do. 'Moments passed to nothing on the other side. Tom called again but the man was approaching. With something of a fractured red eye, he came close to it, at least at this moment while it just so happened for their companion to bleed to death. I need to escape before he kills me, thought Tom. But the moment he left, that of which he knew, that would've sealed his friend fate. Moments passed and that pointed thing had the blood going well down. Regardless of what was to be decided, the lad had known that he'd do something.

When on a sudden noted, he reached inside his shirt, right as Balstar was ready to tear one of his eyes out. Tom threw what laid inside his shirt as far as he could, bouncing against the bigger one, then falling on the ground. 'Take it, take it all, just leave us. 'Without a thought of coherence, Balstar dropped the damn spear, which Tom pushed away and made for Augur. 'You'll be fine, we just need you to hold on to. 'The end of which wasn't known to him either. Judging from the mark which was left on his back, there wasn't much he might've been able to do. Whatever might happen from this moment on, this was about to solve their problems, as well as he was right about those globes giving the energy which was needed. 'You damn brat. 'Balstar yelled once he realised he had left his back exposed. The lad had already taken the small fire device and lit it. Moments before the man was ready to follow and attack him such a rabid animal would, he threw it in the hay. A burst of fire, something might've been doused in there. It followed like a gulping skull which extended its jaw around the wooden structure. 'Balstar, we need to escape now, before it's late. 'Tom noticed that the man took out the coat he was wearing and already tried putting off the fire. It only worsened the situation. Not to mention that Tom had already been shoulder to shoulder with Augur, trying to get him first before the smoke-choked both of them. Either of them would've fallen from exhaustion, as it was clear that the man over his shoulder was fatally stabbed. Ready to choke ahead, Tom almost yelled into his proper ear. 'Augur, move on, please, we need to get out. 'It was pointless, as he thought, the man was gone, bleeding, seeing how the spear entered the end far too deep and cut to a vital point. 'What have you done?'The lad asked the man, seeing how the cage was melting over his face. The fire started engulfing him before he realised that this was the end for both of them. 'Gurden, help me, I do not know what to do. 'His voice was about to perish once he was each of the holes which were covered. It was the same moment when he realised that there wasn't an exit.

Executions seldom had those sort. At least, it was undeniable that those orbs were melting, falling over and melting bits of what had remained of the caged man. Despite Tom looking in a different direction, the smoke had already taken whatever desire to fill his lungs with air might've been there. He fell and couldn't raise, impaled by a flying piece of wood, there wasn't a way he could even scratch though. Pointlessly, he extended his hands and started scratching at the stone which blocked the holes. It took moments for him to realise that it was the same mill they had been carried with. Closer, so much closer, to home, just a little longer. Thought Tom as he watched the road. The weather was dark, the storm and the black clouds were covering the way, now that he became aware. No birds flying in the sky, nothing that he knew, just this empty road, where he was lost. When the entire thing fell into ruin, once the orbs fell into one another, pushing pressure through the entire attempt of a machine. Still, it seemed as if the arms had a last attempt to move into directions as they fell apart and to the sides. On that very moment, as it came to be destroyed, the piece of it which reigned the highest fell into the biggest building and broke it apart. Stone by stone was crushed and destroyed. It was even by this point that there was a need for them to notice, where every creature suddenly stopped from their busy walking to observe. A mad thing which had not even a precedent or a plan set for them that might've helped them to realise what was about to be done next. Only one creature still continued the stroll, carrying the container and acting as natural as it seemed. For a moment, he had looked behind to see whenever or not one of the little ones might've come outside, though he soon came to the realisation that this was their end. With that apart, as well, no one was to disturb his exploration of the outer world. No one, to be sure of it. There would be no attempt, nor any acknowledgement of their existence, just supreme death. Which still reigned below, unknown to others. As the fire ended, darkness and stillness laid supreme. The creature named as Gurden was gone, Tom, Balstar and Augur were gone as well. Outside, the world had barely known them, for the sky was still falling apart. Bigger problems had been running so. It was the time for them to arrive. Through his box, he saw it so, that in a day, two, or even so, they'd come to strike at his capital, it seemed. After their defeat, there would come the time to rebuild it. 'What should we do?' The king wondered, gnawing at his claws. As for the moment, every side, from every bridge, lower region throughout and the higher ramps had been protected it appeared as if.

There wasn't any time to deal with the small common bandits or low time murderers, as long as the cannons remained untouched. It was obvious that even the dumb ones had the common sense not to ask for it and go for them. Not that they hadn't known that the thing was supreme of pain. Flashes, sparks and fuel came hand in hand.

The men, women and children would be placed down into the prisons for protection, at least those who hadn't refused to leave their houses. As for the prisoners, they were set as far as they might've been, even cage by cage, taunting and trying to make as much noise and intimidate the meat which laid around. It frightened the children, just to look at them and how they acted, though the choices were limited. For, they knew well that it was dangerous to reign outside. Only the brave ones, or the mad, fools and the lords stood forth and rule over the barren abandoned buildings in the capital. As dangerous as it were, they were right to do it so, as the buildings could most likely withstand, not to mention that the mansions were almost to the point of being called small castles. 'Who's there?' Asked the king, on a sudden impulse. While he had heard a song, he pushed forth the cube and looked throughout the veil around his hall. The waiting room was filled with gloom, though there wasn't any way for anyone to get through without his notice. 'What might it be now? A burglar, a killer, someone to make my due?' The guards were just around the pillar and without a way to let anyone through. 'Who is it?' With a sudden creaking sound, it was one of the guards he had sent for Katherine, standing by the door, frightened by the sudden outburst. A display which might've sent any lesser being into a full-fledged flight. She waited, the two hired swords behind her as well. It seemed as if they had been there with her ever since they had been acquainted when she was closer to the age of being young. An approximation wouldn't do her any good, not that it wasn't appropriate, to say the least. 'Why aren't you hiding yet? Don't you know by now that they're already on their way? Have you not heard of what they've done to the islands and those holds? We've discussed throughout our meetings. There's no reason why you shouldn't be aware of what's coming.' She only got closer with each glance and peered around. 'It's going to be empty here, I mean in the capital for at least some years, if it is for us to survive. "We've been through worse now, survive through something even more damning. "Have we? I don't think you've ever faced something like this, at least never before of this magnitude. 'She still tried peering but saw no expression whatsoever. It was something disturbing about the king which no one who's ever met him managed to take a hold off. 'Well, it's this the reason why you came here? I thought mourning came only after the fact. "No, I've come for something else, rather, an exchange. 'She lowered her red covering cloth at his sight. There wasn't any mention that she followed him into the dark. 'So it's true what they say, about the size of the thing. "It's quite depressing to admit to it, but I've been staying in the waiting room for far too long than to visit this. 'The grand hall waited behind where it almost seemed as if it was a Colosseum by the sheer size and form. Many structured rooms, guardians which laid stone, without giving a sign whenever or not if someone was in the armour. One baffling thing after another came the fact that the torches weren't burning, yet there was light. It was the dark veil which was taken from the room by the skin and thrown in the entrance just that no one would ever know. A few generations down the line and it had become a legend of the sorts. 'It's gorgeous. 'Said Katherine, once she had noticed the finely carved stone, the mighty pillars and the four giant statues kneeling in front of the throne. 'Why have you given up on this? You could've. "Tainted the people who came in here. Though it may be true that the many rooms might've done something to protect there, it isn't as easy as you may think it is. Anyone who steps past the veil isn't any longer what they seem to be. 'She could feel that on herself, having a sudden hatred just bore through, long forgotten as it may. Her hands just wanted to wrap around the king and strangle him like a viper. To bite and eat, but she wasn't damned. 'Does it always happen in like this in the place?" Only ever since we've raised it. Something of the air below, of what lays down there crept inside. I'm afraid there'd be no protection for the people if we were to fall. "Then let them, there's no way to save any of them, so why not save yourself? You could leave me for something small. Perhaps take the castle as well, there needs to be some way. 'The king merely shook his head and glanced still. 'You know Katherine, my dear, this place still brings me more than enough memories of the past. "The good I presume?" Not that there was much of it left, though he could see their ghostly apparition when they'd come, women, men and children, just like they would've been expected to come now. All of which wore robes of some sort. Others from long passed ages before this restriction was applied. 'I still see them come about to listen what had to be said. "About what?" The state of that damn fog, the taint of the land and the reason why plants don't grow anymore. At least not in the places they were supposed to. Can you see that spot right by the kneeling statue on the left?" Katherine nodded as she peered, already she was wearing less than she would've ever expected to have shown. Nonetheless, she was listening to him and nodded. 'I was once told by a man who stood there that there's no other chance now that the land started to erupt. It would've made the capital spread across the continent below, up to the point of having plenty of other kings lay there with their political agendas, need for conquest and war. "So you brought peace then? Was that the reason you've made all of this?" Oh no, Katherine, this wasn't my creation. It was vanity and greed. I hired builders, craftsmen, creators and whatever was needed to satisfy my carving. 'He had already placed his crawling gauntlets around her and pushed her on the cold floor. There wasn't anything sort of frightening than what she felt, though it was also something she wanted to feel at least until the end came. 'It is a memorial for the people I've failed. A symbol of my greed and the need of which I've made it so. But all of that changed and I felt. Unworthy. 'With a sudden caress, he backed up and made it back through the dark veil. As hard and pitiless as it might've been, there wasn't any desire for Katherine to stay and explore the place either. It would be forever left a mystery in his thought for now. Now that he was aware, his voice rules over as she followed. 'Look throughout the sky and peer at it, they're coming. "Have you not thought of the choice I gave you? There's enough time to save them as well. "And leave what I've been planning over the spans of so many years? We will survive, we have to. "There wasn't any telling on that, as the people shook their heads. Most of them now stood in the barely lit, tight spots, with small made beds and most of the food which was taken from above. At least they could've mentioned of the fact that they had to share upon everything and most of which weren't theirs. 'Look at them, chewing on my crops without having to pay. "What good will it do if there won't be anything to spend on if we don't survive. "I'm telling you, nonetheless, old Cot, no matter what goes down up there, I'll be holding tabs on each and everyone who had ever laid eyes on my work. Mark my words. "That'd be enough, let's not have this go on ahead until it evolves into something which isn't pleasing to the eye. 'Said one of the inquisitors. Strangely, it had been the one who's been outside the most, hunting for whoever that damn criminal was. It was in front of the two men that he announced. 'There's been another murder, down here, it seems. No need to alarm as of yet, but we may have to deal with a rotten one among us. 'Even he couldn't delude every single inquisitor who laid around and the jail master, not on their own ground. At least not in the way they'd expect it to be. 'Listen to me now, I won't have any more of you argue during the crisis, not when you're making everyone around feel nervous. Understood?"Yes, sir!"They both said and went back to their places. It wasn't as if the entire place didn't look like a damn mess filled with tents and small beds, pillows thrown and a general dirt thrown just about everywhere. He went back and watched with the others inquisitors just how many of them had waited in lines designated for the sharing of the food. 'Could this be what we have come to? To be broken as people, butchered as animals and forced into hiding?"You know the alternative, don't you?"They were all aware as he had pointed above at the shaking pieces that fell from the ceiling. It was clear by now that it had already begun. Cannons fired as if they had been trained or used by some master marksmen who knew his way. They threw eight or ten harpoons at a time, modified just so the force would be unbearable to the creatures during their leaps in the air. 'It works, doesn't it? Even Katherine was surprised as she hadn't realised that they had arrived. One had already fallen and crushed one of the far-out farms which laid near the far edges of the kingdom. 'That's. "Nothing, Katherine, look. 'With a sudden end of the two or three that were sent at once, their shrieks as they fell made a signal that they weren't dead. Still, they crawled, safely and slowly, trying their best to gnaw as what they could. But it was clear that they were only scouts that took most of the artillery they could. 'What are they planning on doing now?"With a sudden rush of the storm, the sun was gnawed by the harsh rain. For a moment there, they thought that a rain might've been coming, though shards of snow were present just as well. Lighting rushed in the highest places, suddenly mist covered a dozen places. There wasn't any way to see and note where they had to be dealt with now. 'Without vision, they won't be able to aim. "I'm on it, don't worry. 'Said Katherine, though despite the reassurance which was given, there was still doubt in the many eyes of the king. 'Guards, accompany her and do as she pleases, makes sure you'll kill every single beast you see. 'There came eight of them, which followed. Outside, a number of men which he wasn't expecting waited there unannounced. Combined, their number came something close to twenty, closer to thirty by sight. 'I will remain here and try to help you as well as I can. 'Spoke the king. It was hard to look at one of the giant guardians and imagine him that way, but it was far better that he could speak with each and everyone. Though through only one of them at a time. They made like the wind, being guided by the guards who knew better about each place which laid inside the mist. 'Each of you forms a small group. 'He said, still trying to find a way as well. His boxes were useless, not that it might've helped either. Though dark wriggling shapes roamed across the sky, undoubtedly ready to crush the entire capital to pieces. 'We'll use two on a cannon this way, one man and one of my guards will manoeuvre the movement while the other deals with the firing. At least, there shouldn't be any problems unless we encounter something as. 'One of them ahead which laid broken. Blood ran through the base, making it seem quite obvious what happens. A few feet away, despite its destruction, it appeared as if its target was achieved. It was only the head of one of those beasts, looking as if it was somewhat merged with the head and something of the base of the small tower which had fired every single harpoon inside its mouth. 'That was a fine job it did. My lady, you should take cover now, before it's late. "No, not until we've dealt with this, understood?I won't abandon my people in this time of need. 'Though that was caught short-handed and out of the speech. It seemed as if one of them floated just above, wriggling with a light which vanished some of the mist around it. They were caught at unaware and ready to be taken apart when it stopped in a shock. Despite what was said, the king stood before them, holding a spear in his hand. It made the wriggling fiend just freeze in sight as if it had seen something of which it wasn't meant to see. The wait wasn't as long as before he threw it thrown the head, right between the nose and eyes, making it wriggle and get lose inside the maze of mist. 'Come already, we've got to carry one before another one comes. 'With their shock in check, the men looked proud to see the king act on his own volition and join them in their time of need. 'Can we carry on then?Each on their way, you heard the king. 'Said of them before they spread like a swarm of insects ready to follow their giant rods. 'Katherine, you must go as well, this isn't a place for a lady. "I can take care of myself, don't worry. You could deal with more help anyway, in this kind of situation. "No, it's far too dangerous for you, promise me that you'll go straight to my door and hide inside the room. There can be no other way than that, please Katherine. 'It was as if their hands were tied there, and at his commands, she nodded. Something they shared then remained unseen by beast or man, as wet as long as it remained, she ran straight ahead where she might've known that it laid. 'Now that it is done. 'Said the king as he roamed through the mist. Looking around made him realised that perhaps he had come too late. Buildings laid in ruins and on a fire. Black smoke replaced the mist. It just happened that he couldn't see anything from inside the castle and neither could he again. 'What's happening?You weren't supposed to be here, not now. Not now, do you hear me?'He almost shouted, driven to a rage. What came forth waiting for him, now that they felt his scent were the crawling creatures he had employed, coming empty handed, wriggling in the air. Their many legs floated but they bore no corpse, not that he hadn't changed his mind. 'You shouldn't have come around there, go away and never return. No one can see you or know that you've been here. No one can know that I've done or put you on. 'At his commands, seeing how he was shaken to the very ground by their presence, they suddenly crawled away, letting him shaken. 'No one will know, no. . . one. 'The king repeated before he saw something he thought there'd be no way of seeing. It was a young girl standing there with a toy bear. She had born witness to the entire conversation before he had become aware of what was happening around. It couldn't have been a mere illusion, the child had seen it all. 'I'm sorry, child, but I'm not the same king you were supposed to know. 'Behind her, he heard the mother's child looking for her, at least just now. 'I must apologise for what's about to come. 'With a glance, he looked around and realised that there wasn't anyone else in sight. The entire place was a disaster, a war zone filled with secrets. How could another murder make a difference? He thought as he had come close and grabbed her by the head, in the way that there'd be no scream. It was quick enough, that her head snapped, though the thud came as she hit the ground. No blood became involved, but a sudden need of reprise. With a sudden care, he took the body in his arms and started for what appeared to be the figure of the girl's mother. 'Josephine, Josephine?' She shouted for what seemed to have been minutes. 'My baby, my poor, poor baby, what happened to her?' Without even looking at the creature which had brought her, it almost seemed peaceful there. Creeping at the worst time possible, while they still crept alive. No moment passed until she glanced at him and asked. 'What happened? What, what have you to her?' There wasn't a word said, that he realised what had to be done. Just as she got in reach, nervously trying to get her child back, he had grabbed her by her throat and started strangling her. It was an odd position, while she tried picking up the child from the ground, not to mention that he had never been used to this type of killing. 'No one will find out my secret, nor that I've done what I've done to protect myself. Not by your child, not by your hand will I be taken down now. 'With that her life ended, both her and her child laying in an abandoned burning decrepit thing. It would take hours at most, but soon she'd burn as well, he made sure to light a small flame for them as well. Still shaken, visions played at him. A harsh wind almost knocked him once he looked above and saw the giant bellied wriggling ahead. The small protrusions still bore something which didn't seem to be right. Such maws as to devour, such destruction, this wasn't the place for a king. Relentlessly, he heard tower after tower, beast falling on the ground as well. It wasn't as if there was a chance, as the mist was starting to dissipate. With another weapon taken from the ground, it had become obvious that the mist was partially gone. Their numbers were few and space, the war had just begun. Only a few beasts laid dead, either entirely impaled or shot down that they'd starve. The heaviness still bore enough stress on the capital, not to mention that the sounds of the fight still carried on. Not so long after he had truly joined the fight, there came the shouts from behind. Lead by the Inquisitors, at the sight of their king, the men shouted. 'Charge!' The armoured men yelled, with the others behind. Improvised weapons that reigned from forks and made spears that might break upon that skin of theirs. Nonetheless, they came on with the cavalry, charging ahead without an ounce of fear. 'What happened your majesty?' 'The cannons, protect them at any cost, they're the only ones which can penetrate through their thick skin. 'The men nodded as they started spreading around the annotated points where they had been placed. Most haven't even imagined themselves trampling through the remains of broken homes and burning cottages until this moment alone. 'Would that be all your majesty?' 'We need those things at any cost. If we lose more of them, we'll be nothing more than prey ready for the picking. Now go, before it's getting too late for us to fight back!' At a direct command, they ran ahead on their armoured horses, making for what was left of their defence. It was a thing of torture for him to hallucinate right now, though he saw them yet again. Crawling servants, hiding around the corners in what might've been the ruins in the shallow mists. 'Begone now, I shall not have my kingdom ruined even more by your presence. 'He said, after founding himself walking alone. It was a fierce thing seeing them just wriggle in the air, body against body, moving their maws in unison. Perhaps the lightning faded or their power dimmed, for the weather died off as soon as more of them came within range. 'Another one down. "Good shot sir and you only needed one good shot to put it down now. "Thank you my dear, but this won't do the bit, there are still plenty of them laying around. 'If one wouldn't know any better, they'd call him Robert the knight of the throwing spear. For he managed to aim right inside the air and take one wriggling beast with one shot. It died immediately without moving or attempting, though the many maws across the body still waited for their end to come. A horrendous thing to see them starve to death now, though it wasn't about to come to an end. 'Master, look, there's another one down there. 'In the most unexpected place, it seemed as if a beast crawled such a salamander would, pushed by the grating of the teeth coming from the many mouths below. For once, it had made a terrible sound while they made contact with the stone floor, even breaking at once. Seeing how it tried or attempted to eat at the base, there just wasn't any chance it could succeed. 'Give me a spear now, it seems as if this one isn't going down as easily as the others. "But master, we're out of spears now, we've got nothing left. "You damn. Well, go on ahead and run outside and get me more spear. "The exit out of this tower is blocked by its mouth, master, there's no way I could head out there without being eaten. 'Nothing to shoot with, he had remembered firing in the sky in the most peculiar directions at least. A lot of the spears might've laid across the ground just abandoned. I should've waited, I should've waited, damn war, damn tower. 'And damn you as well, useless servant. Now, what are we supposed to do?"We could wait for someone to come and rescue us. I don't think it might be. Oh, no, sir, they won't be. 'By the time he looked again, there were two giant wriggling creatures trying to coil themselves around his small place and gnaw at it. The sooner a third one came, the higher the chances of taking down the tower. This issue was undeniably common. Unable to fly, they fell from the sky. No one was out to deal until the chivalry came and even then. The arrows came from what seemed as if an archer was a blessing. Blistering arrows pierced eyes and grated through their weakened bodies. 'They're not so strong anymore!Let's go. 'Yelled what might've been, perhaps the only woman who was brave enough to accompany the men who were had decided to take matters into their own hands. Something of a damned thing bore through them once they went ahead. It was a sudden lightning strike which cut the line in two. At least eight men died, stricken and burnt to a crisp by the sheer magnitude it had. As far as to say, there wasn't anyone who came to a direct confrontation until this very moment. Abomination, most thought after it fell on the ground. Perhaps it was the many spears its body had taken, but it still managed to hover a few feet above the ground. Most of its body had fallen apart, revealing its dark insides, the many guts it bore for every maw and for how long, it had left them unfed. The sings that weren't recognised came from the fact that a lot of the maws had died and had begun the process of rotting away. Flies that found their way to devour that thing, though even with so much of it taken, it still came to flight. Twin arrows flew and blinded the thing, leaving it to blindly throw tantrums around. Left flying in a direction wouldn't have done it any other good that what was expected. As for now, this would come to an end. It felt and heard. 'Bring the chains, men. "Bring the chains. 'Another man shouted as they came from each side of it. With a sudden throw, the chains seemed to have gone right through the body and landed on the other side. As soon as it happened, three or four more did the same, against the trashing thing. They pulled and pinned it down, doing much to restrain and apparently help it split in what remained of the creature. It bore some lightning through one of the maws, aimed at the ground. More came through and bore their mist. Things got dark as the weight kept adding with each one taken down. It might've started as a thought, which evolved in a whisper. Soon they yelled through their lungs. 'We're losing altitude. 'They said, shouting without even looking ahead at what was coming for them. So many still came on their way. Now they took down beasts with their manual weapons rather than to wait for the cannons to do anything at all. For some reason, they had become weaker than expected due to some dark exposure they couldn't explain. Through thickets and layers of clouds, down where the ground was tormented, ill, without a sound, there laid a decrepit old creature in no state. Soon, it was repurposed by the parasites and creatures which found their way through the fallen ruins of the capital. One dark and dead wriggling beast, a king it used to be. Many human limbs which might've been dead crawled and pushed themselves closer to their deemed prize. As short as they were, too many limbs were connected, some head, still working unattended. Perhaps a torso, some lower part as well, came through and tied itself to the crisp body of the beast to walk. From a different sight, it almost seemed as if it was alive. Obviously, the husk was still used because of its warmth. There wasn't any other saying against instinct and no will against those sick crawlers, poisonous parasites. Inside their own land, they roamed. Hard, as the journey unfolded, they pushed for the creature, half eaten by itself, to walk through the ruins and the stairs. As much as it wouldn't have fit through the small tunnel it had once got through, there wasn't anything there anymore. Just gravel, stone and various patches of dirt which were easily avoided and climbed upon by the human legs and hands which pushed. Even piece of the torso served because of the sheer magnitude it had. Though there'd be no amount of parasite in there that might've been able to give some life to such a massive husk. It was to be seen, though even they felt something as new. As it appeared from below, the greatest shadow came upon them, ready to show the meaning of death and destruction. Casualties would be high. To be said as less as what it was going to happen, this would be a dark chapter to come. On a sudden tilt, they pushed the husk away from those giant one falling from above. Despite being freshly dead and usable, something about them repelled the ground parasites to the extreme. It appeared as if their blood poisoned and tainted, or could it have been the meat inside them which had the same effect? No matter what was to be done, their war leads them this far. Back through the gates, they shouted, seeing how it was about to become dark during the day. To say that it was rare for the sun to break through the region was wishful thinking. Especially now that it wasn't over. The various attempt to a front attack had failed for them. Driven to stagnation, repulsive deaths and even being chained to those small ones they flew away. 'It ends here, come, men, we still need to push through. 'The inquisitor came as hard as he might, making sure people held their distance. It appeared as if one beast as purposefully snapped half of its body just so it would be able to bend itself halfway through and stand alike from above. Despite its inability to fly and fully stand it had been ready to strike. 'Come one, come, come on already. Just repair it before it notices us here. "I'm doing my best but I'm no canon engineer. "Two of which, unspoken people, worked at the mechanism which was left at the head of a broken small tower. Without a distraction, it seemed as if there wasn't much to be done other than the repurpose of some pieces here and there. 'Might we use it now then?' "Is it working?" "Only one way to find out. "Turning what appeared as if to be the strangest piece of the device there was, he loaded eight standing spears and a rack of something which was found on the ground. Had it been a second later, it might've noticed, though it appeared as if it snapped itself for nothing. A clear shot came through and pieces its head, eyes and left its jaw to fall through. 'Oh, no, no, no. "Get off me, before it falls!" The two of them argued after seeing in which direction it was coming, almost jumping from stair to stair, incapable of completing the entire row. On a moment of notice, it had become obvious that they weren't going to use the canon anymore, despite having been repair. The mechanism laid deeply lodged in what might've been its skull. Through and apart, despite being seen as such, the king still assisted as best as he would. Paranoid, he was seeing them apart, crawling, still carrying something akin to a young girl on their back. Such guild that must've been suffered. Yet he hadn't realised what was happening. Something had affected the capital, either being the extra weight of the failing engines which committed this act. Without someone or something stopping them, there wasn't any saying where they'd end now. Future was unsafe on the ground, where their lives had started. Soon the capital would be complete, and it was only a matter of time. 'Drive them through!' They shouted nonetheless, without ever daring to acknowledge that this war of there was lost in a way, a bleak fight perhaps, where plenty of men gave their lives, and those beasts had driven them apart from the sky. To admit defeat wouldn't have brought comfort, but at least the descent was slow. No more beasts were coming, other than the ones retreating and the ones coming down to see for themselves true rot. They fell, pulled and impaled, beast after beast wriggled from the sky after losing altitude as well. Though their fall differed, it ended us as fast, impaled into the trees and shrieking below as tauntingly as they could. 'We've done it. We've repelled the invaders!' Men shouted before realising where they had been. The king was mourning as he walked on ahead to his place of virtue. Locked inside, he waited for his guards to return, now that the threat was defeated. Engines died that for now they'd be stuck in that decrepit place. Through the skybox, he looked and saw something he shouldn't have seen. It was fate alone which drove them to the point of having been stuck near the other side of the capital which had already been tainted to the core. Why must this happen to me? 'What have I done to deserve this?' He asked, as mad as before the grief. At once, he went through the dark veil and promised never to return unless they called. It was time for him to return to his grand hall, his palace. The place of refuge which was carved for him alone where no one else would bother him whatsoever. 'Must I always be disturbed?' He asked, seeing how one had already tried catching his attention. It was the image of a, no. A mother and her child, their apparitions were stuck in there with the rest of them now. Despite not speaking a word, they rather looked furious, burnt to a crisp, at least on the mother's side. 'I did not intend to do it so, but I was forced. It was a war on the capital, still is, you've had no right to stand outside and not call yourself an enemy, to say the least. You've done this for yourself, with or without a doubt. 'With a strike, he strode right through. It wasn't as if they could've done anything but show their marks and what was done to them. But what was that? Even the king in his desperate hour asked himself, watching through the only cube he'd taken. Despite recollecting themselves from what had appeared to have been a great battle, bolts of lightning fell from above. 'Run to safety, now!' It was the same man who had previously taken the lead, big and broad, bearing red overalls and a stuffy moustache. He managed to push a small group just in time from being obliterated. Without being aware, it happened that they avoided sudden and supreme death. Bolts flew into what seemed to have been a shattering rain. Most hid in the houses which had stopped burning or stood against the corpses of the wriggling beasts which laid below. It didn't matter where they launched the bolts as long as they had been aware that someone was down there. And the stench and the putrid scent of a dead beast just pushed itself past man or brute. 'We need to get rid of the bodies now. 'Said one of the Inquisitors. He was the only one left to bear that title. The others had been killed long before he took the others off the raft. 'But that's impossible, Inquisitor, we'd need something more than brute strength to be able to even phase them. "I'm afraid that there isn't much of a choice now, not that it should matter much since it's an inclined plane. As it is, that should make it easier. "And more dangerous for us. 'Responded another forked soldier. He was peering at the few beasts and already laid in fear of the bolts. 'If we wait here any longer in this condition, they'll eventually ruin the capital. Damn wags, can't you see that the fight ain't over?' At once he strode in and started unwrapping the chains. Carefully standing again the ruins of the various destroyed buildings, he had encountered the most smell inducing of the creatures. Despite the fact that most of the beasts had already fallen on their own and attracted that scent, one, in particular, bore the most distinct one. 'If you can't do anything, at least help me with this. It should greatly aid us now if we were to get rid of it. 'Luckily, there had been those who remained saner than they had ever been. Pushing through and each grasping a piece of the damn chain which had been wrapped around the creature, they pulled it from the ground with might. A few inches because of its height and weight had already slid against the slope. 'Keep going, I think it's working. 'Which each stroll they pulled out each and every single chain which held the rotting carcass of the beast. That's when they were joined. Bolts still flew to various unknown places. Somehow, the scream of a man being hit by a bolt still held that damning scream which had bored through. Nonetheless, they had done their best to push and drag, close to the edge. It was working, at least to no end, when at once it started being dragged by its own weight. 'Great job, men!' The inquisitor reminded them, as such as it had become obvious that the bolts of lightning that came from above all fell as far away as the scent went. It even happened that they had trampled on the farm with its body, through all would be rebuilt, as long as no more of the men died. This habit of dumping their bodies in a pile outside the edges of the capital continued. More men felt braver than before, seeing how the bots stopped coming for them, but rather hit only the ground and wailed. A forest of dark and dead wriggling things that shook no more. Still, a murderer lingered in the prisons, still, he wasn't found. Just a few nights before there had been another murder, and now, mostly women and a few men stood there, alive. Separated for the most part and watched. For many hours they had to endure the sounds of a fight. With someone which killed and laid on the loose. More importantly, came the very fact that they were not even aware that they weren't in the air as well. Confused about the fact that it finally stopped, a woman went one, followed by another, in what appeared to have been a chain. Something which was indistinguishable, to say, they came one after another and stepped in. With so many hurt soldiers and men, they were a sight to behold. It was truly the end of those beasts now that they had been banished from the same platform in which they laid. One thing missed, at last, other than the top of every building and the decent sight of clouds. This was to be a new chapter in their lives at last, for both the people and the land. Through the depths, oh, nonetheless, the titan burned long, spun into a mess of rubble and broken stone. One dark creature had escaped from there, lost itself in the world which laid upstairs. Despite being forbidden, so they thought, their ancient creators made one beast which was smart enough to go instead of waiting. For the ground swallowed much stone and everything heavy. It would take decades at least until they'd be able to gather enough to rebuilt another one, not to mention that those stones had to be mined. Nonetheless, of their problems, they understood it so. Three bodies they had taken out of there, one of a young land, two which had been broken, caged and sharp. From the bizarre looks, they appeared as if they had been sent as part of rebuilding, just as it was done. One beast had come to carry each of the body, walking for as long as they would into the building temple. The same stairs which they had escalated, the same path, which included the death-stricken guards. It didn't matter which way was used, or whoever was killed. Each of the creatures had a secret deep inside the very ends of their skulls which made them remember the way they had been created and needed to be done. On this sudden appearance, they were taken through a secret passway which laid under the floor. They came at last to a set of the pool, a giant table in which they were set forth. Each of the bodies had been drench into a pool, melting whatever might've been to the skin and some of the bone. It was only set on the side, at which it had been obvious where the bodies were to be combined. It wasn't something they were supposed to do, but neither have they received something as small. As Augur was pushed by the arm, the pool had reached his torso. Carefully, he was taken back and placed on the table. When it was done with, he had lost not only an arm but a fraction of his torso which held all his organs inside. Organs fell off and spread, still connected as well. The other side would be copied in meaning, as Balstar seemed to have been closely resembling the body type and shared the same height. They were quickly placed against one another, with their organs forcefully pushed in their combine ribcages. So far, nothing was done for their bodies to be welded yet. Tom was to be the next one in line. The lad was dipped up the entire way until his upper torso, making sure his organs fell. It came to it, immediately after that he was placed on top of the two of them, forced against their heads all the way to the neck. Some came even close to that, making contact, bone to shoulder blade, though that mattered even less. A putrid task followed now when they had brought, from the appointed shells which laid in the wall, various pieces of thick string and needles that were sharp and big. One look would've determined that they were rather small swords than needles, to be sure that they had been usable on their kind. Slowly, they had been answered together, around the skin, inside their guts. The process took a while until they had been turned around and the beasts stopped. Looking at the body, there was still something that needed to fill that emptiness which laid inside. Between the three bodies, it was obvious that it had to be done. An amorphous sponge laid in jars. Set in many of them, though they had been instructed, in the back of their very head to use it sparingly. As it was pushed inside, past the lad's ribs, next to the heads of the two men, it started pulling blood and growing. One second glance, and it appeared as if it had already grown as thick as muscle once it had absorbed the blood. Soon, the growth would stop once the gap was fill and it had entered every hole. 'Ghlook'Tried to speak one of the creatures in its disturbingly sounding tongue. It was true at least, as pieces of the sponge which still laid in the jar had been used. Some of the holes in the combined ribs haven't been properly touched and sealed. Just as a matter of precaution, something had to be done as well. On a sudden note, a light metal rod was pulled from a corner. It'd be soon covered by the sponge as soon as it had made a hole in the body, being pulled towards it. Carefully, one of the creatures lifted an arm and rightfully under it shoved and forced the rod through both of the bodies. It made a clocking noise as soon as it was done, leaving a shimmer which almost reanimated the body for an entire second before ending. Tom had opened his eyes to look into the dark, without any feeling of his bodily functions. There would be no end to their torment whatsoever. They closed after it ended. Some of the sponge might've found its way through his throat and into the mouth, without any way of knowing whether or not something was about to happen. It wasn't enough to stabilise it this way. With another rod inserted even lower than the previous one, they were connected the entire way. After a long enough exposure, it had to act like bone rather than a stabiliser of some kind. Not, it wasn't enough, that grim feeling at the back of their heads dictated. As much as they wanted it to happen, it came as fast, the solution to their problem. One last rod required an insertion through both of their heads which came inside the lad's body. It wasn't as much as it affected them, but some semblance of sentience was there. The sponge and the rods would make it certain that whatever they have done would remain at that. By the time they were done with the arrangements, the next part came forth. From the darkest corners, such they brought, that of which made them come back to life. Despite rotting, they remembered where it was hidden, that blood which was taken from the ancient source. A mystery, at least, it was inserted through. It acted almost as if it was living, once it felt the remnants of their blood which wasn't absorbed by the blood it suddenly pushed itself through the tube. One small incision was made just in case so that no drop of it would be wasted. Metal pins just strapped the thing down so it wouldn't trash the place during its awakening. This had once been a lad. The two men had been someone once, rather than suffering blindness, deafness and the inability to shout during their torment. It was done before long when thoughts flew in and the lad's eyes just flashed everywhere at once. Nothing was coherent any longer, at least no decent thought came to his mind. A strong hunger laid for meat, which made him even more savage once he noticed everyone leaving the room. From what he could see inside the room, there was an escape, what he recognised as the acid pool laid just a few feet away. The need to end his life came too fast once he felt and looked below. What have they done to me? Might've come out of his mind, though only disgusts came out of his expression, while nothing else bore out of him. Pain dragged him still, he couldn't feel anything but the pain returned. Tom shrieked in pain and wailed on the table. Those beasts went back to work and dared abandon him there to rot, such as. Such as someone he couldn't point towards but feel the bodies struggle with him. Two pairs of legs and two arms which weren't his. An abomination which had to end, he thought. But no one was around to hear him suffering or to help. Some had already escaped this damn place, seeing how it was in ruins, without a doubt, having destroyed the last red stones. 'Free. 'Nonetheless, thought the one who had been called Gurden. It had been a long and deceitful journey through the catacombs which laid below. The depths had been perilous and he had travelled through what he had noticed to be the remnants of a previous civilisation, which had fallen through. Despite being limited, he had just enough inside his mind to recognise what he was, as what he'd be encountered. A cloak laid on a skeleton below, taken by him. It had seemed that an entire family might've used it to cover themselves from the cold which laid below before he came and took it as his own. 'They won't take kindly to my stature, will they?' He glanced at his hand and went on nonetheless. It was a grim sky but the stars and their light hadn't faded despite how desolate the land had become. Looking back, it appeared as if he had crawled out of the earth itself, a hole if he may. Given birth on this world, ready to get through and explore. He walked at once and touched the trees. There was a feeling in his hand once the texture had become apparent. 'This is what they feel like, is it not? There must be more like Tom laying around. 'It gave him a sharp through at what the lad and the others were like. As much as they were shocked during their first encounter. Not to mention that it wasn't like anything he had ever seen down there. Something approached. It was a middle-aged pair which had apparently strolled throughout the woods. They wore the most damningly strange garments and appeared to show no fear at the stature he bore. 'Good evening. 'Both of them said. Their feathers seemed to flush between the waves of wind as they spoke. Evening, what a peculiar name for such a strange contraption. 'Who are you?' 'Oh, well I'm Myra and this is my husband Herold. 'Myra and Herold. 'I am Gurden. 'Was the first name he might've thought off as being called. Despite his chance to give himself one, it was given by a human after all. And humans trust humans, only naturally. As such it came to be that they both smiled at that for an odd reason or another. 'What a peculiar name Gurden, you wouldn't actually be from afar? A foreigner?' 'I'm not from here if that's what you want to say. 'Very good, hear that Myra? A visitor, in these parts, and in this time of the season. 'It's very troubling that it happens now if you beg my pardon. But I don't think you've made the right decision to have your visit now. Not after what's been happening lately at least. 'She almost blushed once she noticed the attention Gurden paid to her. This conversation didn't feel as if it was going to go where he needed it to go. 'May I join you then?' 'Oh but we'd like the company, wouldn't we?' His wife nodded at last, and as they made their way behind, it appeared as if there wasn't any stopping from their path. Gurden was about to follow them throughout this entire damned path, through the world, without saying a word about those who freed him. It went well as long as they didn't question what was hiding under that cloak, not that they showed much fear or anything of the sort. Only banter as it came. 'Do they make others as tall as they've made you?' A seriously startling thing, to make Gurden stare at her. Judging by the nervous laughter, either they were onto something or playing tricks on him. What will it be? 'We come in various shapes, though we're all supposed to be as tall, after all, that's the way we were supposed to be made. 'A prideful remark came at last from Herold, who shook his belly and peered at his own height. 'I wish I would've been able to say the same, but my kind is only made to grow around the belly. That, I can tell you to be the truth. 'The man almost snorted at himself as he went on. If it weren't for the presence of Myra, he would've forgotten himself with immediate ease. Nonetheless, they made it through, past the thicket, in a small corner which was green. A few houses laid around, rustic, with no wall to surround them, only but those who were still busy at work, even during the night. If it were so to be called. Some waved at the couple but turned their eyes once they glared at Gurden. Such a thing was bound to happen in a way or another, after all, how often was one such as him to visit such a place? 'Be our guest for the night. I've got it.

'Herold, we. . . 'Myra excused herself before pulling her husband a little farther away, just so they wouldn't be heard. 'We can't keep him inside for the night, just look at his size, the bed alone would be crushed under him. And what about dinner and supper? I'm quite sure just one of them would waste a month alone if we're lucky enough not to stay a few more days. 'Myra, how could you think of such a thing? 'We've never refused a guest or a man who seems lost from his ways. 'She pondered quite heavily, despite his attempts to guilt her into taking him in. 'We never had someone as big as he is, just take a look at him, unnaturally big. Someone such as him would have no difficulty taking everything we have and never returning anything in turn. 'You know we never asked for anything in return, that's the entire point of having guests in the house. It's the conversation. 'Riveting, as it might've been, there was no saying on what was to be done about that. 'Well, I believe, we've come to an agreement then. 'Both of them said, on a sudden change of note. 'We, both of us have decided to invite you to spend the night with us, at least that's the least we could do. 'I decline. 'Come as cold as it had been during the night. No one could've thought that either of them was disappointed, not with the noise happening in the sky. As a matter of fact, one glance at it and even the beast figured out that something was wrong. 'Lightning, it's been a never stopping charade out there, it sometimes even makes it hard to sleep. 'What's the cause of it? 'We certainly have no way of knowing, I wouldn't risk going as far as to venture just for my morbid curiosity. Not now that I am old and have such a beautiful wife beside me. 'The strikes of light almost called to him as their reflections appeared against his pupils. He was sure now of where he had to go. 'I must excuse myself though I got something to take care off. 'Judging by how smooth it came, the air outside had done him good. He had felt like he was rotting no longer out there. 'Well, if you ever, what was it? Your name that is, I've got a terrible memory and a bad habit at that. It comes all the way from my grandmother's side. 'Harold, stop that. 'There's no problem. 'The words almost slipped away from him as soon as he spoke. 'Don't mind my sudden leave now, we shall meet again. 'Hear hear, tall man, hear. 'He made a small bow as he had noticed Myra do it. And without thinking, he almost threw a wicked glance at those farmers in the distance, the same way they had shown him. Regardless of not, despite their initial intention, one glance and they had been frightened by what they saw. 'A weird fellow, that one. "'You'd have to be a madman to have him come into our house like that. No, that isn't something that needs to live in homes but stables. "Myra, he was supposed to be our guest. The least you might've had some respect. "I believe there's something wrong about him, trust me on that. Something that's off for some reason or another. 'Regardless of that, he strolled alone and followed the lines that came from the sky. Soon there'd be a danger, through the woods ended soon enough. Now came the planes, empty and devoid of growth, just flatness which revealed that there were structures in the distance. 'Could that be another temple?'Gurden asked himself as he glanced. Judging by the decrepit state and the size of it, chances might've been right. Something called to him at that point in time. A pile became apparent, but alas, this was to be their new life, in this new world from which previous generations had emerged. It wasn't something to be pondered about my many and rejected now. No other placed laid there for them to live. At the end of the battle, it turned out that the wriggling beasts were the new rulers of the sky.

Only the mad dare call it a war. A delusion of grandeur and thoughts of their king having the capital rebuilt and raised once again from the ashes of the world. Though the king was sitting on his throne now, he saw how each of the apparitions began fading. Both the people he had forgotten and those whom he did disappoint. Despite thinking it'd be haunted for an eternity, this was only their mourning place. Most of them had passed ever since they had hit the ground. One nonetheless remained in there, crawling in the dark. 'I know they'll all return once the citadel is in the sky, it's what comes as natural as they say. But you're one who died here and shares some of my regrets now.

Why are you hiding from me then?Has old age of living in this world damned your sight or dimmed your brain?Very well, if that's what you wish. 'Regardless or not, he wasn't answered and kept on skulking on that which bore him nothing more than regret. It was a lonely hall, a grand one but lonely. Not even madness nor despair seemed to have corrupted this place now that most of its inhabitants had left it. A worthy claim. 'My lady. 'Shouted a man. It had been a while since the battle had ended, bringing in the release. Most had already been weeping and looking at the burnt or crushed ruins, at the debris and what other things were left behind the destruction. Though one lady still stood at her desk, almost reminiscing about her writing session under the lamp. Of course, that was replaced since there wasn't any rooftop in her house. 'My lady, are you fine?There was the war and you ran off into the clouds. "I'm fine, you don't need to say nor do anything. Oh and he's here as well now, good. 'Her sarcastic way didn't bother either, not like they weren't invited by the sight of it. Both of which remained more than happy to see that their mistress was more than alive. She was somewhat taking this very well despite the circumstances. At least better than everyone else. 'It's a dark place out there, isn't it?"They're trying to claim whatever they can from the rubble, my lady. "And the bolts?I can't see them happening anymore. "They disappeared my lady, that's the problem. "Problem?"It had appeared that most of the men and women, along with the inquisitor, had gathered at the far edge of the capital, where the farm had laid and looked upon the outer grounds. 'How such a thing might've happened baffles even the likes of me. There's no way someone could've taken them all in such a short time, without a notice. "What if they were alive inquisitor?"What might be the repercussions of that?'Asked another woman from the crowd. She was peeved about with the slightest thought of knowing. There wasn't any certainty of what might happen if wriggling beasts were still living after such a fight. Especially those of which had been horrendously disfigured. To think that such beasts might be able to walk on the free ground made for a dark story in this new chapter. People didn't need that, not now, not ever. For the likes of them were pampered and saved from it. 'Let's not think about it ma'am and rejoice that we're still alive. There's still hope which lays for a better future now despite having everything looking so bleak at this time. 'That fake smile couldn't do anything other than bother them. A second Inquisitor came as soon as he was done sulking. 'Move along, move along, there's nothing to see anymore now. Keep walking, there'll be the need for rebuilding and seeing for our rations later, so better save up your strength. 'Most complained, some already had walked away from the sight of him. A giant rounded man with a dark moustache turning grey just at a sight. 'I know how this looks, believe me, I could see it in their eyes as well. But until we raise up. "If we eve come to that point, though I doubt there'd be a chance against them if it came to another fight. "And the alternative being? Tell me, old preceptor, what would be better? Living in this hellish place where the sun can't even shine or dying in battle while trying to regain what was ours?" You're still too young to know and to properly understand. No matter how skilled you are and how well you think you could guide an army, there is none. These were, are people who weren't bred for this. The sky was never ours either, we were born here, generations before, breed for this exact purpose but refused to end the dream. Look upon this land, young man, it may be shallow and plain. Some might still lay here, but chances are that something might've survived somewhere around here and there, as scattered. It gives me hope to think of it this way, rather than the unnatural state we had been in while there. 'The younger man took a while to swallow it and realise just what it meant. Perhaps it would be that not he'll never see the sky ever again the way he had gone through, not in the same way at least. 'Houses would be mostly placed there, those would be the first to be repaired. A pale block of yellow, perhaps a dim of grey would suffice for this new land, I tell ya. 'A dream would've been, though nothing less of green fields and yellow skies would suffice. They were hard at adapting, without their king who locked himself, his guardians which left. Days passed as they were forced to eat whatever they could while working on the hour. It was harsh but plants were growing, even some of the cattle remained alive. Bridges were on the way, after all, the capital was still too many feet above the ground. Despite the bottom of the earth being so soft, it didn't appear to have swallowed anything of the structure. 'Well? What I did wrong?' 'The planks man, you've placed them wrong, they need to cross each other now. What's so hard to see? I've seen people doing it in during sleepless nights better than what you were attempting. 'One man was set as the main engineer in constructing the bridge, after all, it was to be set in a way of which it was connected to the main structure. By their work alone, they had been fast, having half of the bridge already extending, wood upon the metal frame. It appeared that perhaps such a thing was planned after all, just in case of it, the frame extended more than enough, to the point of shoving itself into the ground until it made contact. The rest had become labouring around. Whilst happening, the Inquisitors, at least the only two of them which had remained were looked as rather figures of might, supreme, perhaps even as saviours in the closest way. Neither looked as tainted or repulsive while on their horses while they looked down at the builders and the cleaners on the street. 'Maintaining the law, I presume?' 'Inquisitor, I'd never dare think otherwise. 'After which came the occasional bow from the man which was to be asked. 'Good, keep doing what you were previously doing. 'One thing still bothered, while checking on everything. Some things never changed, not even in such a time of waste which needed rebuilding. A look and one could see the same pattern, in the same alley which was left unclean. Long, had laid a trail of blood, where he came down and walked alone. Through it, he followed and looked at the handiwork of someone who apparently had never quit what he was doing. Written all along what remained of the walls were the names of the victims which he knew. 'Hellen, Mary, Bour, Vander. 'Before he hit the corner, he took out his helmet to look forth and have a better sight. It was a mistake to walk alone, though he recognised once he saw the guts and the list of even more names than he knew. 'He's still here. 'Remained his words, before he heard a voice calling from above. Despite his hearing and him readying himself to pull out the sword, there wasn't anything he heard. It struck him, from the vantage point of the decrepit old building. One small rock was enough to make the heavy man fall and never come back up from his stopper. Truly, it had to be one grim year that first which was to come. For the skies were even darker and the pit was still out there. Beyond of which it was still snowing, in a world without Tom. Where a killer had been coming and going, the town had long been abandoned once the inhabitants grew in fear of the ones which killed them one by one. Such a long road, had it been from town to town, and yet they spoke ill of that hole inside the mansion. A tainted curse, spoken from mouth to mouth, that it brought something no less than what would seem like a small group of soldiers to explore. Since it happened in his kingdom, white riding mares came trampling down the roads. Armed soldiers with muskets, small swords, daggers and pistols. Despite it having taken so long, by the time they have arrived and taken any notice, the town had looked like nothing short of a paganistic place of ritual. The hole which laid there, it had become a pit, growing even more as it lusted for as much as it was needed. From the looks of which, it had swallowed pieces of buildings, the entire mansion and a part of the dam wall which surrounded everything. Snow would've been no exception, rather than the cold which bred inside. 'What could this unholiness be?' 'It doesn't matter, our rulers had deemed it an affront to him and by extent humanity as a whole. We are to determine how dangerous it is before having it covered immediately. 'Though that was not all that they knew, more than one pit had fallen in their world. As a matter of fact, it had left the entire planet covered in dark patches. Yet, for those lost for so long in the pit, once the men had gone down from their horses, they readied themselves at last. Such an incubation period lasted at least until now, where they had been rejected entry to the other place. Men and women, guests which they had been suddenly raised themselves from the pit as people which were dark and gritty, more of the same substance which ran in the pit. A sudden shock made them form a line and shout. 'You're to stay there and not move unless you wish to be dealt with the immediate fire. 'The rows were formed in such a way that those in front were almost kneeling as they extended their arms. Those in the back were reaching forth and aimed at their heads, still spread farther than left and right. It didn't matter much for these new being which needed to remember what they were. A slime sort of which tried growing still. Despite not stopping, the man shouted. 'Fire, fire at once. 'An array of shots came as soon as they saw multiple other forms resembling humans coming out of the pit. More than ever, the holes which came immediately did more than slow it down. It had lost most of its human form, remaining nothing less than a sentient moving pool, a smaller pit which still appeared to be coming forth. 'There's something wrong with it, look, it's still moving towards us. 'Men, get ready to retreat, and bring a message to our landlord, this is something he needs to know. 'As fast as he announced, they had been paying much attention to what was said. Paying little mind to the creatures now, as slow as they might've been, the men got on their horses, leaving an array of cheap shots even as they made their retreat. It was quite the feat, landing a shot while going on a horse, though it wasn't as hard as it might've been. One would dare to look no further among them once they realised how relentless it had been before becoming useless. Time passed, absorbing the mass of the dead animals which had taken some of the fumes. Immediately after gulping most of it, they had taken mass and had grown to be entirely human yet again. Feeling no pain whatsoever but walking as if they were on their own. The cold never bothered, but holes into the hills. Most had already made their way to them, just to be able to hide. As this sudden loss of form was frightening, to say the least, now they were nowhere to be seen. From the distance, it was sure what was happening to the land. It looked as if it was indeed a pit, from a flat hole which it had started as the entire land was suddenly destabilised and pushed below. Despite that, they were warned. 'Turn back travellers, by the decree of our Lord, none may walk these roads. 'Return, unless you wish to bring misfortune to your family now. 'Warned another soldier, they had successfully managed to turn around a few travellers which might've ended in the darkest of places. A loathsome thing, both on this side and that of the other. While the soldiers were busy trying to make certain that no one would go and visit that mad place, don't blow the pit, on the other side it happened just as well. Small blobs of humans, supreme black, fell below, followed by the debris that had finally fallen. Such a conversion had been wicked and unnatural, that buildings had become something organic, that of which was akin to the other humans that fell from above. Now, though there had been no mountains and no tops of floating islands, as they fell below. Despite how much time had passed, nothing could make this easy to take, a blob-like building which appeared to have a shaking move. Soon the entire town would fall and position itself rightfully below, in the same position it had been. 'Well, what is it Eglasief?' 'My lord, we, we did as you ask, we have investigated the disturbance, the anomaly inside your kingdom. 'And what have you to report to me now?' 'It's been taken hold by some kind of mad thing which engorged the entire village and turned its people into wicked abominations. 'Very well, has it been purged then?' 'No, my lord, they seemed to still move even after being shot to the ground. Neither of which appear to die. And that is not all my lord, I think, that thing around there which swallowed the village, it's growing. I saw it even then with my own eyes, expanding the right to the point of having swallowed trees and even larger animals. 'Such a thought that it might've happened in his kingdom was rabid. To what extent, it made him want to go ahead and take it on himself. 'Well, now, you will go to the alchemist and make sure there's a way to purge this mad abomination you're talking about. 'Looking inside his court, there had been other lords and ladies who either looked repulsed or surprised by this new fact. To have them hear about this happening in my kingdom, disgraceful. 'That would be all. 'Yes my lord. 'With a bow, the man rushed straight through the court and down the halls, past the basement, into the alchemist's hidden cove. It had a strange look to it, in the manner of which it almost appeared to have plants growing into gorged stone. Neither did the fact that the wall had been broken to make way into the very stone which laid below the hold help. Nor the fact that he had discovered a river to his endless supply of water which was useful. 'Alchemist, we need your assistance. Your lord demands it. 'Shimmer down Eglasief, there's nothing to be alarmed about. I know what this is about, I've been announced. 'Before our lord? But how might this be? Give me a name now and whoever told you that first will be punished accordingly. 'Later, perhaps, but for now, he's done more than that, if you would so kindly sit and observe. 'As damp and dark as this place had been, there was a small lamp which stood there lighting some of it. 'In this small pair of tubes, I've got most of the bodily fluid which apparently accumulates into the abominations you've encountered. 'But that couldn't have been now, I've made sure that all of my soldiers followed immediately, neither of which came into contact with those creatures now. 'Now, now, there's no need to be alarmed, nothing's going on behind your back. 'Doubtfully so, he looked at the process and how it boiled, the sluggish thing started rotting inside of it, until the least he realised that it might've hated either fire or heat. 'So fire should purify that thing we found there?' 'No, captain, it isn't fired alone, as you might've thought, as you were busy skulking above, I've already managed to do some experiments with it. Fire and heat alone won't even affect it unless most of its composition is changed into salt. 'It meant what it meant, to say the least, there wasn't enough salt for the pit from which they spawned about. 'Unless our Lord has access to the entire resource of salt this world has, I don't see how he might fare. 'These words were carried over, mouth to mouth, until they reached him, looking unbound. He looked half as mad as he was insulted. 'What do you mean there's no other way? Should I wait for my land to be taken by some tar which refuses to have itself knelt under me?' 'My lord, that's what he said. "I know what he said and I want you to go back down there and make him work on something else which would have this problem resolved. And bring some more men to shake him a bit if that's necessary. 'Past the wooden gates they went, four more men, ready to force him in case that was needed after all. There wasn't any other chance anyone might've prevented, though a tough chain reaction appeared to have happened. An alchemist, the only one, laid with his head against the table, covered in that black slimed, which had tied itself around his head as well. From the looks of it, he was to suffer. 'Wait, wait, don't use your swords yet. He said something about salt, bring it as fast as you might, go to the damn kitchen if you have to. Damn it, man, why did you have to do this?' 'I can't. "Speak louder if you want me to hear you. 'Despite his request, he approached the alchemist with a slight fear and distrust. 'I can't feel my other half of the face, it's pulling at me now, I know it is. There's nothing on the other side of the pit. "What happened, you need to tell me what happened so we might help you. "A concoction, it reacted strangely after I tested it. I can't keep on like this, you need to please, just push. 'He was desperately trying to reach the knife at his belt, despite knowing that he was still needed. 'No, not yet, there are still others that need your help. 'No sympathy was on the man as he made way for those four that brought a wooden bucket filled with salt. As much as he thought it through, he only grabbed a fist and dropped the salt on top of the table where that oozing thing laid. A splash sounded still as he was released. Bearing only half of his face, he fainted, looking bloody tainted for the likes of which he lost an eye, half of his face, though his skull might've been spared. He was immediately taken to the nurse and was readied for an immediate intervention. Shocked and appaled by the sight of a man who had his face melted, covered in salt, blistering on his wounds, he was left there as they returned. 'Make sure the table is covered in salt. And that nothing else lays around which might've been contaminated. The least of it in a tube had done that to the poor man. 'Something which would haunt him for the rest of his life. Regardless of which, it maddened the lord even more at the sound of which he shouted. 'You will take care to send as many moles, pigeons and crows as you can. I want everyone beyond my land to know what we're dealing with. Call the archiver while you're at it, for we may declare what we might. "And what if they invade us, my lord?" 'They can go ahead and try, we'll be prepared to defend our hold as fiercely as we might. Now that the entire kingdom is under threat by this newly discovered thing, we may have an excuse to excuse ourselves from caring of the peasants. 'Of course, the hall was empty, without a doubt, leaving the conversation only between the two of them, the lord and his most trusted commandant. Each went their way, after excusing himself, for the night was grim, the pit was expanding, pieces of it dropped below as to make way. But even further than this, for which they prepared, in the mountains, one resigned. It pushed itself and made it so, that the mansion was still ruined, and another man had died. 'Well, as I was saying, my name is Pond, I'm pleased to have made acquaintances with you. "Well only take a moment now, if you won't mind. 'The place had never looked worse, despite not growing in size, this pit had grown in the head, almost to the point of boiling the rainwater which might've dropped through the tracks, and melting the pieces of the window which laid unkempt. Fires were soon to start, and it had even happened for nails to get so hot that they fell through and made way for the structure to fall even further into the pit. Regardless of the condition and the unexplainable, it had been time for him to answer. 'Sir, do you know why we have come here?' "No, I don't suppose, you've come to help me with. . . "Please, don't make any sudden movements, for the time being, we've only come to ask some questions. 'As menacing as he were a holder by his side, he understood rather well why they were there. 'What may I ask, you've come here for?' "We're only investigating the disappearance of a couple of persons you've recently come into contact with. To be more precise about it, there are two or three detectives at least, who came here after having received a letter of invitation and were never seen again. 'Are you here to ask questions?' "Damn pigs won't even know their tails from where a real problem might come from. 'Well, I'm sure we could. "That's not all, sir, we've found out that your bank had frozen all your funds and that you have been previously accounted for tax evasion. That not being the only thing, as I may cite you as a prime suspect in the previous case. ' They came and spoke of accusations, one case after another, blasting as his life came apart. 'This man went missing, so did he. This and that, them as well. 'He was shown pictures, that of which he recognised as well as he bit his tongue. But Pond was afraid to admit that they had all vanished in the same circumstance, at least, the one of which each and everyone was concerned. Neither of them had shown a sign of concern about the pit. 'It wasn't me, it was. "We are aware of this explanation you've given, though the court had called you on trial. "Under what authority?" "We have a warrant, not that it's required for the likes of it. 'It was clear that up there in the ruins above the pit laid clothes which were tapped, caught into the sharp pieces of the wooden planks and windows. Both of the officers were prepared to use force in case any resistance was displayed. 'Could I at least get my notes in order and my carrying bag?" "You won't be needing it anymore, sir. 'The cold harshness never bothered him more than it did now. It was at least a combination of a tainted thing that bore through combined with a desire to escape. 'Well, I'll make sure then. 'Now, that he saw where he lay, as the files, they had brought, the pictures and whatever proof they might've called was only for the show, the point and tell. 'You still don't understand, sir, you are under arrest for the murders of. 'Their names rang one after another, as misery went by. Each and everyone bore a single thing of regret which might've made him wish he wasn't born. 'No need to force me off my property. "It was your property sir. 'Though now it became apparent that his partner had a tongue as well. 'This now belongs to the state, seeing how the bank confiscated your last funds and your current condition. Whatever lay on your property most likely will be taken down until the toxicity is taken care of. It thought it might've been obvious enough. "But I'm innocent, they can't take everything I. Have. 'They fit nicely within his wrist, as much as he bore resentment, he looked behind before being taken. It was then that he realised that he had lost. Lost to the system and that damn pit that fell from the sky one dreadful night. 'You won't be able to take care of it. No one in this world can! I'm the only one that's able to deal with it I tell you. "Whatever you say, sir may be used in the court. 'And what else came after as he was taken from the gates. He hadn't realised it until he went on the other side but both streets were filled to the brink. The entire town had come to witness his arrest. It wasn't only that they watched but made photos and wanted to ask questions. As a matter of fact, never had it happened for such an array of people to be present in his path. Resentment was bored through him now. He couldn't help but shout at it in his last moments of freedom. "That pit it curses, it will boil you all and devour all. I'm innocent, I tell you, innocent!" His shouting stopped once he noticed a figure which closely resembled his wife. That was how he went on ahead and was taken to the state department. The trail went on the same day and already he was set guilty and sent to the chair. It became apparent he had become delusional in the last moments of his life. Now that he had become aware of that force which was staring him through, he couldn't do anything but laugh at the thought. As the pit would devour them all, one by one until each and everyone was done. Pond Wick had died that day, after seconds. Where his property had been now laid giant rakers taking care to crush whatever house he might've built in the time there. While still, the pit had boiled most of the structure around the house in the coming weeks. One glance from the distance would've revealed the fact that there wasn't any house there anymore. Past it, again the snow, the cold mountains bore those dark humans there now. From a different place they had come but even that of which was crushed came to life. Soon, the insides of the mountain would come to be converted. Bird and smaller creatures apparently had stumbled upon the same curse as they have. "Well. The landlord began. 'Under the current assessment, I am unsure about what's to be done. Perhaps it is to keep as a punishment for what we've done, our world had to be swallowed inside a pit, as they say. 'Each of his subjects nodded and looked in dismay.

The candles did light up the room but their hopes were even less than nothing. A fly might've burnt itself and appeared more like a beacon of hope that any single one of them had. "Well, I'm certain that you're sure of it by now, but I've come to the realisation that I must be the one at fault here. I've come to underestimate this entire thing and became too sure on myself until this problem came to mind. "My lord, you mustn't. "No, no, it's all right now, I just realised, as I was announced by the others that there'd be no help that I shouldn't have expected anything from them. It is a punishment, perhaps for me not taking pity and good care of my people like a master of the land would. As this is the reason why I must demand of you forgiveness and pity in this day of misfortune and ill fate. 'If only he could see himself in the most humble moment he'd be seen. From the letter he received, by the time he had got through half, he realised what was the situation all around. His neighbours had to deal with the very same situation now for a very long time. Neither was he the first nor was he going to be the last to face such misfortune. As much as he disliked the idea, he declared. "There's nothing we can do against those pits that formed or fell, we've only got to count our last moments and hope for the best. 'He said a bitter tone, but no resolve. The inhabitants were appaled and shock at the sight of the pits, not to mention that they refused to stand and do nothing. It was a rather dark invasion, which had come unannounced. But one of which had made it through the other world, a single dark gate which made a connection. It was relentless to think of the world and its people while they lived in such a world. Tainted to the girth while bearing their own marks, it was the time for them notice what was going on. People who lived for ages long did notice it but couldn't complain. For them, at least, it was just another grimness about the world, a dark star in the sky, if you may. Even farther than it went, they say, another pit was summoned by the likes of a temple from the depths. It called upon another to fall, and as it turned out, in their beastly chants in worked. Alas, another dark circle had fallen from the sky, no less, than it had fallen upon a piece of the tainted land. Swallowing the mist, it pierced, those things, the giant husk of a wriggling beast, it missed. Though despite every attempt each parasite had made to make it well, the darkest pit had fallen. It almost managed to burst into an eruption from the mere pressure that came outside. Now, that the sound and violent heat and pressure came, none could deny. At least no one who came forth to explore. 'What would that be?' One man from the small group had asked. They were four, dressed in blue, carrying a single flag with the symbol of the capital. At the moment of which they noticed, the entire ground structure had crumbled and shook under the pressure. Even someone who might've once been a human felt that and looked around. His shackles grew weaker and his resolve was approaching. Smaller tribes had decided to come forth, alarmed at the sight of the men as well. 'Wait, wait, we mean no harm. We've come here to check upon that which made all of that nasty sound. "So have we. 'Yelled the man back. Despite their differences, each of their elected leaders approached, while the rest of them had looked in awe. Judging by what they've said to one another and how they dealt with the situation, each of them peered into the other one's soul. 'I don't know what it is, but had ever been right about this place, to begin with. "You're new here, from far away, right?" "How'd you tell?" 'I've seen others, acting strangely, such as yourselves. Wearing different clothes, acting strangely, having a smell that doesn't belong to this place. "Such as what smell are you implying I'd bear upon me?" "The kind that belongs to green verdure and of grass. That of which doesn't grow here, not that it would matter now. 'As they had both noticed, something was terribly wrong about that thing. It had violently shaken to the point of small blobs having hovered through the air and vanished without a trace. Despite that, they had decided that getting too close was too dangerous. 'I shall inform the nearest command on the capital. I've no doubt that you were thinking of doing the same thing if it came to it. 'The man nodded and looked mightily surprised. He had expected something worse to come out of the man, but seeing how they shook hands, they had been both. Another thought ended as a great shadow had come. Despite how much farther from them it might've landed, the likes of the taint had borne a beast down from the sky. Its tainted hide was covered in that black slime which bore it through the clouds and sky, until its magnificent death in the distance. 'How could this possibly be?" "This requires further looking into, I don't suppose you'd be willing to join us now, would you?" "My people's safety comes first. I am Noches, leader of the Dawn Struck hold. "Pleasure to meet you Noches, I am Charles Montego. 'They shook hands and nodded, each making a sign for their representatives to come forth. It was a long way by foot, but they had set themselves as worthy of going forth for such a task. Despite as hard as it might've appeared to have been, this was to be the strangest thing. A coincidence to say the least. No one had dared to cross the path until the time came by when the pit had fallen, swallowed by the earth itself. From the likes of which, the area around it had almost pulled and pushed dirt in its place, forming something of a dome above. It was boring right until it had reached the desperate point across the temple, of which it brought to ruin as it pushed itself forth and melted through. Such was the beast's wails, that they came to bear resentment at the pit. Despite their own doing, they have become mad and enrage, throwing themselves at the dark circle and bearing through them nothing else than pain and misfortune. It was to be the only one which made it through, now that the one in the sky was being purged. The beast had taken notice and began to strike their bolt of lightning, as hard as they might. It was a pointless thing they did since neither of them had succeeded in closing the gap. Perhaps it wasn't the time for a flood to come, at least not one as such as it appeared. Pointless as it was, the beasts had failed, their bolts just fell through aimlessly being absorbed, to the point of never having it made on the other side. Nevertheless, they tried, and once again, from time to time, one just flew just below the sky. Under the pit, it came to be, that another piece of it fell through. It cut one of the wriggling beasts in two halves though as it fell, the maws shrieked in disgust and pain. Luckily for the men which had come to explore, they had realised only now what was happening above. 'Be careful men, there comes another!' One shouted as they spread around. None desired to be caught and put on the ground, especially under such a thing as well as it bounced. 'Another one died, what could this possibly mean?' 'I don't know but we can't stand and find out, it's way too dangerous now. 'Wise words have never been spoken, as they charged back, to their surprise, the pit disappeared, almost like a mirage. 'Should we explore through the mist?' 'No, you wouldn't want to encounter that now, not after what you've gone through. Go warn your people if you might. "Come with me Noches, they need to know that we're not alone down here. "I can't abandon my people now, not while this is happening to us. "At least, let me give you something to remember. 'Charles ripped out a piece of his red scarf, which laid right under his cuirass. It wasn't exactly the most generous motion, ripping it apart, but it got the point though. 'Just remember to visit us, at the capital. They'll know what you mean when you see this as there's only one place from which this type of material could've been. "I promise, Charles, we'll meet again, take care of yourself. 'The two of them shook hands before they went their separate ways. Another fight had shaken the sky and each fall had made the ground shake even further than before. Pity, that it came to blow, now that the earth was against those who roamed under it. By the time the being is formerly known as Tom, as well as the others, Balstar and Augur were ready to escape, a tragedy happened, if not mercy at best. The ground, as it shook lashed at him, and threw, a small spear made of stone, thick and mighty, it even shone. Tom hadn't any chance to move his head, with all the thoughts which had left him so confused as he was. It went right through his head and ended his motor functions, crushing even whatever functions those rods might've given him. Without hands but legs and a rotting young lad, the two of them were stuck like that to wait. By the time someone would get to notice, the sponge had already spread across and filled his face, eating and growing, to the point when, after days, it spat out the spear. Now, there wasn't any escape for the blind men who were to suffer. Agony, yet, was still to come, now that their tainted ritual had failed, the construct destroyed and whatever remained of them jumped into the pool. Others had gotten to the other side, dumb creatures which looked mightily confused. The land was grey as if ashes hid whatever laid around. Even the pit was placed against a wall, that it refused to touch the pieces below. It felt as if each piece of ash just cut through meat, almost to the point when they were comparatively as sharp as small knives. Despite not feeling pain, the creature was bothered by it, and how its sheer size didn't help it at all. The chamber in which was it didn't even permit the pit to expand as it had done it in the previous worlds. Yet a voice called it, in this bleak world. Once it arrived at the door, by the time it had managed to reach it, so much of its legs had cuts, bruises and were exposed to the bone for infections. A grunt made its body shiver, having not known fear until that point where, despite its dumbness, instincts kicked in. It opened the door with its sheer might, to a long corridor, filled with rooms. As much as it had been confusing at first, this wasn't as such. Rather than anything, it has appeared something like the temple it had come through. Before leaving, as such, it left the door open, and another two beats had made it through the pit. Momentarily, they processed what was happening and followed the open door. Most doors were locked, by the sight of them, alone. A luring thing made the whole structure shudder once the three of them were down the corridor, as their weight far exceeded what was to be the limit. It broke at the end as they approached, each of them grabbing a piece of the wall to stop themselves from falling through whatever crevice it might open. But then again, it was too late once the walls had cracked and they fell through. A world which made no sense, with many of those small compact halls which laid self-contained on top of one another. They had just enough of a weight limit that one fell through and made a hole, while the others managed to knock themselves in different directions. Such emptiness laid around that it looked as if there wasn't any sun in that world. Yet, they found themselves, each being in a different hall, with a set of different doors. Even a scream came forth when then most peculiar creature had observed its arrival. Intimidating it once more, it had confused the structure it was in with the temple it had to guard. From the moments they arrived, it had become apparent that they went back and forth, stuck that way. There wasn't any telling why the holes in the ceilings grew back, or why it was that they guarded the place, though it happened without question. Without a doubt, it had become apparent, with so many more of them making, that this was to be their hellish realm. With each having been stuck in a prison of their own, the other doors around them were locked. No sounds came and definitely no sign of a prisoner came from the likes of it. This was to be their end. At last, it pushed itself, as well, following the sound or what they heard and could tell. The pain came, but the two of them moved. It was a pity that they hadn't realised either that atop of them they carried what had been known as Tom, despite trying to cover as much ground as they might. No light. A rumbling sound came from below, a bag of moisture that almost resembled skin prevented either of them from even daring to speak or to attempt it. Yet, some feeling drew them still, to that place, the black pit, at which place was mostly abandoned by now. The ancient holds were left unguarded, now that they carried on without their grand treasure. Nonetheless, guided by the sounds and vibrations, it was easy to feel it pulsate there. Neither Balstar nor Augur was aware of one another. As a matter of fact, they hadn't even known that they were humans anymore from the likes of it. One abomination finally jumped it. It felt as if they had become some sort of an aquatic creature which could freely swim inside the pit despite its supreme show of violence. That stopped immediately once they fell on the other side. Two pairs of legs just went on ahead and walked forth on the ground. From the way it felt, both of them recognised the vibration of various plants, almost to the point of seeing them without having eyes. Regardless of what was to happen, both were going to starve. At least, it was something to be proud of, making it on the other side, feeling softness under their feet. Walking under great structures which became apparent only because they were just near the plants. Even though it wasn't as far away as one would've thought it'd be, this came at least, to the point to see. A grave, or small soft spot, square and covered in plants. Such likes neither men had ever felt, but as they fell inside of it, there were no regrets whatsoever. It lashed inside and became almost rabid from the likes of it, as it started eating the sponge and what remained of that of which kept them alive. Both Balstar and Augur, Tom as well, ended up right in from of the founder's statue. Tainted, dirty and abandoned for the likes of which, no one would glance or try to show anything short of the misery they thought they'd deserve. 'Look at those abominations. 'A sound which suddenly woke the dead. Despite longing for release, it was almost as if the entire thing was a dream. There were no plants in the small crevice, and though there was little to no activity in Tom's head, there was a slight sentience which made it that he lifted himself up. Both men had done the same, climbing just so that they'd avoid being buried inside. 'Do you think they're dangerous?' Came another shocking whisper. Could they have recognised the fact that they were welded together? No, it was something else, another beast had followed and managed to get through. Despite being smaller and having less hair, the sight of them, the smell and the presence the sponge had made it so he wouldn't be attacked. Rather than that, it was a better thing that he was seen that way, now having it come through, he was being helped. It took one sudden attempt for the rage to course through the men as they felt that small body against them after a short chase. He had no time, and despite the struggle, he was crushed from every imaginable corner. The flail was hard to miss but it didn't help him in the end. What might've been a man had shouted. 'Let go of me, don't do it, don't!' Though as they started going through the guts, it felt as if they had all been placed in the wrong place. On a sudden lighter note, a pain in their gut had made them both aware. With a sudden pull from below the ribs, they pulled out what felt like a sponge filled tube, which was pushed, almost instinctively inside of their victim's body to feed themselves. It felt close to have an orgasm only by the simple act of having fed the entire organism. A few feet away, judging by the dangling plant, they felt the beast waiting for them to be done. A sudden notice and they realised that someone smaller was watching from behind the crossed walls. They had previously guarded themselves against predators, but these types of predators were new, even for them. Harder to look at, that was certain, by Tom's face alone, as a matter of fact.

Half-ruined and rotten, it had received its share of the food they had managed to get through. It looked as if something inside that skull if it wasn't already cleaned by the sponge moved. Though the lad was still as blind, mute and half-deaf and the ones below of him. One a moment's notice, it was finally time to move, at least now that they were done, they pushed it back and had already grown in bulk. What was left behind them was a sick tormented body which had no nutrients whatsoever? A sight never to be looked upon. They carried on and walked through it. Despite having little of their senses left, it felt as if the thickness of the air, or rather, the atmosphere around them made the illusion of swimming in the water. Without being able to lift off the ground, being as heavy as they were, they made peace with the thought. Strangely, they appeared to have something which was bird-like related, judging by the sounds. The noises coming out of their crooked beaks became ever more distorted as they approached. Closer and closer, to the point of awe. Neither of them had any knowledge of the fact that they were being watched. As the walls became apparent as they approached, another thing came to their notice. It was the fact that they had shallow holes left through, hundreds of them, to be more precise. As much as they might've thought of climbing, that would've been the hardest thing with four clumsy legs. Past him passed the other one and decided to do it as well, though it gave no thought whatsoever after hearing the sounds of whispers and of the people speaking as they ran on walls. 'He's coming, I saw it with my eyes. "They're dangerous, both of them, get ready to drop them as they come.

'Upon a quarter of the wall which was easily achieved by the size alone, he had another thing coming. All that fur and rotten bodies in the world couldn't help once the long sharp root-like needles came flying against it. 'A direct hit, keep going, it's not likely he's going to give up now. 'They spoke as they knew, throwing piece after piece, which acted like a dark weapon with its small venom sack. How much more could he have taken? It was a question that got quickly answered from the looks of it, seeing how venom pulsated inside by the second. An arm fell off, even surprising Balstar and Augur by the moment it happened. 'The other one, what's it doing now?' They observed them as well but made no move towards attempting to slay or to end the other. Such a tube, long tainted after all, that after the beast fell off and couldn't move, it seemed as if the sponge had a solution. It pushed itself back out and into the entry which laid on its side, where the armhole might've been. From the horrible looks, they were ready to go for another round of striking at them before finishing them off. Though it wasn't as if he was going to be healed. That tube started pulling everything until in moments there wasn't any meat left inside. Just a few rods and an empty fur coat laid on the ground. What came next was something which had shaken the looks on the watchers even more. Tom still had arms which suddenly worked, grasping the fur just to cover up for the cold. A perfect fit, as they might say, came at last. Not surprising whatsoever that it bore the frightening look of a beast, keeping the sponge warm and what not. At this point in time, he looked like them, acted as such and turned around to walk past the wall. There had to be an entry and as long as he didn't start climbing he wouldn't be attacked. 'What's he doing now?' Follow, follow, before it takes notice. You saw what he did to him. 'Neither of which had heard nor have they discovered the previous bodies left behind. Many more came from those who were left below. Old men, sitting, which proved to have provided no resistance whatsoever. For some reason, they refused to attack them despite sitting still and waiting for any sort of response. Nothing. 'Come at us, you lousy fur thing, we're waiting for you!' The more they ignored the vibrating sounds, the better it became, though they were aware that it was humans making that sound. Soon the fur coat was abandoned as they entered the inner thicket, even having the sponge rejecting the feel it bore. Cold water ran down as he cowered at the strong extreme. Such a feeling of cold almost reminded them of winter.

Though as they entered the inner circle of water, there were still walls around and soon they were surrounded. People living there had free access to everything in sight. It around even more of a thing once they saw how putrid the water had become after dipping inside of it. 'Get away, now, go!' That thing's trying to get to our reserve of water, make it stop now. 'Once again, the ordeal with the tube came at last, though instead of sucking, it bore some of the guts out which couldn't be digested. Whenever or not it was something they had gnawed upon or they were either Balstar or Augur's guts, none could tell. As well as this continued, the water was indeed filled with a muck specific to the sponge. 'Attack it already, before it ruins everything, can't you see that this tradition is only going to bring us ruin?' Shut up, it's what we must do. 'We don't need to keep the tradition of it means bringing us closer to our destruction. That isn't right, it ain't right at all. 'You would ruin hundreds of year of tradition just to satisfy your own disgust?' I will do anything to protect the people and their needs. 'Splashes came at last as he jumped and readied himself to charge at them. Such it was that the ripples in the water gave out his position as he came. Those feeble arms suddenly came to a newfound strength as he came just in reach. His head was turned to face the stream of water and he floated in a pool of red. 'Why did you have to do this? You damn oaf!' There would be pain and mourning later now, that he was done. It became apparent to everyone that one of the water sources was ruined in front of their eyes. The next one that would try going against them wouldn't be as fortunate as that man. It wasn't a maze, as a matter of fact, despite having no plans to guide them they made it through somehow. 'We're sure, they're trying to make it for our food supply, if we cannot attack it, we need to drop the gate. 'Apart from what was said, there was a sudden slam on the door, steps from where they laid. It was a pity to look upon this senseless thing, though it wasn't to take long, not now since there came two others. Despite everyone being focused on the three of them, the beasts had initiative and followed the smell of a former shell which laid on the ground. With a mighty push, they both had the wall fall on the ground. Its sound echoed as they made their way until they came to the point of finding the various people who walked nimbly on top of them. Something made them avoid climbing the walls now, either the fact that they had weapons of their sheer size. They had been bigger than any other iteration which had ever been seen or felt. But no witness laid for such a tainted remark to take place. It came fast that they reigned terror and slammed their bodies against the various walls. As they fell the men shouted. 'Take the children and the women and walk away, make it to the crossroads now, we'll take of them. 'Despite the tears, the maidens knew there wasn't anything else which could be done. As much as they wanted to help, they glanced at those who fell on the ground and fought for their lives. Striking with those small sacks to no avail. It appeared as if the skin they had been trying to penetrate was far too thick for anything to pierce it. Such a dark thing had happened that day that a man threw a sting from above. Despite being an act of desperation, heads were turned by those in their community. The darkened sky reflected in their small black dome, and it was as if the night came at last. A disturbing thing to run in the dark, though the roads ahead were not lost in memory. 'Come, we need to make it before the dome closes us in with them. 'Hunger, cold and fright would come now that the rule was broken, all by the stupidity of a single member of theirs. Not long after he slipped in the dark and found himself grabbed by the head. It was as fast as it came now that his head was crushed and he was thrown away. Despite his last attempt, those who were closest to the dark scene had noticed that it wasn't them that killed him as they ripped his body apart and threw him away. He died long before he was taken by the head, with a sting inserted into his own gut, right before seeing them get ready to take him away. An end to his suffering by his own hand. Now that he was dead, they continued, even to the shrieks of beasts. There wasn't anyone to stop the hands of Tom from tearing the wall apart and trying to get his hands on those piglets, or the things which sounded as similar. It was a hole which bore torment and as he came in, the slaughter began. To no end had they watched in tear, as those poor animals were tormented but not slain. A piece of him made small incisions, after all, the hole which they have made wasn't big enough for them to escape after. From the looks of which, it was just thin enough so that he'd get a chance to do what he was driven to. He inserted into those small cuts, pieces of the sponge which had kept him alive. Soon they'd grow and pull in all the water which laid inside their fat bellied bodies before the blood soon was to be devoured. On a sudden note, a younger man yelled. 'I won't let you destroy everything. 'He leapt below in the middle of the beasts, barely startling them than he had startled himself, and cut Tom across the face. As he backed away from the sudden realisation of pain, which he shared with both of the others, the man took the opportunity to grab a pair of small pigs and leap back unto the wall. He hadn't realised what had happened, nor what was inside of them by now, though he managed to get away. It was by his scent alone now that he was ignored by those other guardians, which he passed by. As rotten as they were, the memory of their encounters still managed to find its way into their brains. Just as small pulling strings which they had borne. But no, these ones were relentless, without knowledge of what had happened or where they have been, one could point out that there was nothing like anything ever documented about. Giant, monstrous, wicked and repulsive, even their limbs felt like slithers, even the fur felt like it had small sharp needles hidden inside. Worst of all was the fact that they bore a strong resentment for any other living creature around. Going ahead, more tried saving their animals but stopped at the sight. As soon as a guardian came, it pushed its hand and slammed it atop of the animals, instantly ending them by its strength alone. One disgusting glance and those nearest to it went on a flight. By the time the women and children had fled with a few men behind them which had borne some of the stock, the dome was already had to get through. 'Will we abandon the rest?' 'Those who aren't already dead will have a hard time getting past it now. I'm sorry but there's nothing else we can do about it until the deed is forgiven. 'One last look behind and they fled into the wild. In truth, there wasn't any stopping to this torment of theirs, regardless of how hard they tried, the dome began to manifest. First, it came to be such as a bubble, then it dried to the point of changing form. The round shape had become steep and straight, a prison which forced everything inside to change as well. Walls were straighter, so were the limbs, even the eyes and many objects on the ground. On a sudden rock which had been thrown from somewhere outside, this prison just bent a little, as did all the things inside it.

Forgetfull of everything, they didn't feel any different, other than the fact that their limbs moved a lot more mechanical, even bent a joint. 'No, this can't be happening now. "It's already too late for us!"Make it for the wild groove, hide wherever you can. 'Even they had noticed how the guardians were confused as well, unable to do much anymore from the sheer depravity of their form. Each strand of hair had taken the strange shape and as they rubbed against one another, they vibrated directly to the ears. A shape of madness, one of fear, but at least they shed no tears. It took a while to adapt, for those who weren't blind. But something was to strike at their senses, once a strike of air had come. It bent the entire dome again, to the point of being stretched and seeing everything too warped into a direction. Worst of all is that they felt as far as they were concerned, just how far they went. That supreme distortion. 'End it, please, I cannot take it anymore. 'Another of had taken his life, seeing how he kept on cutting and cutting, only to slit his own throat. While the pain came, he was still alive, and just as others watched, that throat couldn't be entirely reached by the sheer distance alone. He had a resentment for himself, for halfway through, the man had changed his mind. By the time he dropped the weapon and tried covering his throat with his arms, it was too late. Everything was going worse, their attempted escape, the animals, even the water had gone into a secret damned place where it shouldn't have gove. This sudden push had managed to crush the earth, right into swallowing the small river which provided the last untouched source of water. Chasing one by one, the guardians stopped confused, unable to catch anyone either. 'Make for the depths, before we die of thirst!"No, don't listen to that fool, we'll be trapped and buried alive. 'Before he could warn them, eight or ten had already made it down there, thinking they'd be better. Without knowledge of the fact, the dome corrected this anomaly and reformed to its previous form.

As the man said, there weren't any screams when it happened for the dirt to be placed back where it belonged. Desperately, he tried to dig but the dirt had gotten too thick for his hands alone. In tears, as he watched, there wasn't anyone around. 'Why did you have to do this now?We could have waited, we could have hoped. 'Though there wasn't any response. As he places his ear against the ground and pushed himself up, it was time he heard their desperate cried. Looking back at the hallway, he realised. 'It's coming to me now. 'No strength left in his knees, just a matter of fact, he wouldn't dare move any longer but stand still and hope for the best. There's no way it can see me past its blindness. Those eyes were clean shut, to the point of dripping whatever white thing had been growing inside. By the time it approached, it paused at the edge of the entrance. Despite having looked for another source of water to contaminate, there wasn't anything anymore. One step and the man shivered as he saw the creature stopped. No water here just gets away. Either he was expecting something to snap at him or salvation. His eyes were still distorted with determination. Though the small pieces of stone which fell from its side while it hanged its hand against one of the walls didn't help in elucidating the wrath of the dome, he peered at it. Such a strange thing, particles, specks which were affected by this sudden distortion. With his fear alone, to die, he couldn't help it but examine the creature and wonder what was the reason behind its macabre appearance. Nonetheless, his thoughts were dry now, as it walked away, at the sounds of someone shouting. There had been others in the hiding. 'Hey, hey, are you in there?No, there's no need for you to move now, just shake your hate, I'll know it. 'Suddenly aware of the presence of another right around the other room, he noticed how he started from a small square hole. His eye would've been the perfect fit if it were for it to bulge out of his skull. 'You needn't come any closer now, we can't risk being seen together. "What. What happened to the others? Are they alive? I've heard shouting though I don't know whenever or not there's anyone else stuck in here. 'There wasn't any peace of mind as the rain came now. The man responded immediately, as he was busy tying a knot. 'Here, I think you should have it. I saw you running and the moment when you dropped it. 'A small sack of that strong toxin was thrown just in his hands. 'I don't think it'll be of any use to defend myself now. These things don't seem to have any effects on them whatsoever. "I didn't return this back to you only to defend yourself and I am sure that you know what needs to be done. 'It was a good throw from one side to another, which distracted the man from what he expected to be done. Despite the fact that most of the people he'd known either fell or escaped this prison, there was still a desire to live. 'Look, at the top of our prison. 'This taint which befell on them was almost maddening. The raindrops suddenly started affecting the prison in a way which made their bodies and everything around them melt. A cumulative thing to be sure of it, which made him entertain the thought of self-impalement. 'Not until those things are dead. What if they keep coming?"They'll be trapped like the rest of us. Even if a legion of them arrives from the depths, they can rot here from all I care. "Don't you think that they'll break through eventually? There had to be a way out. "The only way out for us now is death, you know it. Either at their hands or ours. Must you wait to be buried alive like the others? Or perhaps have the strong wind just push your skin directly into the edge of the sting?"The thought occurred, though they both fell unto the ground, on their knees or on their backs. It appeared as if there was a patrol going on the road, from one side to another. Walking didn't do anything to stimulate the desire he had in his bones. Clearly, this was painful, having his bodily fluids and organs be pushed by the rain. Yet he thought the worse would still happen. Neither of them had the possibility of getting up any longer, at least not until the guardians went away. The more they inspected the two bodies, the more dangerous it had appeared to have been. Soon, their skin would be pulled inside the ground and become such a fertiliser would've been. Without a doubt, there was nothing to be worse than that, especially since it had already begun. Inches of their faces, through at different rooms altogether, begun entering the ground. Don't scream or they'll notice you're alive. Wait for it, wait. And there came the lucky break as those beats couldn't stand it either, at least now that they were both aware of the constant need of walking. Their deformed heads almost came to be in the shapes of cylinders or cones, at least with the help of the rain. 'It's safe to get up now. 'He said, feeling a slight impulse of pain. It didn't matter what was going to happen now, that the hole had changed its shape as well, not to mention the size. But the man had given up on life, which was certain. His body had already spread into a puddle in the dirt when suddenly rain stopped and out came the sun. This horror hadn't stopped any longer. Through he could feel whole again and unchanged, he saw the permanent damage which was inflicted. In front of him laid a broken wall, with a view of the other side which revealed the other man. A puddle which attempted to smile, in its pain, unable to walk or do anything other than watch. From the looks of it, even those parts in his throat which made the speech had disappeared. 'I'm so sorry for this, I should've known. 'While making sure no one would see to it, he looked at his hand and realised that he was just as damaged as him. His right hand had become a hook of sorts, with the toxin sack barely attached to it. There weren't any fingers yet he could move the sharp tip. Going by the tip of his toes, he walked around and managed to see that the man wasn't even able to look at him, regardless of the position. At least, this would be mercy. 'This has to end like this, I'm sparing you of a life of misery in this form. 'No doubt laid about the fact that the man would've most likely continued his life in one way or another if he were to be kept alive. Nonetheless, a sharp stinger in the face and finally he closed his eyes. The release felt sweet, at least injecting someone with venom had something bitter and ecstatic which soon followed. His face felt numb. 'I am Johan, the first of them. I know I am. 'Was this, the thing he was seeing in front of his eyes the devastation of the cage?The sudden rush of ecstasy in his body said otherwise. It felt rather good for him to see everything blend and change in many flashing colours as he freely walked from his hiding. Screams of his friends and family reigned everywhere around. Much of the pain Tom had felt was brought now, in the darkest of places, where he wasn't even aware where they laid. He had just done killing another woman who had failed to escape. As a matter of fact, those who were left behind had either been crippled or were the older men with nothing to provide for their future. But to come to such a pain. His body had been dwarfed by the rain, and now they were even more interconnected. It was a curse which had tainted the bone structure in a way that three rib cages were combined, even thinner by the looks of it. Perhaps it was the damn sponge, but Tom's ribs had penetrated both the skulls of Balstar and Augur, finally ending their reign of the body. Ending the confusion, he had a strange effect on his own, having the entire control over a single four-legged body. Blindly, he felt around, as if having grasped hold of some lost relic of humanity which bore itself blindly back to light. Was that the sound of a child crying?Here and now after everyone else had managed to escape?The bestial vigour wanted to force him by its will, to end that damned noise and move on. It was just around the wall, into the inner entrance by the tainted closure. By the likes of getting closer, it wasn't any baby, but a child, closer to the age he had. A girl to be more precise, of which memories ran through, it brought something which he did not know. At least, not now, not anymore, not at a time like this. It couldn't have been that he woke up with a thing like it. There was something about the girl and her cries, by the time of which he found her and grabbed the throat, the feeling came. Cold, the same cold he had felt around his own body now. Tom felt around her mouth, seeing how it was closed it made no sense that she screamed,He wanted her to stop that, now it wasn't the time, but could it have been her?There wasn't any name for her, just a dim memory. Flowing rows of hair, as well as all the parts attached, she was undeniably the one he had been looking for. Was she his age after all?Nothing much occurred to his mind, nonetheless, the answer was benign. His instinct pushed him towards going on and carrying the body on top of his, having to deliver what felt like a promise. 'Look, he's at it again. "What's he doing with the corpse though?" Shh, he's coming. 'Tom did his best to ignore those whispers, guided by mostly a hand on a wall. Despite being some sort of a complicated place to get through, there was nothing else which was needed. His job here was done now that two guardians reign around, spreading terror and making sure there'd be no survivor. Even such a thought disturbed him to the way back. By the time of which he went across the pit without even being bothered whatsoever. Some time passed on the other side. Desolation and silence had reigned for far too long, through whatever happened, he knew what the plan was. This was Tom, the one who wanted to escape, the one who had a promise to keep. The one who grabbed too much around that cold throat and snapped it. No, she was already dead, she must've been, the daughter which had a need to be delivered. Such a trip took more than consciousness alone to get through, as he would find himself in need to crawl through dirt and dig himself out, at least that's the way he thought it'd be. At first, there were some sounds around, perhaps the guardians who remained and still loomed across. Neither of the remaining ones ever managed to disturb his walk. The moment of which he came out into the world came unexpectedly fast, with no resistance, no digging like an animal, a small reluctance, though a quest unending. Such a blindness didn't do much for his condition, but he knew, vaguely where she was. 'He's still here.' Thought someone, looking into the distance. It's been far too long since he had gone exploring, only to look upon the new aberration of humanity that came outside. Something was different, much too different. Not only that, but that creature he bore in his back was too tainted to look upon by someone who had any resemblance of sentience whatsoever. It bore a long body filled with many bumps that held small legs, giant slithering limbs that would've most likely be used to push the body from danger's way. The head was the worst of all, a four painted atrocity that looked in every direction and bore crawling teeth which appeared to have parted ways. Worst of all was the fact that it was only feigning death by the looks of it. Either that, or that curse which laid around still managed to bring the dead back to fruition. Such an abomination left a dripping thing on the ground. It didn't bode well. Though Gurden was even more certain that there'd be no need for him to go there and take care of it himself. Not after what he's done. Another patrol was soon to return. Despite being in his condition, Tom had the girl with him, saved from the mad king. He would certainly return to that place to end things right after he had reached the point where her mother laid. Where exactly? It bore through, as he would make for what seemed to have been the higher planes, perhaps even the highest planes that would've been around. 'My lord, they're trying to break the ranks, what will we do?' 'Keep the fire up and the spears straight, they won't even dare make for the hedges.' The men were in a feud, standing in a row. In front of them laid a row of dumbfounded dead men who appeared to have a fear of fire, such as every living being had if it had to face it head-on. 'How could it be that they're alive? Look at how ravaged their bodies are, what could've done this?' 'I don't know yet, but this world is full of surprised we weren't aware of.' The sounds didn't do much to make them any more anxious, perhaps because the enemy was silent. Silent as well as the patient from the likes of it, they waited. Something passed that creeping visage as the back of their necks bore a frightening thing. At once one of them snapped something behind the head. The men were aware of a multitude of crawling small being coming towards them, perhaps four of them. By the time they reached even what might've been the inner entrance into the flanks, one torch was pointed towards their ends and scorched three of them into a wild fume. It wasn't that the fourth one showed any sign of intelligence alone, other than the fact it stopped. Such a wicked thing, with its carapace and brownish look. The head had an ill effect on it, even by the distance. Something shook again in Tom's arms, without a warning, making that damned sound over and over again. For him, there was a cry, though he remembers how long it was since he heard, really heard someone as closely and loudly as he heard her then. It made his soul shudder, his body wanted to react, one quick snap ahead and there'd be no stop. But he was guided nonetheless into the thicket of trees, heading for the entrance to the high mountains. This path would be perilous and take too long for him to carry on alone. Fate had another wicked surprise nonetheless, that he arrived and went through the village with his horrific visage. People cowered and went away, they hide themselves, closed their doors, brought their children into the house as well. 'Don't look at it Mary, it's bad luck, you know that better than any other.' 'Oh, but what could those be? We've done nothing to attract this kind of creature, we haven't hurt, we haven't dared, we're good people.' 'I know that, don't you think I'm not aware of it already? It must be a test, just stand and wait.' To the others, old farmer George would've looked like nothing short of a madman, taking his two sheep into his house just in time only to get out to converse with those things. Even by the look on his face, there wasn't any hiding of the fear he had felt. 'Mornin'How are you doing now, everything all right?'The stumbling stupor stopped, though the creature behind him still made that horrible noise which appeared to have brought much misery to him. It was silent now, that of which was understood, though the wailing wouldn't be the only horrible thing which might've been done. There was still one tentacle which moved and tried to jerk itself away from Tom's body. It failed. 'Well, I don't suppose you've come here to ask for directions, have you?'Farmer George gave a hideous laugh. He could see that that sponge which filled the creature's mouth receded back, along with some of the stitches which had once constructed a tightly closed mouth. 'Mountains. 'Came the word of pleasure. Just as fast as it happened, the word left his mouth as the sponge had already taken his ability to speak, pulsating even more violently than before. It was because the poor lad managed to wet his lips in the few moments of speech. To say the least of it, there wasn't any pleasing in the moments it took to grow inside his mouth. 'Oh, the mountains, you're making for the mountains, right. Dangerous place, right, going out there, with what's in the sky. "George, George. 'He turned around to see a half-open door with his wife standing at its threshold, waving in dismissal. It was clear that most of the watchers wanted those two things out, as fast as possible if that wasn't clear by now. 'Right, the mountains aren't far, nor are they hard to find, just keep following the trees until you reach stone, but be careful which kind of stone. There might be the river, not so far and you wouldn't want to get to the wrong kind of mountain if there's such a thing at all. I don't suppose you would want to spend the night until it becomes clear now. You and your friend do seem tired in some sort of way. 'There wasn't any reply. The body pondered whenever or nor it should carry on the route with the instincts and strike at the man before it went on for the rest of the village. It carried on without having to turn. A bizarre pair, but they carried on. 'Oh, what were you thinking George, trying to invite them in like that?"George, how did you do it?"George, come on George. "Tell us, farmer, how did you manage to make that creature leave?"There were voices which were drowned in the crowd, yet they came with utmost curiosity and awe. As soon as those things went out of view, the village almost became populated again. 'Well, I don't think myself like some kind of protector or some of the kind but I must tell you that I'm quite proud of the fact that I managed to treat someone like him with the same decency we folk do. 'The pat on his own back made his wife roll her eyes, but in their play of words, they haven't noticed the giant shadow which was following the lad. Nor the fact that he was accompanied by someone else as well. 'You sure about this?"Right, he's not supposed to be here and that thing he's carrying with him isn't from this world. 'He could hear the high pitched cry it bore even now, ringing inside his head. They followed, the man with a sword in hand, and him with his bare fists. Those would be enough. By the time he was done with the woods, he had already come onto hills, or at least they felt like hills, green with small or medium-sized stones which laid around. Mountains in growth, he used to joke as a child, wondering whenever or not they'd become as tall and as mighty as those stone giants. But their wickedness went not unobserved, at the sound and sight, he was almost driven mad by it. The skybox lied and showed that image clear, of Tom. A wicked creature that wasn't his, carrying the body, the proof of what his guilt had run about. It was the only moment of true rage the king had felt as he decided to come forth. Through various entries of his grand palace, there'd be the bottom stable, hidden from the eye. He made it as fast as he might for the horses still waited there. As tainted and decayed as they looked, all bones but no meat for centuries of waiting, something still made that mass of meat and bones stand. Another curse in his realm, though he took Legacy, the most tainted of the bunch, he managed to get through the hidden ways. Moments later and he was gone. Without any notice of his absence, it was time for him to correct the last thing that bothered him. He went ahead without remorse, though he looked through and saw it. 'First my servants and now you, grim creature. Just who else could it be that's following you as well?' One of his servants and the creature accompanying him became even more apparent. The man, of which there laid a certain recollection of memories sighed. No, there was something grim about the fact that they were both chasing after it and the girl. Could they have known?'No matter what, you're to be punished after I catch you all. 'The king thought. 'There was a slight break, at least now that the horse had a chance. It wasn't that it was dead, though rather, dehydration and starvation were slowed for its race, through an almost system of hibernation. When the chance arrived, it drank an entire pool of water which laid on the ground, finally adding some mass to its body. 'Go on, we need to get there in time. I'll deal with your needs later if I have to. 'The horse noted and went back at it, even faster now despite having received more weight. From the looks of it, there wasn't any telling why it happened, though certainly, something had. At the rare encounter of that dead wriggling husk, he peered and couldn't believe his eyes.

It was a thing of torture for him to lay eyes upon, especially since it was a rather close encounter. 'What are you?' Begone foul thing before I slay you in my thirst for obscurity. 'He almost shouted, with a startling rage that could beam into its body. From the looks of it, there wasn't any doubt that it was dead, perhaps even stranger was the fact that it bore itself as softly as it could inside the ground. Like a damn worm, it disappeared, with a frightening speed and without a trace. There was no way he'd wait to see more of what this land promised, not so fast as to forget what had happened in the sky. One thing at a time, he rode as fast, without being attacked by the dead husk, even more than that. He even started to catch on, from the looks of it, now that he had fed it. Small animals appeared, rodents of some sort. It wasn't something one would see as often, though their arrival there had brought a great amount of change. The king almost stretched ahead and grabbed one of those small sharp-toothed, big-eyed long critters and broke its teeth. Then, he skinned it alive with a quick swipe of his glove and threw the rest away. Just so that it was clear, the horse ate it raw without any trouble, even wanting it more, before showing its well-endowed capability of spitting out the bones before being done. Such a process needed only a few times to be repeated while they were still participating in the chase. Without a doubt, it was him who created that giant bulk inside the horse's stomach which brought back its might. 'Carry one now, we're reaching them. 'The king thought, as fast as he could, he went through the same village, too fast to get any glance or speak to anyone whatsoever. From the looks of it, Tom was already climbing. So were the man and Gurden. 'What do you suppose we'll do when we get to him?' 'Easy, we have them both get rid off, as fast as we can. "You don't appear to bear any sympathy for it, are you?" 'Do you bear any sympathy for it either?' It used to be a human once, of that I am sure and now look at what it's become. 'They looked at the blind fool and how it carried that slithering thing. For once, their plans were uncertain. 'What is it trying to accomplish with it up there?' 'I am not sure but we cannot allow it to live further and multiply, it could create more problems than fix them. 'Herbert was a militant man, the soldier in the army, he had defended the capital for many years before its fall. Now, it came down to various acts that would madden a man of lesser value. Indeed, he joined the fur-filled ape-like intelligent creature in hopes he'd get to the bottom of it and form an alliance. There had to be another way through. 'Look around, I'm sure we could get through the mountain by the path all the way up. "We could, but it would take us far too much time, we need to climb as it might be our only hope. 'The looks of it made him rethink of much of what they had discussed. It was dangerous and if something happened to either of them, they had decided that the latter would be left behind. 'We cannot let it get through, not until we're done, understood?" "I understand, there's no need to shove and push, I can make it on my own, you know?" There was a spoiled look, but they didn't notice. From the distance, the horse and the king had noticed just where they were all heading to. 'Perfect, we could make it through the long path and reach them just in time. 'With no regard for his safety, he went away and felt the cold. Certainly, there wasn't any snow but the way ahead was forked and went in curbed steepes, growing more and more intense as they got higher. It was easier than he thought, at least the way he had gone through promised something which would get higher and higher by the long turn. Some ancient man had to be applauded for the handiwork done there after all this wasn't nature's work alone. The flight continued. It carried on despite the fear that each of them felt. 'What if they will find me out?" "What if I may fall and die?" The poor soldier followed the beast, hardly staying onto the rocks, without the least piece of rope to wrap himself around. At least he was set in front of it for the thing could at least catch him if not slam him back into his place. 'Well, how long until we catch him?" "Not so loud, for he may hear us? We won't have to go there for long now, there seem to be some mountain roads out there. It may even be that we could catch on to him before getting lost in the clouds. 'That of which promised quite the view. Pity for poor Tom, who was now an odd lad who quickly stopped climbing the stone. Now that he was back on stone, he followed through and walked around. A thin path laid ahead, perhaps too thin for him to walk with someone on his shoulder, though it was a risk worth taking. Someone was looking for that girl, after all, she still cried softly for her mother. The sky cube showed its lies, Tom and the girl which had to be delivered to him were already on the way, heading towards some unknown destination. Where could he bring that and who could he see? I will have them both ground, abomination, the child, the mother and her father as well if I am to lay my hands upon them. 'As for the two of you. 'He thought of last, as the horse jumped from stone to stone, to a reasonable height. It was soon that he came to be, above, further above than the two of them laid. One small rock came in the form of a stone avalanche of smaller pebbles, dirt and many other extremities that laid there. 'Careful, they're coming!" The man announced, by the sight alone he managed to duck his head. It couldn't be said the same about Gurden who was too big to even cower from its power. 'I cannot continue this path like this, you must go ahead and catch it without me. 'Gurden was already descending back from where he came, slightly defeated and afraid to continue. "You can't abandon me from the sight of a few pebbles. 'The man said though he had not a better sight than he had. As far above as he dared peer his eyes, laid the king standing on his horse waiting. Obviously, the mere humane sight had no enough might to see how far he laid, or how deeply he was hiding in the wind. It bore an eyeless gaze which made Gurden understand that he wasn't welcome there, not only that, but also that he wasn't a foe to mess with. 'You'll have to continue or doom this world if it is kept alive. 'The man nodded but dared not looked back. Damn you fiend and your malevolent dark tricks. 'I will do it then, as I please, I'll continue this quest on my own and made sure its kind never wretches this plane of existence. I swear it on my honour. 'He thought as he made it where Tom had been. It was the right angle to shiver a stone and enough that one would manage to end his miserable existence. Though this didn't bode well enough for him. No, he wanted that thing to carry on and perhaps recover the body of the girl. 'And then I'd end two rabbits with one shot. Good thinking, let's continue then my dire mare. 'They rode on, hidden from his sight. It was a long way to carry and climb on, though he had the vantage point, a clean, hill-like pair of stones laid ahead which made it seem like this was carved by someone for him alone. That creature still held the girl, but having him killed in the wall would've done nothing to hide the body. Even worse, as his hands were dirty, guilt would once come back and haunt him for eternity. One slip and he'd be done for. The body must burn or have it skewered by dire wolves. Yes, meat for the animals, the best of the approach, just make sure you don't take a bad turn. The king thought as he looked through the cube and saw him carry that thing through the longest steep alone. 'Why is this man even trying now?' Somehow, he had reached both of them, despite being so far behind. Curiously, he wasn't bothered by carrying another body with him, but still. 'I might start having to stall for you if you keep going that way. 'A path of redemption from the man, the way he might've thought. Either that or he knew something he shouldn't have. 'Fall now, just fall. 'The king lowered himself down from the horse and had him follow. Looking around, past the slight appearance of mist, there seemed to have been an endless supply of small stones and pebbles. Just an angled shot so he wouldn't make it through if this mad game of his had to continue. Through he peered down no longer. One sight of something wriggling across the sky and he almost came down to hide. A hissing from his helmet and the horse lowered himself as well. 'You couldn't have come at a worse time now. 'He said with a bitter voice as he noticed the sky darken all around. Judging by the size alone, it would definitely not be the best thing to anger the beast. No, not now that there laid no protection around him, and he had made it too far to be driven off. It was something he had to face by himself. Not that it was as awful as he might've thought at first, mostly because there wasn't any way to be seen. 'Wait here and don't move a muscle or a bone. When we turn, you'll be rewarded never to fast ever again. 'Despite being a horse there was a nod as if it understood what the king said. Crawling now, he looked at them, with his sky cube, he peered as close. The man had noticed the beast and laid shaking, though he carried on rather than turning back at the sight of that wriggler. Perhaps he deserved to be kept alive a little longer, but not that one, neither of which will survive this. He made it for the higher stones and looked forth as he blended in. One last thing laid in mind for him, as the steep mountain path ended for Tom, they'd come onto flatness, enough that he'd make it on foot to the top of the mountain. 'That's where you're headed to. 'Tom went ahead and followed whatever instincts he had left inside, feeling the cold air, approaching the point he had his vague memory of. Such a feeling of stone, despite the fact that the bare feet weren't his, it brought him a recollection of every moment he had spent alone. Running in a world that wasn't like this, one closer to his own. As much as he wanted, something dire had happened and he was quite aware that he was damned. One last thing, one last thing, even such a creature like him wanted the need to think for itself. Though that failed, when it wasn't even Tom who did all that, but the sponge which had long arrived and made it for him the rotten brain. It had died and now laid broken, animated by the strange sponge which seemed to have brought everything back to, mostly an indecent state. With such a creature crying in his back, there wasn't any telling what was to be with the scene. Though luck was on his side as he approached the inner tops of the mountains as a corpse laid out there in the open. It needed no eyes to feel it rotting and send its many invisible bodily spores directly through the air, bouncing against its body until the opened like open books. Could this have been the lady that had lost her daughter? Was the promise which was done so long ago ready to be fulfilled? Two silent watchers laid there, at a distance and watched. A strange thing he'd done now, as he reached the corpse and kept beside it. There wasn't any sort of reanimation in this far tip of the world, only death and the unstoppable decay. Luckily for the creature, there weren't any eyes, and the brain damage caused by the lack of air did more than enough to wipe the image of her. A block of blue-like dark laid around, pushing and distorting the image he had tried seeing. Even her moving her lips had a strange effect, having a pair of crooked teeth just spread around while the mind had tricks playing on him. I've come here to bring your daughter back. He said in his mind, in which, the mirror image of himself gave her the child he had carried from so far. Though it was dim outside by now, this was done, she grasped her daughter around her in an embrace and started crying. For this was, in reality, a tainted thing, even of which the king had noticed, he peered at the trickery and almost fainted in stone. With a crushing blow, he crushed the cube and made it for a quick escape. It was when he thought he'd do it if it weren't for the built up rage, the risk he'd taken. 'Damn creature of utmost hell's plane. 'A voice staggered. Despite Tom's smile, the creature tried getting away and in the process, it threw the body of that woman off the cliff, with a strong push from that one wretched limb it bore. Tom had it coming but noticed it not until the spear came through his body and into that creature, the girl as he had through it. The first blow was deep and the cry was audible even to him. 'Return from whence you came out of, now and die forever. 'The reasoning stood without fail as he pulled the spear and plunged it more and more until Tom had the appearance of a haggard hive, kneeling now that the sponge was bleeding. A poisonous thing which that thing filled with thirst started drinking. 'Why won't you end your suffering and. 'His heart stopped at once, with only half of a second to see that there laid a had in his stomach, a familiar thing if it weren't for the rush of blood which came into his head. He was thrown by the side, rolling off the far edges and into the ether. 'As for you. 'He said at least, ignoring the familiarity of the situation, he carried on with the closure. Already Tom had taken more than enough blows which compelled him to have no control over his body. With a piece of the sponge, his head was ripped and thrown away, soon to follow with the body. The abomination was to be the last thing, which he dared not touch. Once he found himself standing face to face with a wriggling beast which had known all along what was happening there, he stood there and waited. If it wanted it dead, it would've ended him a long time ago. Despite opening its giant maw, it hadn't come for him, but that creature laying in front of him, as an offer of some kind. It chewed on it and looked mightily pleased by that. From the looks of which, it did appear that this was the biggest wriggling beast he had ever laid eyes upon.

Headless space

Beckon thy call! Time had come for the creators of the dark race to shout into the farthest edges of the universe. Their voices called as they travelled far back, giving birth to the other breeds during the age of eternal night. Not only had they existed in a tormented state, but their visions gave birth to twisted and tormented daemoniac cacklings which writhed and choked in space. Past their many lives, they evolved their long bodies and sharp infinitely spreading legs, peering with eyes unwatched upon the eerie planes of existence where mankind dwelled. During the peak of their might, they tried getting in touch with them but failed. As a testimony to it, they decided to bleed internally since pride would not allow anything lesser for their kind. It was grim knowing yourself a ruler that's unable to govern over others as he should. They would point and they would say:

‘Look at how they laugh at us.’

Each and every one of them shared a single consciousness which eventually got tired of the so-called mastery over infinity. Boredom was supreme and a way of life. Moreover, the ape-like primitives mocked them without even being aware of their existence in the space-like continuum. It was time to punish them before their untimely extinction, bringing forth one hundred, no, one thousand suspended humans in their skin-cages. They were greeted by a dull place, crafted during ancient times to deal with the amount of legs their species produced. Anything even remotely looking like architecture was in reality decrepit and vile. With a single unanimous thought from the great consciousness, they had all been reduced to the most primitive features man had known, until they all looked the same. It was a gesture of grandness to pour their entire consciousness in those small bodies, their tiny human brains being completely digested by the vastness of information they projected upon them. We shall get through them by whatever means feasible, even if we are to be mocked and consumed by their suspicion. Eventuality dictated that the greatest race of all would prevail! And in the end, we will dissolve their bodies and rule forever unmocked in space. Left behind, their ancient bodies as well as their head bulbs began spreading in halves, pointing towards the ground, unable to look forward any longer. A promise of grand stature laid ahead for them to follow on. Now that they were done pouring themselves in; hundreds, thousands, millions of infested neurons inhabited the modified humans as they returned to Earth, where they belonged. Among the laughing apes which mocked them in their sleep, who had the most intriguingly mad idea of space. It was the middle of the day for Jonathan. No one noticed his absence during the mid-shift nearing the late hours. There wasn't any need to understand how machines worked since most of them were too primitive for their liking. 'Working hard as usual, Jonathan. Had your break yet? How about you get those Rickard files ready for me before eight O'clock?' He called in the morning and there had been an accident relating the entire ordeal, John? Are you even listening? "Yes, I'll get onto it and leave them on your desk." I'm glad I could count on you. That was Donna who just left, with which John had so forth shared his fantasies with her, the deepest, most amusing dreams he had ever dared share with a woman he had known. It just so happened that she was his boss, with which he had dared fantasize about in secret, even to the point where. The line of thought hadn't interested him any longer. No one from the officer even noticed the bald, featureless man standing there and looking through their minds. They had already hated sharing this body, this disgusting lobbying thing. Looking through the closest reflection, they realised just how out of the ordinary they looked in there. Such vague clothes, they changed to fit the office. There wasn't anything beyond their power, especially with so many of them holding just once. With the apprehension of someone missing, their image of another man laid here and here, perhaps closely set on a few of the desks. He had taken his appearance and taken the moulding remains from each and every single one of them into account. Elliot, the employer, had gone missing. That part was fairly erased, though it just happened that one man in the toilet had been given too much of the power. It wasn't that anyone had noticed how the might entered his head and its expulsion from the inner blood and guts had ended going through the end of his skull, reach the ceiling. With no regard, of what he was, a portal opened above and the remains with all the splattering things were pulled inside of it, to the nethermost regions of space. Those depths of space where it was worm and there was nothing to have them become cold. Yes, this would be most fitting. Immediately they had taken the appearance of this new man and changed the desks around with only the mind, making sure each and every single one of the memories fit together well. He came next to John to whom they'd taken the interest. Seeing as much, one hand already started dissolving from the overuse. Even these bodies couldn't handle much. It was a fact that the other ones had landed into different eras, during the war, the future and distant past, each being able to access anything they ever desired. Yet, their search had to be thorough, for those who had peered upon their now, long abandoned husks and laughed. Now, this couldn't be one. 'In a minute now. Oh, you're that man, I'm terribly sorry but I can't remember your name now.' John had tried peering but moments passed while staring and it just so happened that there was nothing there. His little brain had been just a little too tempered with, to the point where he had started seeing things. People that weren't only there but most of which they had been part of fictitious stories he had read in the past. Dragon The wind was high and fire flew upon the midnight sky, burning through the wicked clouds, turning white into proper black. Humming such as his could never again be heard anywhere else, though the pain was felt, birds were flying, their children abandoned and the wicked scent went on dying off. 'It came, the desecrator came!' Yelled a man, his wooden shaft across his neck, it could be sharpened and be thrown at it, though it was to be too fast as he did not even blink. He returned alas, a blast of fire being thrown from above, at the point of raising the entire area, drowning it in the smoke. There used to be those who fled, as the others refused to even try, knowing that their doom would soon be taken, apart from in pieces, until there was only black smouldered on the ground. Down the hill, it made a layer, with its claws digging through as if it was nothing more than a thin stack of papers, though which it burnt and dug and pushed until it made space. There it slept for days and days. With one eye open whilst the other close, it finally gave up and closed them both. No one would dare approach him, nor deny, that there was the peril if one were to approach, to be eaten alive. It was hungry and couldn't be bothered, so it slumbered instead, after the destruction. From time to time, it desired still, to fly above and seek and seek. In his wicked tongue, to yell at them. 'Do not dare cross this line, for this is my land now.' Indeed, there was a river line that stood between them, cutting a bigger part of a forest from a smaller one. What was surprising beyond that, remained that, despite all, the dragon chase the small one, raised the houses up, then burnt them all to the ground.

Grayish Poe's Silo

'A concoction, I tell you, that's the reason it turned that way. It wasn't me nor my pets and on that, I have more than several nobles to swear on my name, your honour.' 'That would be enough, good sir and therefore the verdict may be laid.'

The voice of the judge echoes through the oak halls, runes flying on the walls, along with a cold wind. It was especially cold during the time of the season and no mistake could be made in the judgment soon to be believed. Eight witnesses, from left to right stood tall and all of them judged the poor soul who was waiting for; asking for nothing more than what would've been a fair judgment. At least it would. 'Though I bear spite and it wasn't born here nor there, my sentence is that you're guilty of everything and everywhere.'

The mouth spoke, another followed.

'Yes indeed, he's guilty of every crime and none may deny what happened those days, what may happen next if we leave this up-sack unhindered on his away. He'll tear up our crops all over again.'

She had her chickens spliced up as she witnessed them eaten alive.

'Yes, Barnabee Nestor. You are to blame, for all out pests, misfortunes and deaths. My wife died from the medicine you got her.'

And so it happened that there were only seven witnesses alive in the room, to testify, though it was enough. Barnabee did not have his head in shame, to listen to his own demise, with no power to defend him, nor would the judge stop. He enjoyed it too, watching the skin cringe, the paleness behind the brows harden, even as the knees depend on, Barnabee couldn't swallow off the tension built inside the walls. And such walls would've been a better fate, to be crushed under them, rather than to stand and cry, listening to his failure and how he'd escape. 'Now. Well, I hereby declare you Barnabee Nestor, the third of his given name, guilty of the crimes committed, witnessed and said, to confinement into that damned Silo, that you so desperately claimed to be hell!' The sentence was harsh, even for them, their faces changing as well. He even thought about reconsidering what the punishment would've been, even if there wasn't any daring to turn his own words after he spoke them to thorough. Whispers came as Barnabee was struck with depression, angst and fear, even by the thought. No one dared enter the Silo, by the simple fact. A gateway to the abyss, to the old gods of depths, and those above, with not even the slightest risk of getting back, he knew that this was no punishment, rather, an execution. 'Do I get no parole then?' A most curious smile erupted from the man, laughing at all of them, at death too as well. He knew that after that there'd be no coming back, making the best course of action to be bitterly cynical of the past. 'And since it'd take some time for the guards to arrive and escort me there. Just listen.' 'Silence in my court you, you!' 'I said listen!' The voice that made them shake inside the boots, the true nature of the man revealing itself, which held no surprise why they backed away. He was a danger, to them and himself, though there was nothing to lose. 'Nothing at last. There will be nothing left of me once I'm there, though I may as well have some fun, as a last request dear judge. And you'd better write that down. My confession, call it as it is. What I've done to you, the sins and everything was indeed ridiculously insane, and I admit to all of it!' 'All of it?' The woman asked surprise, barely managing to hold her feather sons in her buzz, as dried as they remained. 'Though if I were you I wouldn't hold that, especially since I know well what I've done to that.' It was a provocation and disgust, she dropped it immediately and shamefully exposed of what she held in front of all of them, for such long time. Mere body rails were enough to replicate the action that was accomplished then, what he did to the chicken once it was dead. 'Oh, how dare you, even on your dying bed, make this poor lady cry?' 'You're talking, aren't you? I've seen you attempt on her daughter before the process even started! All of you!' He pointed at last, with his head only; the eyes were only needed for a moment before they passed out. The shock was more than enough, as were the guards coming in. Barnabee knew that this was the last of his chance, to point it back at them; the outrage he managed to get became more on an indescribable bravado, at which the judge sighed. Though it was not his task to judge him again, that was for the heavens and the hells. 'And you, and you-you. Liar, feaster and fat pig. You're all worse than me in every single aspect of your boring lives, and yet you dare criticize me, above all. I dared do something and for that, I'm glad I will be dead for.' The doors slammed. 'To live my life, even for a moment, be written on a judge's note for all to see, after me. The spark I have.' That used to be, conducted now through the rusted metal of the armor the guards had, as they held him tight, coming through the exit, never to be heard. Look from behind, in silence as some wept, others were met with silence. In his own words recalled, the last said before the note spreading and writing ended, by young Analisse, the judge's assistant. 'Simpletons, who did not expect the old dog to retaliate!' Before he'd be taken away, against his will. The stumps of his legs and the silence of the guards already forced him into a glimpse into the life that was going to be. His last moments were surrounded by what looked like decent folk, hence the reason he decided there. 'That, I will not both of you more than I have to, since I know you're only doing your job. And already I've laid waste on my last wish so there's no hope for me to wish I'd get the chance to survive.' It was about to be a long trip, outside, at a carriage with locks, at which even the horse was tied and made into a fortress that was holding the reins of a knight. This was no mere servant of the law or an enforcer, but an armored knight, sitting on top of a desolate posture. Even the armor dared not touch light, the metal being bent into carvings and dents, all bent or melted to become part of it. Oh, he's seen war, perhaps even the best of them. How even they managed to assign him to a simple escort was a mystery to him. Through the mass of peasants that barreled at him, he sighed, though his eye widened and the sanity in his mind, he denied. Double. 'Two of them, how could this be?' It was another knight wearing the same armor, bearing the same marks, as tall and look alike in all remarks. Even the purple and the red, as dark as they both stood, pillars in front of the carriage, everything was done systematic. Past the rotten fruits and shouts. 'Hang him. Murder that disposable cunt!' And other of the sort, they wanted nothing more but to see him dead, despite the fact that most of them wouldn't even get the chance to find out about him. Or even see. How blind could they be? 'Knock it off ye' wenches. You'll get enough hanging on the next batch!' Barnabee was furious, though his real reason wasn't that he was made into a cunt in front of them. It ran deeper, as he noticed. Was I set up in all of this? He asked himself, two guards, two knights, he even felt a chill into the judge's room, as if the ghost of someone was watching over as another jury. 'No, this couldn't be.' Shoved aside, he whispered in his cage, a mixture of metal, wood and slight comfort. Two knights in front and the guards leaving them alone. It was thus curious, on the road, now that the drapery covered his body, the gaze of others too. 'I've not seen their face properly and I can't remember either. Damn this, why did I have to admit? Perhaps if I waited for a little, I could've been admitted.' Silence in the back prisoner. The knight said, opening a small hatch and looking through the distorted helmet he had. A long journey lay ahead, and the only face he'd now have to get used to was as ugly as it'd get. 'Or else what? You'll kill me then?' 'We would not dare!' The other knight responded, now both of them turned like owls and started at him. None are staring at the road. 'Do you want us dead? Watch the road you damn armored baboons.' 'Worry not; we've been through this road at least a hundred thousand times. Either of us could drive through it headless and even whilst drown without own blood.' Quite the peculiarity it was, he did not wonder why. 'So I'm to understand you're taking me somewhere else?' 'No, we did not say such a thing. Though we will take you towards a special place we'd like to call. "Home!" The road remained the same, as Barnabee could feel no deviation, no sudden movement of the horse. A grim feeling remained, as gloom was visible even in his cold breath. 'Are you taking me to the Silo? Still?' 'You guessed.' He realized then, even after it was revealed, the strange appearance and how none of the dirty peasants from before, the ones that bickered at him as if he was a monster, none of them seemed to react any different at them. None. 'You're taking me to hell, aren't you?' Adrenaline rushed through the veins and a sudden burst of rage and wrath made him shake the cage, the shackles and shove himself against the walls. The pain was numbed in the area he'd hit. It managed to do nothing but make them laugh at him. 'More more keep doing it. There will be enough to come after we're there, forever more, the gate waits. Even now, the Silo's carvings are made of hands. Boldness to them, to speak such madness, to act like madmen, and be grabbed to a stop. The hatch closed immediately and Barnabee fell on his knees. Cramped in the small space, he was forced to wait and listen. 'Damn this, I did not deserve it, no one does. We can't be there either, then why did they stop?' He'd get no answer, none at all, and outside, with his ear jammed against the cold bars, there was something there. Something of such nature that not even the most desensitized deaf would've heard, at which their natural awareness increased by a thousand more than a normal man. Someone's breathing on the other side, I swear. Did they change their mind then, am I even safe? His thoughts reflected only a fragment of what he had in mind, the imaginary of them torturing him made him stop. Outside his awareness, what he did not know, there laid a stop with the two knights standing neck in neck, hands on each other's twin blades. It was a church that stood in their way, at which the horse stopped without thinking or command. It did share something with both of them, other than an armor, and balance, the fear it felt, even through the lenses of an animal of its kind, it did not make any sense. None at all. Could it be the ungodliness from the spread towards the horse too, or does it know of my command? The priest was quite surprised, the thoughts, despite being pure, still grudge both of them, appearing in the stance of war. And not only were their appearance repulsing to him, they still stank of fear, to approach the holy ground that stood merely a few feet in front of them. 'Ehm. May I help you, knights of?' 'Our order must not be spoken towards mere peasants and priestesses alike.' 'Especially your kind, now if you may please. We need you to move away as fast as possible.' The second knight said, resuming his stance as if he was a marionette. There was an appeal towards what he knew and wanted to do, the ways he had already envisioned on how it'd go measure to a varied amount. The ways he'd engage, and murder, the way he'd kill and slash. How he'd deal with the holy ground, scorched and burnt to the sound. Screams coming out of everyone in the church as they were trapped in a various vision of fire and dirt. Such were the ways, though he was distracted. 'Do not quarry brother; we still have a task to do. Very well priest, you may be holding now, though count yourself lucky that we're busy and on the run. Else' 'You're welcome anytime. Come by soon!' His voice carried a high note, though in his face it was clear how much he despised them, and how much he'd have liked to retaliate. Though, he was again, as every single priest in the town, taught better than that. 'Very well.' The hilts were already on their way, though one of the brothers stopped. A few dirty sounds, and a scream followed by a shout. 'What could be happening outside there?' Barnabee still hadn't realized though why the delay, though after a minute of waiting, the carriage was once again on its way. The horse yelled and it was clear, as the hatch opened again, it was revealed. It was the grim armor, covered in a sickly colored grey and red. Barnabee gulped a second and stared. 'No more stops from now on.' 'We're terribly sorry for the delay, though there will be enough time for you to despair, my brother's fault comes to be. His impatience and the terrible act made us lose some time. Not to mention that he dirtied my sword.' 'Perhaps I wouldn't have if you stood to the plan instead of backing down. Now, I'm the only one to be cleaned and scalded for what's done.' 'Ehm.' The echo that came from one of them was more than enough to show the hollowness he had inside. These were no men, or anything, though who could tell what they really were. 'We will have enough after we pick our brother, it should be clear. He'll switch places with you and you shall not be punished. As you may tell by now, there's no need to tell our guest there about all of our problems since it may as well be corrected with much more ease.' The carriage went, and after a bump, one of the helmets suddenly jumped out of the cart and off the road. 'No!' He yelled, seeing the decapitated head, there was nothing in there, not the stump nor the body. 'You're demons. Let me out, let me, out!' A shout and a cry for help came, though there was none to help. One of the knights was stumbling to grab the reins whilst another one was trying his best to find his head. 'Hold on Barnabee. I don't know how much I can!' A blast came and penetrated the cage, as there was no mere bump in the road. The carriage was turned and pieces of armor spread everywhere. An arrow flew immediately and cut through the thickest floating leaves and cut off the horse that held the carriage afloat. In the commotion, it was revealed, a raid, of shrouded men and women, all shaped to fit the land itself, covered in leaves, they began the assault. Some pieces were still moving, though like bandits they yelled. 'Go on; get them as fast as possible before it's too late!' The leader shouted though she did not know that she was leading the assault only to find, after revealing that there was nothing more but. 'They're hollow boss, what should we do?' The first one arrived, though before he could turn back and the gauntlet, he found himself stabbed in the gut, ready to fumble on the ground. Pain rushed through the body and he yelled. 'They're alive!' And everyone's attention came towards the bits and pieces on the ground, readying their swords and bows to fire through the forest's clouds. 'Damn these things just get the one with the sword, quickly!' She said, and four jumped, but none expected it to be so quick whilst jumping on and off the ground, immediately into the attack position whilst having nothing to see with. 'Whatever they were made to guard, it must be worth a fortune, so keep at it.' 'Yes, ma'am!' Unison, the voices that came followed a pattern of the vale. It was the need of a few arrows and some spears to pin it to the ground. More effort was put, as everything just bounced off when directly hitting, or appearing to do so. 'Alas.' She came victorious, after two gauntlets with their weapons managed to be kept incapacitated, the rest were easy, even for their small band of cutthroats. 'And now.' The spoils of war. Obviously, it seemed that no one would've agreed on buying such cursed artifact, like the pieces of armor, still flailing on the ground, especially since they were talking there without a care in the world. 'I wouldn't do that if I were you, woman, what lays in that carriage was already promised to someone else.' 'And I supposed I should just be flattering the demand of a head?' 'I'm sorry ma'am but there are two of them. And we've already secured.' 'Hah, if you could call that secured, we'll be backing again in no time, and after that, you'll learn.' Her curiosity was already aroused by the situation, as it looked like the carriage, or what lay inside of it might be valuable, if such cursed fiends were called in service. 'Very well, men tear down that cart.' With the signal given, and already at hand, they jumped and bent their knees along their hands, each side being barraged in and even more savage way than they previously fought. It was no wonder, why suddenly, the bolts fell and the wood that surrounded it came off, revealing the light to him, and every little surrounding place he'd see. Awakened, in front of them, he stood there tall, shaking in the cold. 'What now? Who are you people?' Barnabee had nothing on him to defend him, or any desire to explain. Thus, it remained the question she asked, after revealing her name. 'I am Everett, of the fist blades. Pardon my gang for their intrusion, though I have come here looking for answers. And if I may be more precise, who are you?' Her fingers ran across the metal balls, all tied together by chains that seemed melted in the locks. The whispers of the helmets were obviously trying to deceive, though they were silenced immediately at her command. As she lifted her other non-dominant left hand, two men jumped at each helmet, pointed a diamond-shaped lance, reflected in the sun, their polishes and quality made the two of them wonder why did they not use them from the start. 'Those are part of my guard, in case you two were wondering, and... ' The voice was clear, as, up from the hill, the third one crouched, hiding after he silenced the horse and waited for an opportunity to arrive. 'And, do not worry, they're well trained. Beshr, Shilq, cut them in half if they dare move their mouths again.' Nods in agreement and the problem were momentarily done. 'Now tell me, little man, before I lose my patience and order my guards to cut you instead, who are you and why're you trapped here?' 'Explain myself? Only if you let go of me, I won't just freely stand here and take your threat.' 'Shh. I need you to understand something, as, intelligent as you look, perhaps you may. You are in no need of bargaining, especially now, since you're twice the prisoner. So you may as well just go on with it and tell me, or else we can just go ahead and cut you off and move along. Do you understand now, the situation you're in?' Already has Everett ended her walk around the cage and noted the dents, through which she shove her fingers, and the whole cage fell apart. Barnabee tried gulping, though he was way too surprised to do so. 'Very well, I'll tell you.' And she smirked, even at the shortened story, and the band ready to go on their horses, with Barnabee in the back, the whole set of armor too tied with them. Though, the bargain, despite being so forced, remained in his mind as well in hers. 'You see, Barnabee, if I understand correctly, they're trying to take you towards the Silo, aren't they?' 'That is correct, though I.' 'Again, stop interrupting me Barnabee, unless you want a fate worse than that. Now, this how it's going to happen.' It happened too fast, though she gave no indication that someone approached to knock him out. 'We're going to accompany you there.' Everett, had only a part, though after he was knocked out, she turned to them and asked. 'You two as well, you'll tell me why've you getting from all of this, else I will make them cut you in even smaller pieces than you are now.' 'You can't threaten us, we're.. ' 'Going to be in pieces by the time I'm done with you. So?' The slightest touch made a small shockwave agonize the cramped space in which the hamlets were. It was the first touch that came out of the lances that cut through a centimeter of them, with no force used whatsoever; it cut through like a sharpened knife would butter. And it hurt just as well. They spoke quickly and cowardly, ready to give one another as well as their master.'It was all him, he made us go and to this.'Yes, he promised us gold and treasures.'Lies, men, you know what to do.'Before her hand reached the bottom side of her torso, their spark arise.'Wait, wait wait, wait, wait, wait.'Followed by the other's fear of demise.'My brother there was wrong to lie about that and for that, we're both terrible sorry.'I knew it you curls, what possible reason could two suits of walking armor need treasures for?Now spill it out before I change my mind again.'We were promised a soul. "Hah, don't try my patience again, pff.I knew I shouldn't have lost my time with the two of you.'Wait, I swear off my life and my brother's that it's the truth, solely as we heard it and it is at all nothing but the truth!'Bent, to the deepest cut in half knee he waited.'A soul it is then.'She said, 'Ours for the taking now, instead.'A short awakening it was, though it was still to be wagered, who would buy a soul, a cursed set of armor, and what would it make of us?It remained, the best they had, as the previous months were stricken by famine through the land, leaving nothing more than the minimal to be pillage.Their seer advised Everett on her mission, far ahead, his knees being already old as was his throat, making the very seconds he stood and spoke as painful as it appeared to her.He had known what was going to happen even before, though he struck by the shadows and kept the second eye to the woods behind.'There is another one that's following us, mistress, please heed my call.You may not be able to see him, though he's there and he will interfere as soon as he'll reach over here.'Don't you know I hadn't noticed?He's as obvious as a bull on a rain track.Never you mind him, if he decides to come for us; he'll just end up like his friends.Now move on men, we have to reach that place before the dawn sets up, nothing closer to the then.'The reins of the horses were already taken to the limit, though she insisted on pushing them even further than their limit.Ahead it laid, the entry to the desolate place, towards a shattered land that wouldn't heed to any rain, as they would just be drained under the various gaping holes.An underground system laid, even beyond their knowledge, though it wasn't entirely safe, that was surely the intent.Bones laid near the holes, most likely thrown away, all of them keeping their distance and the track as a whole.'Damn this, I could never get used to the scenery in this place.'Wait, do you think those bones could really be cleaned so well, even by some sort of creature down there?'Said another.It was captivating in a way that the land spoke to all, making their senses go numb, and dismissing one another.Various people had different excuses, some begged to stay behind and help for a safe return, though she denied.'We will go as planned, and I believed I said faster!If the last ray of light that's coming out of the sun leaves, there will be nothing left of the land.I've seen it happen before.'Then we need to go back!'I said no, we lay there, by the rock formations and wait there until the day comes.After we spend the night, the conditions should be more than enough to get there in time?'In time ma'am?'There was indeed that problem, spoken by the headless suits themselves.A bondage between memory and the present moment, connected by the mere fact that one spoke it then, whilst now, the other helmet spoke now.'Exactly, we need to get him in time.'The voice radiated, through the darkened armor in utmost contrast.The sparkle produced, the fiery red came even deeper by the blue pale sand, the tar-like holes, and the receding sun, near the camp's cove.'It will be less that the soul we'll lose if we don't get there in time.The deal spoke clearly of what would happen if we were to miss delivering him back towards where he belonged.'Though what that would be, signaled even more, why the third one was in such a hurry to get there, still a large distance away from where they'd go.'The Silo, as such, hold no water inside, instead if we don't get him back, the world will be dragged in there along him.'What?That's preposterous and I remind.'Shut it and listen, we've spoken nothing more than the truth alone, as

